

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

GENERAL LIBRARY UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN.

THE Hagerman Collection

OF BOOKS RELATING TO HISTORY AND POLITICAL SCIENCE

BOUGHT WITH MONEY PLACED BY

JAMES J. HAGERMAN OF CLASS OF '61

IN THE HANDS OF

Professor Charles Kendall Adams

IN THE YEAR

1883.

24 10 11

HANSARD'S

22731

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES.

THIRD SERIES,

COMMENCING WITH THE ACCESSION OF

WILLIAM IV.

23 & 24 VICTORIÆ, 1860.

VOL. CLIX.

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM

THE SEVENTH DAY OF JUNE, 1860,

TO

THE TWENTIETH DAY OF JULY, 1860.

Fourth Volume of the Session.

LONDON:

PUBLISHED BY CORNELIUS BUCK,

AT THE OFFICE FOR HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

23 PATERNOSTER ROW [E.C.]

AND BY

LONGMAN AND CO.; J. RIDGWAY; HATCHARD AND SON; J. BOOTH; C. DOLMAN; J. BAIN; W. DALTON; SMITH, ELDER, AND CO; RICHARDSON, BROTHERS;
UPHAM AND BEET; AND J. ALLEN AND CO.

1860.

LONDON : CORNELIUS BUCK, PRINTER, 23, PATERNOSTER ROW.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

TO

VOLUME CLIX.

THIRD SERIES.

- I. SUBJECTS OF DEBATE IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.
 II. SUBJECTS OF DEBATE IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.
 III. NEW MEMBERS SWORN.
-

I. SUBJECTS OF DEBATE IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

THURSDAY, JUNE 7.		Page
Endowed Charities— Presentation of a Bill by the Lord Chancellor—Bill read 1 ^a		1
Court of Probate and Divorce—Motion of Lord Brougham for Returns—Motion agreed to		2
Sir John Barnard's Act, &c., Repeal Bill—Bill read 2 ^a		4
Vote by Ballot and Manhood Suffrage—Resolutions of Lord Teynham on presenting Petitions in favour of Vote by Ballot and Manhood Suffrage— Resolutions negatived		4
FRIDAY, JUNE 8.
Sicily—Bombardment of Palermo—Question of Lord Brougham		146
Court of Rome—Diplomatic Relations—Motion of Earl Stanhope for Papers— Motion agreed to		147
English Shipwrights in French Dockyards—Question of Viscount Dungannon		161
Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences Bill—House in Committee		165
MONDAY, JUNE 11.
Harbours of Refuge— Presentation of Petition by Lord Portman and Question of Lord Ravensworth		218
Westminster Clock—Question of the Earl of Derby		218
Ecclesiastical Courts and Registries (Ireland) Bill—Bill read 2 ^a		219
Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences Bill—Order of the Day for the Third Reading read—Amendment of Lord Denman that the Bill be read a Third Time this Day Six Months—Amendment negatived by a Majority of 34—Bill read 3 ^a —Division List		220

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

TUESDAY, JUNE 12.		Page
Dilapidation of Glebe Houses—Question of Viscount Dungannon	...	295
Light Weight Racing Bill—Order of the Day for the Second Reading read— Amendment of the Duke of Beaufort that the Bill be read a Second Time this Day Three Months—Amendment and Original Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn —Bill also withdrawn	295
Duchy of Cornwall (Limitation of Actions) Bill—House in Committee	...	314
Union of Benefices Bill—House in Committee	...	316
Ecclesiastical Courts Jurisdiction Bill—Bill read 3 ^a —Bill passed , and sent to the Commons	321
THURSDAY, JUNE 14.
Disturbances in New Zealand—Question of the Earl of Carnarvon	...	417
Reduction of the Wine Duties—Motion of Lord Monteagle for Returns—Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn	418
Tuscany—The Yacht Medina —Question of the Earl of Malmesbury	...	422
FRIDAY, JUNE 15.
India—Leasing of Children— Presentation of Petition, and Motion for Returns moved for by Lord Brougham—Motion agreed to	492
Rifled Cast-Iron Guns—Question of the Earl of Camperdown	...	492
Furious Riding and Driving Bill—Order of the Day for the Second Reading read—Amendment of Lord Portman that the Bill be read a Second Time this Day Three Months—Amendment and Original Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn ; and Bill, by leave of the House, withdrawn	496
Australian Colonies—Introduction of Animals—Question of the Earl of Carnarvon	...	498
Bank of Ireland Bill—Bill read 3 ^a and passed	...	500
Bank of Ireland Bill—Protest of Lord Monteagle against the Third Reading	...	500
Duchy of Cornwall (Limitation of Actions) Bill—Amendments Reported	...	501
Union of Benefices Bill—Bill read 3 ^a and passed	...	505
MONDAY, JUNE 18.
Business of the House—Resolution of Lord Redesdale that Bills be not read a Second Time after the 17th of July, except Bills of Aid and Supply	...	550
Cathedral and Collegiate Churches Commission—Question of Lord Lyttelton	...	550
Church Temporalities (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill—House in Committee	...	552
The Ecclesiastical Commissioners Valuation—Question of Lord Portman	...	554
India—European Troops—Motion of the Marquess of Clanricarde for Returns— Motion agreed to	555
Italy—Naples—Rumoured Interference of France—Question of Lord Brougham	...	557
TUESDAY, JUNE 19.
Church Rates Abolition Bill—Order of the Day for the Second Reading read— Amendment of the Duke of Marlborough that the Bill be read a Second Time this Day Six Months—Amendment agreed to by a Majority of 97—Division List	618
THURSDAY, JUNE 21.
Italy—Naples and Sicily—Question of the Marquess of Normanby	...	755
Plea on Indictment Bill—Bill read 2 ^a	...	757
Adulteration of Food or Drink Bill—House in Committee	...	759
FRIDAY, JUNE 22.
Law and Equity Bill—Motion of the Lord Chancellor for a Select Committee— Motion agreed to —Select Committee appointed	834
Employment of English Shipwrights at Cherbourg—Observations	...	843

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

FRIDAY, JUNE 22— continued.		Page
Militia and Constabulary (Ireland)—Motion of the Marquess of Clanricarde for Returns—Motion agreed to	844
MONDAY, JUNE 25.
Slave Trade—Mozambique—Motion of Lord Stratheden for an Address to the Crown in favour of Appointing a Consul at Mozambique— Resolved in the affirmative by a Majority of 5—Division List	908
TUESDAY, JUNE 26.
Ecclesiastical Commission Bill—Bill read 2 ^a	977
Church Temporalities (Ireland) Acts Amendment Bill—Bill read 3 ^a —Bill passed and sent to the Commons	987
Ecclesiastical Courts and Registries (Ireland) Bill—Bill read 3 ^a —Bill passed and sent to the Commons	988
THURSDAY, JUNE 28.
Harbours of Refuge—Motion of the Marquess of Clanricarde for the Appointment of a Select Committee—Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn	1069
China—Conduct of the Colonial Office—Petition for Inquiry— Presentation of Petition by Earl Grey	1082
Law of Evidence further Amendment Bill— Presentation of a Bill by Lord Brougham—Bill read 1 ^a	1084
FRIDAY, JUNE 29.
Trotman's Anchors—Question of the Earl of Hardwicke	1181
Commanders of Packets between Holyhead and Kingstown—Question of Viscount Dungannon	1186
Endowed Charities Bill—Bill read 2 ^a	1188
Breakwaters and Harbours—Motion of the Marquess of Clanricarde for the Appointment of a Select Committee—Motion agreed to —Select Committee appointed	1190
MONDAY, JULY 2.
Education (India)—Exclusion of the Bible from Government Schools—Motion of the Duke of Marlborough that the Exclusion of the Word of God from the course of Education afforded in the Government Colleges and Schools ought to be removed—Motion negatived	1237
TUESDAY, JULY 3.
Berwick-upon-Tweed Election—Her Majesty's Answer to the Address brought up by the Lord Steward (the Earl of St. Germans)	1313
Slave Trade—Consulship at Mozambique—Her Majesty's Answer to the Address brought up by the Lord Steward (the Earl of St. Germans)	1313
Weights and Measures Bill—Order of the Day for the House to be again in Committee read—Amendment of Lord Chelmsford that their Lordships go into Committee on the Bill this Day Three Months—Amendment agreed to —Bill put off for Three Months	1313
Masters and Operatives Bill—Order of the Day for the Second Reading read—Amendment of Lord Ravensworth that the Bill be read a Second Time this Day three Months—Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn —Bill read 2 ^a and referred to a Select Committee	1314
New Zealand Bill—Bill read 2 ^a	1326
THURSDAY, JULY 5.
Italy—General Garibaldi—Question of the Marquess of Normanby	1378

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

FRIDAY, JULY 6.		Page
St. George's-in-the East—Question of Viscount Dungannon	1507
Education (India)— Presentation of Petition by the Bishop of Oxford	1513
New Zealand Bill—House in Committee	1518
MONDAY, JULY 9.
Italy—Explanation of the Marquess of Normanby and Lord Brougham	1608
Naval Discipline Bill—Bill read 2 ^a	1612
Law and Equity Bill—House in Committee	1616
TUESDAY, JULY 10.
Massacre of Christians in Syria—Questions of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe	1647
Tithe Commutation Bill—Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read—Order discharged , and Bill referred to a Select Committee	1656
Railway Cheap Trains, &c., Bill—Bill read 2 ^a	1657
THURSDAY, JULY 12.
India—Prize Money—Question of the Earl of Ellenborough	1742
Jews Act Amendment Bill—House in Committee	1745
Holyhead Harbour of Refuge—Motion of the Earl of Mayo for a Select Committee—Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn	1750
FRIDAY, JULY 13.
Italy—The Roman States—Motion of the Marquess of Normanby for Papers...	1842
Scottish Drainage and Improvement Company Bill—Order of the day for the Third Reading read—Amendment of Lord St. Leonards that the further Debate be adjourned to Friday next—Amendment negotiated by a Majority of 3—Bill read 3 ^a —Bill passed , and sent to the Commons	1843
Galway Harbour Bill—Bill read 3 ^a —Bill passed , and sent to the Commons	1844
MONDAY, JULY 16.
Savoy—Motion of the Marquess of Clanricarde for Papers—Motion agreed to	1925
Ecclesiastical Commission Bill—Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read—Amendment of the Earl of Chichester that the House go into Committee on the Bill this day Three Months—Amendment agreed to —House to be in Committee on this Day Three Months	1944
TUESDAY, JULY 17.
Annuity Tax (Edinburgh, Montrose, &c.) Bill—Bill read 2 ^a	2013
Titles to Land (Scotland) Act (1858) Amendment Bill—Bill read 2 ^a	2015
Conjugal Rights (Scotland) Bill— Presentation of a Bill by the Lord Chancellor—Bill read 1 ^a	2020
THURSDAY, JULY 19.
Labourers' Cottages (Scotland) Bill—House in Committee	2126
Lands Clauses Consolidation Act (1845) Amendment Bill—Bill read 2 ^a	2127
Parliamentary Business—Motion of the Earl of Derby that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into and consider the best mode of carrying on Parliamentary Business—Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn	2129
FRIDAY, JULY 20.
Tithe Commutation Bill—House in Committee	2215
Mines Regulation and Inspection Bill—Bill read 2 ^a	2216
Tramways (Ireland) Bill—Order of the Day for the Second Reading read—Amendment of the Earl of Lucan that the Bill be read a Second Time this Day Six Months—Amendment, by leave of the House, withdrawn —Bill read 2 ^a , and Select Committee appointed	2216

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

II. SUBJECTS OF DEBATE IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

	Page
THURSDAY, JUNE 7.
Smithfield Markets, Streets, and Improvement Bill—Order for Second Reading read—Amendment of Mr. Mackinnon that the Bill be read a Second Time this Day Six Months—Amendment negatived —Bill read 2 ^o ...	19
The Case of Jesse Mumford—Question of Mr. T. Duncombe ...	22
Officers' Chargers—Question of Major Knox ...	23
The Reform Bill—Dissolution of Parliament—Question of Mr. Blake ...	23
Poor Law Rating—Question of Mr. Perry Watlington ...	24
The Scotch and Irish Reform Bills—Question of Mr. Brady ...	25
Representation of the People Bill—Committee—Adjourned Debate—Second Night—Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [4th June]—Motion of Sir J. Fergusson "That the Debate be now Adjourned."—Motion negatived by a Majority of 21—Division List—Question again put—Debate adjourned till Monday next ...	26
Representation of the People (Ireland) Bill—Order for Second Reading read—Motion of Mr. Cardwell that the Order be discharged—Motion agreed to —Order discharged —Bill withdrawn ...	144
Representation of the People (Scotland) Bill—Order for Second Reading read—Motion of the Lord Advocate that the Order be discharged —Motion agreed to —Order discharged —Bill withdrawn ...	144
Wakefield Election—Prosecutions for Bribery—Resolution of Captain Jervis to abandon the Prosecutions—Debate adjourned till To-morrow ...	144
 FRIDAY, JUNE 8.
Clare County Election—Determination of the Committee "That Francis Macnamara Calcutt, Esq., is duly Elected" ...	175
Londonderry City Election—Determination of the Committee "That William M'Cormick, Esq., is duly elected" ...	175
Corrupt Practices Prevention Act—Question of Mr. Hunt ...	175
Exportation of Spanish Corks—Question of Mr. T. S. Duncombe ...	175
The Telegraph to Gibraltar—Question of Colonel Percy Herbert ...	177
Commercial Treaty with France—Question of Mr. Seymour FitzGerald ...	178
Chinese War—Naval Pay—Question of Sir George Pechell ...	182
Indian Civilians Killed during the Mutiny—Question of Mr. Vansittart ...	182
Organization of the Indian Army—Question of Colonel Sykes ...	183
Conveyance of Stores from India to China—Question of Mr. Somes ...	184
The Bengal Army—Rewards to Officers—Question of Mr. Kennard ...	185
Local Army in India—Question of Sir De Lacy Evans ...	186
Sale and Re-purchase of Government Land—Question of Lord William Graham ...	188
The National Defence—Question of Sir Frederic Smith ...	189
Relative Rank of Army Surgeons—Question of Colonel Dickson ...	191
Clerk of the Council—Observations of Viscount Palmerston ...	191
Army Purchase—Question of Captain Stacpoole ...	192
Colonel Sir Justin Shiel—Arrests in Dundalk—Observations of Mr. Whiteside ...	193
Defence of Portsmouth—Observations of Sir Charles Napier ...	196
Destitution in Ireland—Question of Mr. Hennessy ...	197
Wakefield Prosecutions—Question of Captain Jervis ...	201
African Slave Trade—Question of Mr. Cave ...	202
English Shipwrights in French Dockyards—Question of Mr. H. B. Johnstone ...	208
Post Office Administration—Question of Mr. Bowyer ...	211

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	Page
FRIDAY, JUNE 15—continued.
New Houses of Parliament—Question of Colonel Wilson Patten	... 518
The Parks and Charing Cross—Question of Mr. W. Ewart	... 519
Disturbances in New Zealand—Question of Lord Alfred Churchill	... 521
European Army in India—Question of Sir De Lacy Evans	... 528
Harbour of Holyhead—Question of Colonel Dunne	... 531
Army (Medical Officers)—Motion of Colonel Lindsay for an Address—Motion, by leave, withdrawn	... 532
Votes for Disqualified Candidates Bill—Motion of Mr. Butt for Leave to bring in a Bill—Leave given—Bill read 1 ^o	... 537
Selling and Hawking Goods on Sunday Bill—Second Reading deferred till Friday, 29th June	... 539
Tithe Commutation Bill—House in Committee	... 542
Tenure and Improvement of Land (Ireland) Bill—House in Committee	... 544
 MONDAY, JUNE 18.
Berwick-upon-Tweed Election—Answer to Address brought up by Lord Castlerosse, Comptroller of the Household	... 560
Anchors—Question of Viscount Raynham	... 560
Infectious Diseases—Public Carriages—Question of Viscount Raynham	... 560
Public Business—Observations of Viscount Palmerston	... 561
Promotion from the Ranks—Motion of Mr. McEvoy for an Address to Her Majesty—Motion negatived	... 562
Ordnance Survey—Civil Assistants—Observations of Mr. Digby Seymour	... 568
Italy—Foreign Enlistment—The Papal Army—Observations of Mr. E. James	... 571
The Weedon Inquiry—Observations of Colonel Dunne	... 580
Supply—Army Estimates—House in Committee	... 589
Roman Catholic Charities Bill—Order for Consideration, as amended, read—Debate adjourned till To-morrow	... 617
 TUESDAY, JUNE 19.
Tenure and Improvement of Land (Ireland) Bill—House in Committee	... 665
Cavalry Regiments—Question of Mr. Darby Griffith	... 672
Harbours of Refuge—Resolution for the adoption of the necessary measures to carry into effect the recommendations of the Commissioners—Motion agreed to	... 672
Diplomatic Service—Motion of Mr. Grant Duff, "That a Select Committee be appointed to Inquire into the present condition of the Diplomatic Service, and the best means of increasing its Efficiency"—Motion, by leave, withdrawn	... 714
Marine Stores—Motion for Leave to bring in a Bill—Leave given	... 724
South Kensington Museum—Motion of Mr. Lowe, "That a Select Committee be appointed to Inquire and Report what Buildings are necessary for the South Kensington Museum"—Select Committee appointed	... 724
 WEDNESDAY, JUNE 20.
Professional Oaths Abolition Bill—Bill read 2 ^o	... 728
Aggravated Assaults Act Amendment Bill—Order for Committee read—Amendment of Viscount Enfield, "That the Bill be Committed this Day Three Months"—Amendment agreed to —Bill put off for Three Months	... 733
Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act Amendment Bill—Order for Second Reading read—Amendment of Mr. Black, "That the Bill be read a Second Time this Day Three Months"—Amendment agreed to by a Majority of 47—Bill put off for Three Months	... 740
Felony and Misdemeanour Bill—Bill read 2 ^o	... 744
Ecclesiastical Commission, &c., Bill—Second Reading—Adjourned Debate—Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on the Amendment proposed to Question [6th June]—Debate resumed —Debate further adjourned till To-morrow	... 748

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

THURSDAY, JUNE 21.		Page
Petitions—Rules of the House— Presentation of Petition by Mr. Duncombe ...	761	761
The Defences of Portsmouth—Question of Lord William Graham ...	761	761
Low Moor Gun Factory—Question of Sir De Lacy Evans ...	762	762
European Forces (India) Bill—Leave—First Reading—Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [12th June]—Debate resumed —Leave given —Bill read 1 ^o ...	762	762
Inland Bonding Bill—House in Committee ...	815	815
Caledonian and Crinan Canals Bill—Order for Third Reading read—Amendment of Mr. W. Williams, “That the Bill be read a Third Time this Day Three Months”—Amendment negatived by a Majority of 51—Bill read 3 ^o and passed ...	816	816
Roman Catholic Charities Bill—Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [18th June] “That the Bill be now taken into Consideration”—Debate resumed —Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to —Bill re-committed —Committee report Progress; to sit again on Monday next...	820	820
FRIDAY, JUNE 22.
Mines Regulation and Inspection Bill—House in Committee ...	845	845
Proceedings of the House of Lords—Question of Mr. T. S. Duncombe ...	856	856
Transfer of Land—Observations of Mr. Vincent Scully ...	859	859
Annexation of Nice and Savoy to France—Ministerial Policy—Question of Sir Robert Peel ...	860	860
The Army in the United Kingdom—Observations of Colonel Dickson ...	870	870
High Sheriffs for Cities and Boroughs (Ireland)—Observations of Mr. Blake ...	874	874
Savings Banks and Friendly Societies Investments Bill—House in Committee ...	880	880
MONDAY, JUNE 25.
Insolvency and Bankruptcy (Salaries, &c.), Report brought up by Mr. Clive— Debate adjourned till Thursday ...	934	934
Excise and Assessed Taxes Acts—House in Committee ...	947	947
Ecclesiastical Commission, &c., Bill—Second Reading—Adjourned Debate— Third Night—Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [6th June] “That the Bill be now read a Second Time; and which Amendment was that the Bill be read a Second Time this Day Six Months”—Debate resumed —Amendment withdrawn —Bill read 2 ^o ...	954	954
Mines Regulation and Inspection Bill—House in Committee ...	970	970
TUESDAY, JUNE 26.
Tenure and Improvement of Land (Ireland) Bill—House in Committee ...	992	992
Commissions of Patents Offices—Question of Mr. Tite ...	998	998
Soldiers’ Knapsacks—Question of Colonel Lindsay ...	999	999
Irish Appointments—Motion of Mr. Conolly—Objecting to Certain Appoint- ments Made by the Lord Lieutenant “That this House is further of opinion that the incautious and inconsiderate Use of the Prerogative of the Crown is prejudicial to the Public Service”—Motion negatived ...	999	999
Distress in Ireland—Motion of Mr. Hennessy, “That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be Graciously pleased to direct that steps may be taken to relieve the great distress now prevailing in Erris and other parts of Ireland”—Motion negatived by a Majority of 35 ...	1022	1022
Militia Bill—Leave—Motion of Mr. Sidney Herbert for leave to bring in a Bill— Leave given —Bill read 1 ^o ...	1030	1030
Locomotive Bill—House in Committee ...	1045	1045
Sale of Gas Act Amendment (No. 2) Bill—Bill read 2 ^o ...	1050	1050
WEDNESDAY, JUNE 27.
Labourers’ Cottages (Scotland) Bill—House in Committee ...	1050	1050
Bleaching and Dyeing Works Bill—House in Committee ...	1051	1051

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	Page
THURSDAY, JUNE 28.
European Forces (India) Bill—First Night—Order for Second Reading read— Amendment of Mr. Mills “That the Bill be read a Second Time this Day Six Months”—Debate adjourned till To-morrow ...	1086
FRIDAY, JUNE 29.
Tenure and Improvement of Land (Ireland) Bill—House in Committee ...	1190
Game Licences (Scotland)—Question of Mr. Fenwick ...	1200
Landed Estates Court (Ireland)—Question of Captain Stacpoole ...	1200
Volunteer Corps for Ireland—Question of Colonel French ...	1200
Superannuation of Dockyard Labourers—Question of Sir Stafford Northcote ...	1201
European Forces (India) Bill—Question of Colonel Sykes ...	1201
St. George's-in-the-East—Observations of Mr. Kekewich ...	1212
Holyhead Harbour—Question of Mr. Stanley ...	1216
Trotman's Anchors—Question of Mr. Mildmay ...	1217
Supply—Civil Service Estimates—House in Committee ...	1221
Registration of Births, &c., (Scotland) Bill—House in Committee ...	1236
MONDAY, JULY 2.
Tax Bill—The Paper Duty— Presentation of Petition by Mr. Bright ...	1253
European Force in India—Question of Mr. Torrens ...	1254
Annexation of Savoy—Question of Sir Robert Peel ...	1254
European Forces (India) Bill—Second Reading—Adjourned Debate—Second Night — Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment pro- posed to Question [28th June], which Amendment was “That the Bill be read a Second Time this Day Three Months”—Debate resumed —Amendment negatived by a Majority of 229—Bill read 2 ^o ...	1255
Supply—Resolutions reported ...	1309
Poor Law Board Continuance Bill—Bill read 2 ^o ...	1310
TUESDAY, JULY 3.
Mines Regulation and Inspection Bill—House in Committee ...	1330
Tenure and Improvement of Land (Ireland) Bill—House in Committee ...	1334
Cadets at Sandhurst—Question of General Buckley ...	1335
Commissions in Yeomanry, Militia, and Volunteer Corps — Question of Mr. Cayley ...	1335
Army (General Officers)—Motion of Colonel Lindsay for a Select Committee— Motion agreed to by a Majority of 14 ...	1336
Cadetships (Navy)—Motion of Captain Esmonde for a Select Committee— Motion negatived by a Majority of 57—House counted out ...	1341
WEDNESDAY, JULY 4.
Privileges of the House—Notice of Motion by Mr. T. S. Duncombe ...	1345
Church Rates Law Amendment Bill—Order for Second Reading read—Order discharged —Bill withdrawn ...	1346
Highways Bill—Order for Second Reading read—Amendment of Mr. Hodgkinson “That the Bill be read a Second Time this Day Three Months”—Amendment negatived by a Majority of 83—Bill read 2 ^o ...	1348
Dealers in Marine Stores Bill—House in Committee ...	1372
THURSDAY, JULY 5.
Island of St. Juan—Question of Mr. W. Williams ...	1381
Italy—Naples and Sicily—Question of Colonel Stuart ...	1381
Tax Bills—The Resolutions—Question of Lord Fermoy ...	1383
Tax Bills—Resolutions of Viscount Palmerston — Debate adjourned till To- morrow ...	1383

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

FRIDAY, JULY 6.		Page
Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh) Bill—House in Committee...	...	1520
Tax Bills— Presentation of a Petition by Mr. T. S. Duncombe...	...	1524
Inland Revenue Officers—Question of Mr. Norris	...	1525
Scottish Schoolmasters—Question of Mr. H. Baillie	...	1526
Officers of Customs and Excise—Question of Mr. Blake	...	1526
Atrocities in Sicily—Question of Mr. H. B. Sheridan	...	1527
Bankruptcy Bill—Question of Mr. Crawford	...	1527
Reserve Fund—Question of Lord Hotham	...	1527
Enlistment of Apprentices—Case of John Bishop—Question of Mr. Humberston	...	1528
Outrage in Dublin—Question of Sir Edward Grogan	...	1530
Poor Relief (Ireland) Bill—Question of Captain Esmonde	...	1530
Prize Money in India—Question of Colonel Dunne	...	1531
Appointment of Mr. Keogh—Observations of Mr. M'Evoy	...	1533
Volunteer Corps for Ireland—Question of Captain O'Connell	...	1535
Tax Bills—Resolution—Question of Lord Fermoy	...	1536
Tax Bills—Resolutions—Adjourned Debate—Second Night—Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [5th July]—Debate resumed —Resolutions agreed to	...	1536
Maynooth College—Resolution—House in Committee	...	1606
MONDAY, JULY 9.
Houses of Refuge—Question of Mr. W. Ewart	...	1617
Kensington Gardens—Question of Sir John Shelley	...	1618
Bankruptcy and Insolvency (Salaries, &c.)—Resolutions—Adjourned Debate—Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [25th June]—Debate resumed —Resolutions agreed to	...	1618
Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill—House in Committee	...	1624
TUESDAY, JULY 10.
Nuisances Removal and Diseases Prevention Bill—Committee—Adjourned Debate—Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [14th June]	...	1658
“That the Bill be now taken into Consideration” read, and discharged —Bill re-committed —Bill reported , as amended, to be considered To-morrow	...	1658
Savings Banks and Friendly Societies Investment Bill—House in Committee	...	1661
The Punishment of Whipping—Question of Viscount Raynham	...	1663
Kensington Gardens—Question of Mr. Edwin James	...	1664
Newfoundland Fisheries—Question of Mr. A. Mills	...	1665
Italy—Sardinia and Naples—Question of Mr. Darby Griffith	...	1666
Annexation of Savoy to France—Question of Mr. Darby Griffith	...	1666
The Whitworth Gun—Question of Mr. Dodson	...	1667
Navy (China)—Motion of Mr. Baillie Cochrane for “An Address to Her Majesty to place the Officers, Marines, and Seamen of the Fleet serving in China on the same footing as her Majesty’s Troops with respect to extra pay and allowances”—Motion withdrawn	...	1667
Votes at Elections Bill—Motion of Mr. Wyld for Leave to bring in a Bill—Leave given —Bill read 1 ^o	...	1674
Gas (Metropolis) Bill—House in Committee	...	1676
Roman Catholic Charities Bill—House in Committee	...	1689
WEDNESDAY, JULY 11.
Census (England) Bill—House in Committee	...	1695
Census (Ireland) Bill—House in Committee	...	1741
THURSDAY, JULY 12.
Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill—House in Committee	...	1761
The Galway Contract—Question of Mr. Corry	...	1766

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

THURSDAY, JULY 12— continued.	Page
Office of Postmaster General—Question of Sir George Bowyer ...	1769
The Lebanon Massacres—Observations of Sir Charles Napier ...	1769
The Nelson Monument—Question of Admiral Walcott ...	1775
Italy—Sardinia and Sicily—Motion of Sir Robert Peel for Papers—Motion negatived ...	1776
Paper Duty Repeal Bill—Observations of Sir John Trelawny ...	1806
The China Vote—Observations of Sir Henry Willoughby ...	1808
Supply—Operations in China—House in Committee ...	1812
Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act (1856) Amendment Bill—Motion of Mr. Cardwell for leave to bring in a Bill—Leave given —Bill read 1 ^o ...	1839

FRIDAY, JULY 13.
Tenure and Improvement of Land (Ireland) Bill—Bill Considered as amended
—Further consideration adjourned till this day ...	1847
Senior Naval Lieutenants—Question of Mr. Dunn ...	1850
Case of Dr. Guydir—Question of Colonel Greville ...	1851
Inch Keith—Question of Mr. Black ...	1852
Switzerland and France—The Congress—Question of Mr. Kinglake ...	1852
Volunteers in Ireland—Observations of Mr. Brady ...	1858
The Paper Duty—Observations of Mr. Whalley ...	1859
Outrage in Tyrone—Question of Mr. Maguire ...	1862
Marriage in the Preventive Service (Scotland)—Question of Mr. Black ...	1865
The Galway Packet Contract—Question of Sir Stafford Northcote ...	1865
Outrage in Tyrone—Observations of Lord Claud Hamilton ...	1878
War with China—Motion of Mr. Baillie Cochrane—Motion negatived ...	1879
Supply—China War—House in Committee ...	1887
Poor Law Board Continuance Bill—House in Committee ...	1982

MONDAY, JULY 16.
Vaccine Board—Question of Mr. Brady ...	1945
Deanery of York—Question of Mr. Kinnaird ...	1946
Foreshore at Pembroke Dock—Question of Lord William Graham ...	1946
The Bronze Coinage—Question of Mr. Hopwood ...	1947
Supply—The China War—Resolution reported —Resolution agreed to ...	1947
Late Sittings of the House—Resolution of Mr. Newdegate negatived ...	1953
Ways and Means—Financial Statement— Considered in Committee—Resolutions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer agreed to —Resolutions to be reported To-morrow ...	1963
Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill—House in Committee ...	1990
Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences (Ireland) Bill—Order for Committee read—Amendment of Mr. Hennessy “That the House should resolve itself into Committee this Day Three Months”—Amendment negatived —House in Committee ...	2008

TUESDAY, JULY 17.
Education Bill—Order for Second Reading read—Amendment of Mr. Pease that the Bill be read a Second Time this Day Three Months—Amendment agreed to by a Majority of 71—Bill put off for Three Months ...	2021
The Tenpenny Income Tax—Question of Mr. Whalley ...	2034
Paper Duties Repeal Bill—Question of Lord Fermoy ...	2035
Hostilities in New Zealand—Question of Mr. Adderley ...	2035
National Education (Ireland)—Motion of Mr. Butt for an Address negatived by a Majority of 134 ...	2036
Paper Duties Repeal Bill—Resolution of Lord Fermoy negatived by a Majority of 39 ...	2078

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	Page
TUESDAY, JULY 17—continued.
Volunteers (Ireland)—Motion of Colonel French for leave to bring in a Bill—Motion of Colonel Greville that the House do now Adjourn agreed to by a
Majority of 33	2106
WEDNESDAY, JULY 18.
Coroner's (No. 3) Bill—Bill read 2 ^o	2110
Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment (No. 2) Bill—Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [11th July]
—Debate resumed —House in Committee	2117
Ways and Means—Inland Promissory Notes—House in Committee	2125
THURSDAY, JULY 19.
Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Bill—House in Committee	2151
Peace Preservation Act (Ireland) (1856) Amendment Bill—Question of Sir
William Verner	2155
Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill—House in Committee	2156
Public Business—Observations and Explanations	2167
Greenwich Hospital—Motion of Sir Charles Napier that the Report of the Commission on Greenwich Hospital should be taken into immediate Consideration —Motion negatived	2189
Supply—Navy Estimates—House in Committee	2203
London Corporation Bill—Order for resuming Adjourned Debate on Committee
[24th April] read, and discharged —Bill withdrawn	2215
FRIDAY, JULY 20.
Savings Banks and Friendly Societies Investments Bill—House in Committee...	2220
Rifled Muskets—Question of Mr. Hussey Vivian	2227
District Probate Registrars—Question of Mr. Hadfield	2227
Bonding Ports—Question of Mr. Hadfield	2228
Roman Catholics in the Navy—Question of Mr. Bellew	2229
The Disturbances in Syria—Question of Sir James Fergusson	2229
Personal Explanations—Sir Charles Wood and Mr. Horsman	2230
Kensington Gardens—Observations of Mr. Edwin James	2247
The Paper Duties—Question of Mr. Puller	2257
The Printing of the Bible—Question of Mr. Baines	2259
Party Banners in Ireland—Question of Mr. Cogan	2262

III. NEW MEMBERS SWORN.

THURSDAY, JUNE 28.

Belfast.—Samuel Gibson Getty, Esq., v. Richard Davison, Esq., Chiltern Hundreds.

TUESDAY, JULY 17.

Brighton.—James White, Esq., v. Rear Admiral Sir George Richard Brooke Pechell, Bart.—Deceased.

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

IN THE

SECOND SESSION OF THE EIGHTEENTH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND
APPOINTED TO MEET 31 MAY, 1859, AND THENCE CONTINUED TILL 24 JANUARY, 1860, IN THE TWENTY-THIRD YEAR OF THE REIGN OF

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

FOURTH VOLUME OF THE SESSION.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, June 7, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^a Endowed Charities.
2^a Sir John Barnard's Act, &c., Repeal.
3^a Trustees, Mortgages, &c.

ENDOWED CHARITIES.

Bill presented. Read 1^a.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR presented a Bill to amend the Law relating to the Administration of Endowed Charities, which he said had for its object to enable the Charity Commissioners to take cognizance of a certain class of cases without applying to the Court of Chancery.

LORD CRANWORTH said, that the country owed much to the Commissioners, whose useful services were manifested in not the least striking manner in the Bill then before their Lordships.

LORD BROUGHAM concurred in these remarks, and said that few Acts had exercised so important or beneficial an influence on the times and country.

Bill read 1^a.

COURT OF PROBATE AND DIVORCE.

RETURNS MOVED FOR.

LORD BROUGHAM moved for a Return of the Revenue of the Court of Probate and Divorce, from Fees or otherwise. The noble and learned Lord said, that in his opinion the constitution of this Court was most unsatisfactory. In saying so he had not the slightest intention to cast any reflection on the distinguished Judge who presided over that Court with so much ability and integrity; but he thought the Court, considering its vast importance, ought to be constituted on a different scale, and with a more enlarged basis. In other Courts cases occasionally arose that were painful to the feelings of all the parties concerned, and decided personal questions of extreme importance; but in this Court, every case, so far as regarded divorce, had a painful interest and affected the personal condition of parties. Nothing could possibly exceed the importance of a jurisdiction which gave the Judge power to decree the separation of married persons or the dissolution of the marriage tie; and, in addition, the disposal of important questions affecting property, and he had a positive objection to vesting in a single Judge the power of dissolving any marriage. In his opinion, the Divorce Court ought to consist of three Judges—a Chief Judge of Common Law, an Equity Judge, and a Judge of the Consistorial Court. A Court composed of these three Judges would form a competent tribunal to try all the important cases of separation, of dissolution of marriage, and of property that could come before them. There would be no increase of expenditure by an improvement of the Court, except in the most important branch—the Judges. To meet this additional expense there was a surplus of £12,000 or £13,000 a year arising from the fees of the Probate Court, now paid into the Consolidated Fund; but, even if there were no such surplus, financial considerations ought not to stand in the way of enlarging the basis of the Court, and making it fit to be entrusted with a jurisdiction of this important character.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he quite agreed with his noble and learned Friend that expense ought to be no obstacle whatever to obtaining the proper constitution of a Court of so important a character as the Court of Divorce. But he thought Parliament had acted wisely in proceeding cautiously in constituting the Court; and hitherto the business of the Court had been transacted satisfactorily. He would also remind his noble and learned friend that great objection was felt to multiplying Judges without urgent necessity.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE was understood to refer to a case about to come before the Court in which the parties were natives of Ireland, but in which the marriage was solemnized in this country. He wished to know whether the jurisdiction of the Court extended to such a case.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR replied, that the question would depend altogether upon whether they were domiciled in Ireland or England. If they were domiciled in Ireland and Ireland alone, then the Court had no jurisdiction; but if in England it had.

Motion agreed to.

Returns ordered to be laid before the House.

Lord Brougham

SIR JOHN BARNARD'S ACT, &c.

REPEAL BILL.

SECOND READING.

EARL GRANVILLE, in moving the second reading of this Bill said, he did not anticipate any opposition in that House. The Act which it proposed to repeal had been found to be inoperative for the purposes for which it was passed, and when it did act it had an injurious effect.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^a accordingly; and committed to a Committee of the Whole House tomorrow.

VOTE BY BALLOT AND MANHOOD SUFFRAGE—RESOLUTIONS.

LORD TEYNHAM having presented petitions in favour of Manhood suffrage and Vote by Ballot, moved the Resolutions of which he had given notice, as follows:

“That this House, greatly desiring the Settlement of the Question of Parliamentary Reform, for the satisfaction of Men's Minds, for the Sake of the Peace of the Country, and that the Business of Parliament may be proceeded with without let, is willing to give its most careful Consideration to the Prayer of the Petitions which have been presented to it in favour of Manhood Suffrage and Vote by Ballot; this being the broadest Basis for the Elective Franchise which has been presented to it by Petition:

“That this House hopes to be able to discern them who for any Reason ought not to be allowed a Vote, and to point out the Means whereby improper Persons may be deprived of the Franchise after it is legally possessed; so that, on the one hand, no Man shall be left without the Franchise against whom no just or sufficient Reason for his Disfranchisement can be assigned; and, on the other hand, no Man shall be put on the List of Voters, or continued thereon, against whom just Grounds of Disfranchisement can be alleged and proved:

“That this House is, therefore, prepared to recommend such Alterations in the Criminal, Vagrant, and Poor Laws as shall appear necessary to cut off from the Register of Voters all improper Persons:

“In this Way the House hopes to grant the Spirit of the Prayer of its Petitioners for Manhood Suffrage and Vote by Ballot, not only without Detriment to the common Weal but with great Advantage to the same.”

The noble Lord said, that besides the few petitions he then had the honour to present to their Lordships, in an earlier part of the Session he had presented very numerous petitions, principally from Northumberland and Durham, in favour of Universal Suffrage and Vote by Ballot, and from other parts of the country in favour of the Ballot alone, and, therefore when it was said that the people generally were indifferent to their political rights, he thought these petitions with their numerous signatures afforded sufficient proof that a large portion at least of the unrepresented classes were greatly interested in the question. Deeply conscious of his own weakness and incompetence to perform the task he had undertaken, he had only ventured to address their Lordships, under shelter of the petitions of the people; but at the same time he must admit that he fully adopted their statements, and in the remarks which he was about to address to their Lordships, he wished it to be understood that he fully approved in his conscience the truth and justice of the cause he was advocating. In former days there were Colonies of this country which it pleased Parliament, in its wisdom, to endeavour to tax. A voice, that of Mr. Otis, was raised in their behalf; and President Adams remarked, "I do say that Mr. Otis' oration against writs of assistance breathed into this nation the breath of life." It was like the lightning. It came unexpectedly. It did its work, the fruit of which remains to the present day, whilst it itself is unremembered. Thus revived, the people of these Colonies—not of one or of some, but of all thirteen together—rose in opposition to that attempt, and, after a long struggle, they secured their independence. They were told that in like manner there was a very large number of unrepresented persons in the United Kingdom who were in the same position, and who, notwithstanding all that had been said and done, were like so many dead men's bones. But the experience of the United States bade him hope better things concerning them, namely, that the same views would breathe life into these dead men's bones. In the contest for truth, in the struggle for justice, almost uniformly the battle, in the first instance, was of the weak against the strong—eventually the weak triumphed. Now the unrepresented in England were weak—they were poor—their claims were mocked; yet the experience of history led to the belief that better hopes might not in vain be entertained for them. Mr. Otis said, "I have waited years in hopes to see some one friend of the Colonies pleading in public for them. I have waited in vain." He had in like manner ventured to undertake the cause of the unrepresented in their Lordships' House, feeling that if he did not, it was not likely that another would take his place. The sum and substance of his Motion was this—that their Lordships would be willing to give their most careful consideration to the prayer of the petitioners in favour of universal suffrage and vote by ballot; and if their Lordships thought fit, that a Select Committee or Royal Commission might be appointed to inquire into what was necessary to be done in order that the prayer of the petitions might be granted. In the eloquent speech recently made by Mr. Gladstone at Edinburgh, he said, "I think it is eminently British to admit the voice of the governed in the choice of governors." This is an eulogium of universal suffrage. Therefore, in that sentiment he fully agreed, and at the same time he congratulated the University of Edinburgh on the choice which they had made by the selection of so able and eloquent a man as Mr. Gladstone to be their Rector. The petitions which he had presented had in many instances been signed only by the chairman presiding at public meetings, who thus represented the views of hundreds and thousands of persons. If they thought the views of the petitioners were transient, their feelings evanescent, or that they would ever be satisfied till the prayer of their petitions was heard, the House knew not the stuff of which the Tyne-side men and Cornish miners were made; and, in the words of Burke, he would say, "Reflect how you ought to govern a people who think they ought to be free, and think they are not." Their Lordships would do well to weigh the thoughts of men who are disfranchised, and who, having petitioned for their freedom, should their petitions be disregarded, have to fear lest their disfranchisement be perpetual. What such may brood over is well put by Otis. He said:—

"The very act of taxing exercised over those who are not represented appears to me to be depriving them of one of their most essential rights as freemen; and, if continued, seems to be in effect an entire disfranchisement of every civil right. For what one civil right is worth a rush after a man's property is subject to be taken from him at pleasure, without his consent? If a man is not his own assessor in person, or by deputy, his liberty is gone, or lies entirely at the mercy of others."

Again, a common idea seemed to prevail that the unrepresented were—if he might use the expression—represented by those who were represented, and that Parliament had become the trustee for a majority of the people. On this subject he would venture to remind their Lordships of what had been said by Burke: "Perhaps we might wish the Colonists [say the non-electors] to be persuaded that their liberty is more secure when held in trust for them by us (as their guardians during a perpetual minority) than with any part of it in their own hands." That such a wish is unavailing, and what would be the result of entertaining it, their Lordships may learn by comparing the circumstances under which they were then met and those under which Edmund Burke addressed the other House of Parliament. At that time there were some hundred thousand descendants of the people of this country living beyond the sea, whom it was endeavouring to tax. The unrepresented of the people of England now are more numerous, mingled at home with those who are represented, and daily seeing the coat of many colours which you have placed on your Joseph, who lives in a ten-pound house. These, unrepresented, you yet tax. The grievances of the Colonists and of your petitioners are one and the same. The men do not differ. The Colonists were Britons: so are these. These think and feel as those thought and felt. In method of action, through difference of circumstances, the twain may not be one; but in the effect of action no dissimilarity will be found, taxation without representation ceasing to exist. The method of conciliation which ought to have been pursued was that, as you could not give representation, you should desist from taxing. Now, you cannot cease to tax; it is, therefore, your duty to give representation, to quell by kindness and by justice the existing, the growing, discontent. The refusal of the demand of your petitioners might be attended with even more fatal consequences than was the disregard of the appeals and warnings of that great orator. He therefore earnestly implored their Lordships to listen to their plea while it was yet time. He begged to direct their attention to the way in which universal suffrage had been presented to the human mind. In every age and time the greatest truths had been taught by means of fables. A good fable is like the sun. It is capable of illuminating all mankind in every age; and their Lordships remembered the fable of the trees who met to choose a king, and when the olive and the vine were asked to reign, they refused. Finally, as they well knew, the choice fell upon the bramble. Here was universal suffrage, and the fable owes its origin to the fact of a king being so elected. "All the men of Shechem gathered together, and all the house of Millo, and went and made Abimelech king." Next to the Sacred writings, he might refer to Shakspeare, and the language put into the mouth of Brutus in Julius Cæsar would occur to their Lordships' recollection—

Lord Teynham

"What means this shouting?
I do fear the people choose Cæsar for their king!"

The fear now, however, would be, not that Cæsar were chosen, but that the suffrage was in the people's hands. Again, how small is the difference between the philosophy of nature, expressed in fables, and that of the schools, set forth in learned terms? They are alike derived from observation. What say the thoughtful of universal suffrage? An eloquent Member of the other House of Parliament lately, in his speech on the Reform Bill, recognized the abstract right of the people to a vote; but he treated that right as a thing of nought. Now, we had not known an abstract quality unless we had first become acquainted with it when it was not abstract. For an abstract quality to be, there must be something having the quality in it. Thus, for whiteness to be, there must be snow, or the snowdrop, or somewhat else. So, for an abstract right to be, there must be a man having the right in him. How came it to be in him? The answer is, it is his birthright; and the preamble of 12 & 13 Will. III., c. 2, claims it for him, saying—"Whereas the laws of England are the birthright of the people thereof." Now, since this abstract right has been lightly treated, since they who set it aside overlook that they are unjust, for an abstract right is a real right; and since they perceive not their want of wisdom—for their decision will be appealed against, and eventually with effect—it is necessary to notice that though an abstract quality often, perhaps, may be evanescent, as is the case with colour, yet it is not so with an abstract right. It is a man's throughout his life; it is his successors' from generation to generation. Thus our fathers thought at the time of the Revolution, for we read in 1 William & Mary, c. 2, s. 2, which is an Act declaring the rights and liberties of the subject, that all and singular the rights and liberties then asserted and claimed were the true, ancient, and indubitable rights and liberties of the people of this kingdom. It being then acknowledge that a vote for a Member of Parliament is an Englishman's abstract right, it is his legal right at the present day; and, ere I finish, having first shown more fully that it is his right, it will be my duty to point out how he may plead, or assert his birthright—the right which he himself inherits, and which it is his duty to hand down to his children after him. From the abstract right to a vote he would pass to the analogical reasoning which sustains the doctrine of universal suffrage. Whenever several States have been forming, or have formed, a political union, each State has had a vote. In such cases we see universal suffrage. In the Helvetic Confederacy each canton sent two deputies to the General Assemblies, and each canton and associate State had a voice and a vote. This is set forth in the arms of the Confederacy, which were a medal, with thirteen shields for the several States, filling up the space just within its rim; the medal having also an inner circle, within the rim of which six shields containing the arms of the most important associate States were placed. In the Dutch Republic the voting was not by hands, but by States. Some States had more representatives at the Assembly than others; but each State had one vote alone. Here again is universal suffrage. The arms of the Dutch Republic were a bundle of arrows, with the legend, "Concordiâ res parvæ crescunt: discordiâ maximæ dilabuntur." The stars and stripes of the United States proclaim, analogically, universal suffrage throughout the world. In confirmation of his argument from analogy, he would draw their Lordships' attention to a remarkable passage in the history of the contest for their liberties so successfully carried on by our North American Colonies. When they declared their independence they consisted of thirteen States. But it so happened that at the second Congress, met at Philadelphia on the 27th of May, 1775, the delegates of twelve States only were present. At that Congress they began to tax their Union to raise an income to defray the expenses of the war. Bills of credit were issued to the amount of three millions of milled Spanish dollars, and the twelve united Colonies were pledged for their redemption. So scrupulous were they not to violate the principle for which they were contending, they would not pledge the credit of the colony whose representative was not there to vote. He now came to universal suffrage as it existed in the Church of God. The judicious Hooker, in his great work on the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity, said, that "the natural subject of power to make laws civil is the commonwealth, so we affirm that in like congruity the true original subject of power also to make church laws is the entire body of that Church for which they are made. Equals could not impose laws or statutes upon their equals." Nevertheless, in England, where all men were equal before the law, the represented took upon themselves to impose laws upon the unrepresented, which Hooker said they could not do. Archbishop Whitgift, in his answer to the Admonition in 1572, admitted that in the Apostolical times, and down even to the times of Cyprian, the people had a voice in the appointment of their ministers, and that they sometimes made a right good choice; and, quoting Ambrose, with reference to the election of Eusebius, he adds—"He worthily proved a notable man, whom the whole Church elected; he was rightly thought to be chosen by God's appointment, whom every man desired." Thus the fear of universal suffrage is neither founded on the experience nor on the opinion of the Church of God. If we now search the world's history to note the opinions of communities asserting for the first time, or anew, their liberties, and seeking to establish them, we shall find that among them every man had his duty to perform, and no one was excluded from the common privileges of the State. If the question of suffrage arose, it was universal. The oldest document of the Swiss Confederacy is dated the beginning of August, 1291. This is its proclamation:—

"Know all men that we, the people of the valley of Uri, of the community of Schwitz, and of the mountains of Underwalden, seeing the dangers of the times, have solemnly agreed and bound ourselves by oath to aid and defend each other, with all our might and main, with our lives and property, both within and beyond our boundaries, each at his own expense, and against every enemy whatever who shall attempt to molest us, either singly or collectively."

Here each was self-taxed; and here we have proof that it is a libel to assert that men who seek to attain universal liberty are unwilling to bear their share of the expense. At a first nocturnal meeting to oppose the House of Hapsburg, held in 1307, thirty-three patriots resolved that the freedom they had inherited from their forefathers they were determined to assert, and to hand down to their posterity untainted and undiminished. Three of them, Werner, Walter, and Arnold, held up their hands to Heaven, and in the name of the Almighty, who has created man to an inalienable degree of freedom, swore, jointly and strenuously, to defend that freedom. Thus we learn that they who know what liberty is, and are striving for its enjoyment, consider that man cannot alienate it voluntarily, so that his children shall not inherit it, nor allow it to be wrested from him, so that it should cease to be. At Uri each male of the age of sixteen had his suffrage. Mr. Gladstone, in the speech already noticed, added that it was eminently British to train men for the discharge of manly duties by letting them begin their exercise betimes. Thus the Swiss father, whose son stood by him, rifle in hand, when he was contesting with the enemies of the liberties of his country, did not disallow him his place in the public assemblies of his people. The lad who fought with his father, with his father had a vote. In the Grison country, in elections and in all public deliberations, every male of a stated age had a vote. The history of the Dutch Republic in a remarkable manner asserts that every freeman has his duty to perform; and so far as the question of supply was concerned, affords proof that it was judged just that taxation and representation should be strictly co-extensive. By the 8th Art of the Union of Utrecht, January 23, 1579, it was ordered that all the inhabitants between the ages of eighteen and sixty should be enrolled for the defence of the country; and so carefully and firmly was it held that every one who had his duty to perform had also his liberty to enjoy, that on the 24th of July, 1581, the States proclaimed every inhabitant absolved from allegiance to the intruder on his country, while at the same time, in the name of the population, they swore fidelity to the Prince of Orange. For the fiscal example referred to, we must go back to the Congress at Ghent, at the first meeting of the States of the Netherlands in 1477, where it was resolved that cities are not to be compelled to contribute to requests which they have not voted. The history of the Colony of Massachusetts affords an instance of universal suffrage in a peculiar form. At first considered a Christian State, every member of the Church was a freeman, and every freeman had a vote. In 1631 others tried for a vote, but they were overruled. But at a general court for elections in 1634, twenty-four of the principal inhabitants appeared as the representatives of the great body of freemen, and, before they proceeded to the election of magistrates, the people asserted their right to a greater share in the Government than had hitherto been allowed them. In France, although revolutions were frequent, there were certain principles on which the people, whenever they obtained their liberty, invariably insisted. Thus, the Moniteur of March the 5th, 1848, published: "The Provisionary Government of the Republic decrees, Art. 6—'All Frenchmen of twenty-one years of age are electors.'" And the recent events in Sicily confirm all this reasoning. One of the proclamations runs—"Sicilians! to arms all of you! Sicily shall once more teach the world how a country can be freed from its oppressors by the powerful will of a united people." One is not singular, then, in supposing that these lessons of the battling of people for freedom are to be used for their instruction whose liberties are more or less improperly curtailed. Amongst these, universal suffrage always found a place. Garibaldi, in his address to the Romans, called on them all to arm, and he signed his name, "G. Garibaldi, General of the Romans, appointed by a Government elected by universal suffrage." Well done, universal suffrage! And the Constitutional Defence Committee, now sitting in Parliament Street, could not with reference to the present condition of the House of Commons address itself to the electors. Its language is, "Fellow Countrymen." He would now call their Lordships' attention to what had been the practice in England for many years with regard to the suffrage. In the 28th of Edward I. he read that "the King had granted unto his people that they should have an election of their sheriff in every shire." That involved universal suffrage. Then by the 7th of Henry IV. it was enacted that "proclamation should be made in the full county of the day and place of holding a Parliament, and that all who might be there should attend to the election of their knights for the Parliament, and that in the full county they should proceed to the election freely and indifferently, notwithstanding any request or commandment to the contrary." Though there were limits in the boroughs at this period, universal suffrage prevailed in the counties, in proof of which he might quote the preamble to a statute of Henry VI., which stated that "elections had been made by a great and excessive number of people dwelling within the counties, and who for the most part were people of small substance, and of no value, every one of whom pretended to have a voice equivalent to the most worthy knights and esquires;" and then the 40s. freehold qualification was enacted, and in proof that it was then intended to forge a yoke for the people, and to feel sure that it was on their necks and held them down, it is to be noted that the 23rd of Henry VI. c. 14, enacted, that no man who was a yeoman or under could be elected. Now, he contended that an Act of Parliament might be void ab initio; Parliament might exceed its duty, and pass Acts which were not legal. On this point he would give authorities, and the first he should quote was an American authority, Clinton's Digest of Decisions, in which there was this passage:—

Lord Teynham

"The Legislature is not supreme; it is only one of the organs of the absolute sovereignty which resides in the whole body of the people, and when it steps beyond that boundary, its acts, like those of the most humble magistrate who transcends his jurisdiction, are utterly void."

If that were so, by what authority had the franchise been taken away from a vast majority of the people? Such an Act of Parliament was void ab initio.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he could not allow it to be stated that an Act of the Legislature which had received the Royal Assent had not the full force of law. The American authority the noble Lord quoted could have no import in this country.

LORD TEYNHAM said, he would quote an English authority, and that was Lord Coke, who said—

"In many cases the common law will control Acts of Parliament, and adjudge them to be utterly void; as when an Act of Parliament is against common right and reason, the common law shall control it."

Now, he asked, if legislation could go beyond its boundaries, was legislation with regard to the franchise one of those occasions? He must again fall back upon American authority. In the seventh article of the Constitution of the State of New York it was provided that no one should be deprived of his franchise and privileges but in accordance with the common law, which Mr. Justice Bronson interprets to mean that no member of the State shall be disfranchised or deprived of any of his rights or privileges, unless the matter shall be adjudged against him upon trial heard according to the course of common law. It cannot be done by mere legislation; and Justice Story said fundamental principles seemed to require that the right of personal liberty and private property should be held sacred, at least, no Court of justice in this country would be warranted in assuming that the power to violate and disregard them—a power so repugnant to the common principles of justice and civil liberty—lurked under any general grant of legislative authority, or ought to be implied from any general expression of the will of the people. The people ought not to be presumed to part with rights so vital to their security and well-being without very strong and direct expressions of such an intention. Parliament, however, acted without any expression of the will of the people in taking away their franchise, and he contended that Parliament exceeded its duty in the time of Henry VI., when it took away the right of the people to vote in counties. A stream cannot control the springs from which it came. Children are shameful who rise up against their parents. So Parliament in the time of Henry VI. erred when it abused many of the electors of its county Members and acted wickedly in depriving them of their votes. It was guilty of parricide. He thought the people should set forth in their petitions that they gave no authority to Parliament to deprive them of their votes, and they should ask that that and the other Acts which hung upon it should be repealed. There was an Appeal from Parliament to the common law, and he thought the unenfranchised should choose an irreproachable man living in a county, and on his behalf plead in a court of common law to have his name put upon the rolls of Parliament in spite of the statute of Henry VI. There were two occasions in our history whereon our forefathers overruled the written law. The first Parliament of King Charles II. passed an Act declaring the Parliament then sitting a lawful Parliament, notwithstanding any want of writs, or other defect; and in the first convention of William and Mary also passed an Act to the like effect. In an analogous manner, if the electors and non-electors should fail in their petitions and fail in their application to the courts of common law, were to choose their own representatives, and those representatives assembled at Westminster and called themselves the Commons House of Parliament, he questioned very much whether it would not in deed and in truth be the Commons House of Parliament; and it might be that, thus, not in two instances, but in three, it might be read by their children hereafter that a Parliament, summoned not by ordinary writ, met at Westminster, and determined itself to be the Parliament then and there. His notice of Motion referred to the practical manner in which the question ought to be dealt with. He thought they ought not to give, as in France, the vote to persons in the army and the navy, nor should it be granted to criminals, or idle paupers, or vagrants. Before leaving the question of the suffrage he would refer to an opinion that at least direct taxation and representation should go hand in hand, given by a Judge by no means friendly to popular rights. James the I. having claimed a duty on imported currants, a merchant, named John Bates, refused to pay it. An information was laid against him in the Exchequer, and Chief Baron Flemming held that "the imposition is properly upon currants and for them, and is not upon the defendant, nor his goods, who is a merchant, for upon him no imposition shall be, but by Parliament." He would not detain their Lordships long on the question of the Ballot, but he was bound to refer to it as it was part of his Motion. The Ballot was used in certain cases by the House of Commons in the reign of Queen Anne, and it is instructive and appropriate to the subject to survey the House that employed it. There was a general election in 1710. The influence of the mob was in a particular manner remarkable in the election for the City of Westminster, when Mr. Medlicot and Mr. Cross being set up by the Church party, some of those who offered to give their votes for their competitors, General Stanhope and Sir Henry Dutton Colt, were knocked down and sorely wounded, which obliged many of their party to return home without polling, whereby the first two candidates had a vast majority. In a similar manner the Church party carried the election for the City of London. In consequence, a Bill was brought into the Commons to prevent bribery, but it was lost on the question that the Bill do pass. This was the Parliament that passed the Bill fixing a qualification for Members of Parliament, doubtless hereafter to free some of the existing Members from their late competitors; and it had the effrontery to call the Bill, an Act for securing the freedom of Parliaments. On the day they threw out the Bribery Bill, the Commons proceeded to the choice of Commissioners to examine the value of lands, and other interests granted to the Crown, &c., and for the protection of its own members the votes were taken by Ballot. In the democratic cantons of Switzerland the votes were openly given; but in the aristocratic canton of Berne it was sometimes otherwise. By a succession of lot and Ballot the candidates or first-chosen men were reduced to two, and by Ballot of the whole assembly one of them was elected. In the reign of Queen Elizabeth the Ballot was employed by the Presbyterians of Northamptonshire, who were by no means a cowardly set of people. The manner of voting for a Moderator in the classes is thus described in Bancroft's Dangerous Practices. "Then he, that conceived the prayer, sitteth alone in scrutinie, and every one giveth his voice secretly to him." Then how could it be said to be un-English, when it was still resorted to in the reign of Queen Victoria by our fellow-Englishmen the colonists of Australia? Many, on this subject, spake of Englishmen, as though they were not men, and would not protect themselves as others did. We are thus reminded of how the people put Henry the V. without the pale of our common nature, and of how they were reproved. Henry, speaking in disguise, says:—

Lord Teynham

"I think the King is but a man as I am; the violet smells to him as it doth to me; the element shows to him as it doth to me; all his senses have but human condition. His ceremonies laid by, in his nakedness he appears but a man; and though his affections are higher mounted than ours, yet, when they stoop, they stoop with the like wing; therefore, when he sees reason of fears, as we do, his fears, out of doubt, be of the same relish as ours are."

So, if an English elector fears, his fears are of the same relish as an Australian's, and he would be gladly pacified by the Ballot, as the Australian's are. He allowed that the electoral franchise was a trust; but the voter should therefore be enabled fairly and fearlessly to discharge that trust. He was acting judiciously when he had to decide on the fitness of a candidate, and for his conduct in that capacity he could not legally be called to account, so that there was no ground for making his vote public. In conclusion, the noble Lord said, he regretted that it had been his duty to trespass so long on their Lordships' attention in moving these Resolutions. The sum of what he asked was that they should pledge themselves to give to the petitions their serious consideration. The noble Lord then moved his Resolution.

EARL GRANVILLE said, it was impossible to have listened to the speech just delivered by the noble Lord without acknowledging the earnestness and sincerity with which he had advocated the doctrines he considered so important to the future welfare of the country; but this made it all the more imperative on him (Earl Granville) very briefly and plainly to state that it appeared to him that it would be impossible either for himself or the House to consent to the Resolutions which the noble Lord had proposed. The form and language of those Resolutions were somewhat unusual; but without applying to his noble Friend the Chairman of Committees to decide questions on which it would perhaps be painful and embarrassing for him to give an opinion, he (Earl Granville) must endeavour to show that the substance of these Resolutions was such as to make it impossible for the House to agree to any one of them. They were four in number, and the House was asked by adopting them to affirm a fact, and to express a hope or intention. Their Lordships were, in the first instance, called upon to say that they "greatly desire the settlement of the question of Parliamentary Reform." He (Earl Granville) certainly did greatly desire it, and he could not doubt that their Lordships felt the same desire. He could not, therefore, attribute the very thin attendance of their Lordships that evening to any want of interest in the matter, but rather to a feeling that this was not the most practical way of dealing with the question. But it would be perfectly impossible for them to declare "that this House is willing to give its most careful consideration to the petitions in favour of manhood suffrage and vote by ballot;" because adopting a formal Resolution of that sort would be going so far as to imply their intention of favourably considering that request. In the next Resolution they were called upon to express a hope that they would be able "to point out means whereby improper persons may be deprived of the franchise after it is legally possessed." This was precisely one of the most difficult things it could possibly be proposed to them to attempt, and the noble Lord offered no scheme for effecting that object, and yet in the third Resolution he suggested that "the House should recommend such alterations in the Criminal, Vagrant, and Poor Laws, as shall appear necessary to cut off from the register of voters all improper persons." The last Resolution, which contained the pith of the whole, declared that the House "might grant the spirit of the prayer of the petitioners for manhood suffrage and vote by ballot, not only without detriment, but with great advantage to the country." Now he (Earl Granville) was extremely desirous of reforming the present representation, and he had been endeavouring during some weeks to elucidate whatever evidence could be obtained to show that a considerable extension of the franchise might take place "without detriment to the common weal, but with great advantage to the same." But when they came to manhood suffrage he was not prepared to give any countenance to the adoption of any such proposition. He need not follow the noble Lord through all his philosophical, religious, historical, and almost treasonable reasons for adopting universal suffrage; indeed his memory would fail him if he attempted to do so. The noble Lord had indeed referred to precedents, and this was always desirable in discussing constitutional questions. But if the ballot was once resorted to by the House of Commons in the reign of Queen Anne, it was not quite clear that that ballot was the secret ballot, and it was clear that the system then tried was condemned. The example of the Presbyterians of Northamptonshire could hardly be applicable. With regard to the suffrage, it was not correct to say that universal suffrage existed in the reign of Henry VI., for the suffrage was then confined to freeholders alone, and was even then thought to be too widely extended. Perhaps, too, their Lordships might be inclined to think that the novel precedent drawn from the Fables of Æsop told rather against than in favour of universal suffrage. The noble Lord had referred to the appeal of Cæsar to the whole Roman people. That illustration brought forcibly to his mind what, in his opinion, was the strongest objection to universal suffrage. He believed that the inevitable tendency of universal suffrage was either to a weak and inferior government, or to anarchy, and finally to the destruction of liberty and the establishment of despotism. And when the noble Lord urged the example of 1848 in France, he (Earl Granville) must remark that the form of government which had arisen in France was not such as we could wish to see arising in England. Switzerland was, no doubt, a country from which very sound lessons of liberty might be learned, but it was very different from our own country in its size and in its position, and in all its circumstances. The noble Lord had said that in Switzerland, as soon as the father put a rifle into his son's hands to qualify him for the defence of his country, that lad became possessed of the franchise. Yet the noble Lord himself proposed, in England, to deprive every man in our army and navy of the franchise; and so the absolute doctrine broke down of the indefeasible right of every man to vote who had not disgraced himself by crime. For these and other reasons he thought it was not desirable to adopt the Resolutions moved by the noble Lord.

Resolved in the negative.

House adjourned, at a quarter before Eight o'clock, till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, June 7, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Phoenix Park.

SMITHFIELD MARKETS, STREET, AND IMPROVEMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR JAMES DUKE moved the second reading of this Bill, which provided for the removal of the dead-meat market from Newgate and its establishment in Smithfield. The Bill had received the approval of the Home Office and of the trade, and he therefore trusted that the House would consent to the second reading of the Bill, and its consideration by a Select Committee of independent Members upstairs.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. MACKINNON asked of what use were Reports of Committees and Commissions if, when they pointed out the benefit to the health of the inhabitants from open spaces in large towns, their recommendations were to be thus disregarded? He protested against the annoyance to the inhabitants of the Metropolis of establishing a dead-meat market in the heart of the City. If a dead-meat market were wanted, let it be established at a proper distance from town. The Bill was, in fact, a most arrant City job, and, believing that the health and welfare of this great Metropolis required its rejection, he moved that it be read a second time that day six months.

Earl Granville

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he should support the Bill, as he believed that a dead-meat market was much wanted in the City of London, and never so much as now, because a larger amount than ever of dead meat was sent to the Metropolis from the provinces.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the result of removing the City Cattle Market was that the ancient site of Smithfield was unoccupied. The City of London proposed to establish at their own expence a dead-meat market in the place of Newgate Market, which had become utterly insufficient for any purpose, and, in short, a public nuisance. Owing to the great extension of railways and steamers the trade in dead meat as compared with that of live cattle sent to the Metropolis, was annually on the increase, and required additional accommodation. So far from this being a City job, he trusted it would not prove a losing speculation for the City. The Bill, being partly public and partly private, would go before a Select Committee upstairs, where any objections to its details might be fully considered. He, therefore, trusted that the House would agree to the second reading.

MR. HANBURY said, he trusted the House would pause before it gave its assent to the Bill proposed, as not only the formation of a dead-meat market, but the erection of slaughter-houses in the City, might interfere with the sanitary condition of the Metropolis.

SIR MORTON PETO said, that while professing to take only a comparatively small portion of the site of Smithfield, the Bill would in fact take the larger portion of it. And he believed, moreover, that, under the cover of a meat market, the Bill designed to advance the interests, especially, of a proposed railway, which was to have a considerable extent of the space assigned to it. He objected on behalf of his constituents to any buildings being erected on the site of Smithfield, and urged that to pass the Bill would be to contravene the decision of the Commission which inquired into the removal of the Cattle Market.

MR. COWPER said, he had been Chairman of the Committee which had considered this question, and he thought this plan did carry out a great portion of their intentions. The plan proposed would tend, as he believed, to the sanitary improvement of the Metropolis, and he thought the House might lend its sanction to the measure.

MR. NORRIS said, that all that was proposed to be taken of the ancient site of the market for the purposes of this Bill was 447 yards, while the City proposed to give up 2,270 yards of their corporation property for the benefit of the public. He would not then go into the merits of the Bill, but he hoped it would be read a second time, so that it could be referred to a Committee up-stairs.

MR. T. S. DUNCOMBE said, this Bill bore on the face of it the appearance of a job, from being mixed up with the Corporation of the City of London and the Metropolitan Railway, but he should have no objection to the Bill being read a second time, if it should then be referred to a Select Committee. While the establishment of this market might prove of benefit to some portion of his constituents, yet he thought they were bound to keep open spaces in the City for their recreation.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he wished to direct attention to the circumstance that this Bill, which was essentially a private Bill, had been introduced as a public one by a Motion in the House. Such a course was permitted only when a measure of this sort was brought forward by a Member of the Government, because the Crown could not appear as petitioner for a private Bill before the House.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he did not know whether this was the proper time to take the objection, or whether it ought not to have been taken at an earlier stage. The Metropolitan Cattle-market Bill was brought in by the Government and treated afterwards as a private Bill. This Bill was not brought in by the Government, but he did not understand that if it were its quality would consequently be altered.

MR. W. EWART said, he rose to order.

He wished to ask the Speaker whether it was competent for the right hon. Gentleman to address the House twice upon the same Motion.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the right hon. Baronet was out of order, as he had already addressed the House.

MR. SLANEY said, he also must urge the necessity of open spaces being kept for the benefit of the people, and with that view he hoped the Bill would go before a Select Committee. Unless some pledge were given that it would be so referred, he trusted the House would resist the Bill.

MR. DEEDES said, he could not help thinking that there was great importance in the observations of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), and it was quite clear that a Bill like that, involving such great interests, both public and private, should not be sent to a different tribunal than that which usually investigated matters of that kind, and therefore he was in favour of it being referred to a Committee to be nominated by that House.

SIR JAMES DUKE said, he moved the second reading of this Bill with a view of having it referred to the Committee of Selection; so to that extent the objection to the Bill was removed.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, his right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Home Department had no objection to the Bill being referred to a Committee of Selection after the second reading.

Question, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 2^o, and committed to the Committee of Selection.

THE CASE OF JESSE MUMFORD.

QUESTION.

MR. T. S. DUNCOMBE said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, if his attention has been directed to the Petition of Jesse Mumford, a labouring man, of Pershore (presented on the 31st of May), complaining of the illegality and outrage perpetrated upon his wife, in having been forcibly reconveyed after ten weeks' absence, and in defiance of the wishes of himself and her relatives, to the Lunatic Asylum of the county of Worcester, and what steps he has taken in consequence?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that some time ago a memorial had been sent to him in reference to this case. He forwarded that memorial to the Commissioners in Lunacy for their Report. They investigated the case, and obtained the explanations of the Medical Officers of the Asylum in question. It appeared that the woman was a private patient, and not a criminal lunatic. The Commissioners in Lunacy were, however, of opinion that the treatment of the woman was proper, and that there was no ground for censure upon the parties concerned. It appeared that the woman was in a state of decided insanity, but had improved so much in health that she was permitted to go out upon trial for a limited time. At the end of that time an application was made to her to return, which she, however, disregarded. Means were then taken to remove her back to the asylum, when she was found in a most filthy and neglected state, and requiring the treatment which she was now receiving.

OFFICERS' CHARGERS.

QUESTION.

MAJOR KNOX said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether Officers who were in Cavalry Regiments at the time that the General Order of the 23rd day of February, 1860, was issued, and are still serving, are entitled to select Chargers from the ranks; and, if so, whether they have been in all cases permitted to do so, and to dispose of the Horses previously bought by them for the purpose?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, the change would be applicable for the future to all officers who were in those cavalry regiments; but officers would not be allowed to sell the chargers they now possessed in order to select horses out of the ranks. The effect of taking some forty horses out of the ranks would very much reduce the efficiency of the regiment.

THE REFORM BILL—DISSOLUTION OF PARLIAMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. BLAKE said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, in the event of a measure for the Amendment of the Representation of the People passing during the present Session of Parliament for England alone, a Dissolution and General Election for Great Britain and Ireland would take place, to be followed by Elections in Scotland and Ireland on the passing of the Bills for the

Sir George Lewis

Amendment of the Representation of the People for those countries?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, I do not quite comprehend the meaning of the hon. Gentleman's question; but this much I can tell him, that no dissolution can take place without the exercise of the prerogative of the Crown, and no measure passed by this House can provide for a dissolution. When the prerogative is exercised—when Her Majesty is advised to dissolve Parliament, there would, of course, be elections in Scotland and Ireland as well as in England.

POOR LAW RATING.

QUESTION.

MR. WATLINGTON said, he wished to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether the Instructional Letter from the Poor Law Commissioners to Parochial Officers, dated the 22nd day of June, 1837, has ever been withdrawn, or whether the practice of considering gross estimated rental as the landlord's rent, the landlord and tenant respectively paying their own proper charges, prevails in opposition to the instructions therein contained.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, that in answer to the first part of the hon. Member's question, he had to state that the Instructional Letter of the Poor-Law Commissioners in 1837 had never been withdrawn. That letter had no further authority than the expression of the opinion of the Commissioners on the provisions of the Parochial Assessment Act. Its chief purpose appeared to be to indicate to the parish authorities upon what value of property they were to make their assessments, and so far the letter was quite clear, for it says that it is upon value after deducting all charges and expenses incidental to the occupation or ownership of property. But the point of the hon. Member's question he (Mr. Villiers) presumed was, that in that letter there was a reference to gross rent, which seemed to be at variance with the reply that had been given to the hon. Gentleman on that subject on a former occasion, the Commissioners apparently implying that the landlord paid what were called the tenant's taxes as well as his own. He did not think that the Commissioners' letter was very clear upon that point, and this appeared to have been the opinion also of the Poor Law Board in the month of May, 1859, for, upon having occasion to consider the real meaning of what is called gross estimated rental, they referred the matter for the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, and also of Mr. Tomlinson, who was counsel to the Board; and their opinion was to the effect that the gross estimated rental mentioned in the Schedule of the Parochial Assessment Act was the rent at which the property might be expected to let, the tenant paying his own rates and taxes, and they assumed that the column was filled up with a figure corresponding with that rent on a tenancy from year to year; and they then further stated that the rateable value was a deduction from that rental, amounting to what is required from the landlord for repairs and other expenses necessary to maintain the value of the property. What had been the prevailing practice in cities and boroughs among overseers in making their assessments had not particularly been brought under the attention of the Poor Law Board until the recent inquiries which were directed by order of the Government as to the number of persons rated under different denominations of value; and from the result of those inquiries it appeared that the practice of overseers in such places coincided more with the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown than with the Instructional Letter of the Commissioners of 1837.

THE SCOTCH AND IRISH REFORM BILLS.—QUESTION.

MR. BRADY said, he wished to put a question to the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. The reply which the noble Lord gave to his (Mr. Brady's) hon. Friend the Member for Waterford (Mr. Blake) though no doubt statesmanlike and productive of a great deal of merriment—[Order, order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member must confine himself to putting the question.

MR. BRADY said, he would put the question in the hope of receiving a more satisfactory answer than had been given to his hon. Friend. He wished to know Whether, in the event of the English Reform Bill passing into Law a Dissolution would necessarily take place before any measure of a similar kind was passed for Ireland or Scotland?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I have, Sir, already answered the question to the best of my comprehension, and, in now giving an answer to the hon. Gentleman, I hope he will understand that if I endeavour to make the matter clear to him it is not that I am by any means sanguine of success. His question supposed that, according to law, if a Reform Bill for England were carried, a dissolution would necessarily take place after the passing of the Bill. Now, what I stated was that no dissolution would take place unless Her Majesty were advised to exercise her prerogative. By law Parliament is not necessarily dissolved till seven years from the date of a general election; and therefore it would not be until Her Majesty was advised to exercise the prerogative that a dissolution would take place. If that advice were given, then, as I stated, the dissolution would produce a general election, as well in England, where the Reform Bill had passed, as in Ireland and Scotland, where it had not. But if the hon. Gentleman wishes to ask me what would be the advice given to the Crown, that is a question to which I can give no answer.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he wished to ask the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, Whether he is in a position to state definitively what course will be pursued with reference to the Irish and Scotch Reform Bills.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: It is proposed to-night, after the debate on the English Bill, that the Irish and Scotch Bills shall be withdrawn, or postponed for three months.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL.—COMMITTEE.

ADJOURNED DEBATE. SECOND NIGHT.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [4th June].

"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:" and which Amendment was, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in order to obtain a safe and effective Reform, it would be inexpedient and unjust to proceed further with the proposed Legislative Measure for the Representation of the People until the House has before it the results of the Census authorised by the Bill now under its consideration."

—instead thereof:

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he had put a notice on the paper to postpone the Order of the Day for going into Committee
[Second Night.]

tee on the Reform Bill for England till after the Scotch and Irish Bills had been read a second time. He had taken that course, although a very unusual one, relying, as he thought, on precedent and on the best advice which he had been able to procure. He felt extremely grateful to the Speaker for the caution which he had given, and for having saved him from the position, so embarrassing to a young Member, of being placed in antagonism to the rules of the House; he was, therefore, obliged to adopt another course, although that of which he had given notice, he believed, was only open to question. He hoped to be able to show that although the step he was about to take was unusual, the circumstances which had led to it were so extraordinary, and, perhaps, unprecedented, that the House would assent to the Motion he was about to submit, and thereby, in an indirect manner mark their sense of the course taken by the Government with respect to the Scotch and Irish Bills, and thus cause the Government to retrace their steps. To keep himself in order he begged, instead of the Motion of which he had given notice, to move that the debate be now adjourned. To render this Motion intelligible it was requisite that he should shortly go over the history of the three Bills which were before the House. Four months had now elapsed since those measures, dealing with the composition of the electoral body of the country, and involving consequences of great importance, had been brought forward. On the 1st of March the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in fulfilment of the pledge which led to his accession to office—and, however embarrassing that pledge might have been to the Cabinet of which he was a Member, he took it for granted that the noble Lord would not have held office in it if that pledge had remained unfulfilled—submitted to a crowded and anxious House the most important Bill with regard to the representation of the people which had been laid before it since the settlement of 1832. The progress of that Bill had been but slow. After this grave introduction nearly another month elapsed before another discussion was taken on this measure, to the second reading of which no opposition had been offered. Easter found that discussion unfinished, and after the recess the debate received a new accession of strength from the public criticism which had been freely lavished on the proposals of the Government. Every inducement was offered to the Government to accede to what he took to be the prevailing opinion in the House, endorsed by public feeling out of doors, and to withdraw the Bill. But still so chary was the House of appearing to set itself against an extension of the suffrage—a measure which, on all hands, for some years had been allowed to be inevitable, that no opposition was offered to the second reading; but again a delay intervened before a further stage was attained; another month elapsed before it was proposed to go into Committee on the details of the Bill, which might before then have become part of the Statute-book. But at the very juncture when it appeared probable that that important step would have been taken, the disapproval which had been gaining strength day by day assumed a shape, not by any proposition on the part of the constitutional Opposition, but by the proposition of a Member sitting behind the Government, and usually a supporter of their measures. And he ventured to say that if hon. Members on the Liberal side of the House would only speak out honestly the sentiments they entertained it would be found that that proposition gave expression to the feelings of the majority. What he desired that the House should mark was this, that on every occasion the English Reform Bill appeared in the Notice Paper side by side with those for Scotland and Ireland, until for the first time it had been announced that evening by the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary that the Scotch and Irish Bills were to be postponed till next year. He was far from insinuating that the noble Lord in delaying that announcement intended to take advantage of the House, and to avoid the discussion which he must be aware hon. Members from the sister kingdoms would raise on those measures, but he did say that by withholding so long the profession of his intention, the noble Lord had placed it beyond the power of the House, in the regular and established manner, to protest with effect against the postponement of measures so vitally affecting the parts of the kingdom which they represented. It was in consequence of being now debarred from moving an instruction to the Committee that he now took the course of endeavouring to delay the further progress of the debate on the English Reform Bill. He did so with the view of inducing the Government to take the discussion on the Irish and Scotch

Sir James Fergusson

Bills pari passu with that on the English Bill, or withdraw the three Bills together, and thus deal evenhanded justice to all parts of the kingdom. Had the Government announced its intention of withdrawing all three Bills he should not have had a word to say; nor had it at first declined to deal with the representation of Ireland and Scotland should he have made any objection; the Government might have seen difficulties in dealing with it that would have justified it in so declining. But suppose the English Reform Bill to be passed; and statements had been made by supporters of the Government that it had resolved to make the English Reform Bill a Cabinet measure; and that if the House should have to sit till Christmas the Government was determined to pass it. He thought that was a straightforward and constitutional and sincere course to take. But should the English Bill be passed, he wanted to know in what position the House would stand next year with regard to the probable dissolution? The right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) had stated to the House, in a clearer manner than he (Sir James Fergusson) could pretend to do, the inconveniences which would arise from that state of things. The experience of the youngest Member was enough to tell him that a dissolution was always a possible—after passing a Reform Bill, a very probable—contingency. It could not be expected that the new constituencies, outnumbering in many places the old electors, would tolerate a denial of the exercise of their newly obtained electoral privileges. During the discussion of any future Irish or Scotch Reform Bills, the newly-enfranchised electors would hardly consent to have no voice upon them, Members of the House would be pointed out as representing but a small portion of their constituencies; there were other Gentlemen, in the House and out of it, who would not be slow to agitate the public mind, and twit those constituencies with having been denied the exercise of the privilege Parliament had conceded to them. The Members of that House, it would be said, until a re-election, represented but a very small portion of their constituents, and it would be felt that a House which was, to use the word of the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire, moribund, and condemned by itself to an early end, was incompetent to decide questions that should be discussed in the most independent spirit? The peculiar advantage the House possessed over democratic assemblies, was that independent spirit gained by its being free, for a certain time, from the necessity of appealing to the people. It could decide fairly on great questions, without being swayed by the passions of the day. But the House of Commons knowing it must soon be dissolved, would not so freely express an opinion, according to the conviction of its Members. And the Government by having a dissolution in its hands would be able to exercise more than a legitimate control over the House. There was a further danger also, not of a control from above, but from below. Hon. Members who were certain they should soon have to meet new constituencies, including more of the democratic element than the old, would be far more apt to address the electors out of the House than their fellow Members in it. Having stood out against a principle they thought dangerous they would endeavour to efface the memory of many unfortunate expressions, by the expression of opinions more consonant to the feelings of the new electors they would soon have to meet. It was a state of things closely resembling the influence ascribed to annual or triennial Parliaments. But suppose the dissolution, as a natural consequence of passing the English Reform Bill, to take place, would it be fair that the English Members should be returned by a more democratic or lower franchise, while the Irish and Scotch Members were returned by electors on the old qualification? The English Members so returned would be likely to regard the Irish and Scotch Reform Bills in a very different spirit from that of the preceding Parliament. In support of this view he was entitled to quote the language of a petition, presented by the noble Lord (Lord John Russell), from a meeting held in St. Martin's Hall, on the 17th of May. It said—

“That while advocating Parliamentary representation on the basis of manhood suffrage and the ballot, your petitioners accept for the present, as an instalment, the Bill introduced by Lord John Russell, the provisions of which, in connection with a lodger qualification and the abolition of the ratepaying clauses, will confer the franchise on a considerable portion of the working population.”

The Manchester School made no secret of their views in this respect. They openly expressed their conviction that the Reform Bill of the noble Lord was only an instalment; that it was not a Reform Bill; but merely a Bill for the extension of the suffrage. He wished the House to recollect that several years ago it was decided that a Parliament on the eve of a dissolution ought not to deal with any subject unless it was of immediate urgency. When the first Government of the Earl of Derby was about to dissolve Parliament, it was proposed to deal with the four seats rendered vacant by the disfranchisement of Sudbury and St. Albans. That course was opposed and successfully opposed by the right hon. Gentleman the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the ground that a "moribund" Parliament was incompetent to deal with such an important question. If a Parliament about to expire was incompetent to deal with only four seats, how much less competent would a Parliament, on the verge of dissolution, be to deal with the representation of two portions of the kingdom? The expression of opinion of the right hon. Gentleman was as follows. He said—

[Second Night.]

" There is a great inconvenience attending the introduction of such a question. . . . Surely it is a sound canon of Parliamentary proceeding, that for all measures whatever, except those of immediate urgency the eve of a dissolution of Parliament is the worst possible moment for their introduction, because it is plain it is a moment at which local partialities and personal interests are most alive, at which there is the most difficulty for a Member of the House of Commons to give a deliberate and dispassionate judgment."—[3 Hansard, cxxi., 459.]

He had gone on to say—

"So far from this being the time when there is a peculiar convenience in the entertainment of the present question, it is, of all periods, the worst and most inconvenient that could have been selected, and a period at which it is impossible for us to expect that that decision shall give satisfaction to the many claimants upon those franchises which we are bound to hear."—Ibid.

He had also referred to some of the numerous places and corporations, which he said preferred fair claims to these seats, and added—

"I put it to the right hon. Gentleman and to the House whether he thinks this House of Commons, this 'moribund' Parliament, is in a fair condition at this moment to give a fair hearing to and consideration of those claims."—Ibid.

Now, let him (Sir J. Fergusson) suppose that the English Reform Bill were passed into a law, and that a dissolution as a consequence took place, must there not, he would ask, in the event of the Scotch and Irish Reform Bills receiving the assent of the new Parliament, be in common justice another dissolution? The noble Lord, indeed, had relieved him of one doubt that had occurred to him, with respect to the dissolution, by pointing out that a dissolution for the three kingdoms should take place at the same time. But it had not seemed to him very absurd that separate dissolutions should take place; because, why should the Scotch and Irish Members be sent to their constituents in consequence of a Reform Bill being passed for England. Why should English Members be sent to their constituents in consequence of Reform Bills being passed for Scotland and Ireland? These questions the House must bear in mind were forced on the notice of hon. Members by the exceptional manner in which it was proposed to deal with Scotland and Ireland, as compared with this country. For his own part, he should confidently maintain that upon a subject of so much importance as that of reform it was most inexpedient there should be a distinct mode of proceeding in reference to different portions of the State, while, if there were to be a dissolution in consequence of the English Reform Bill next year, and one in the year following as the result of the passing of the Scotch and Irish measures, we might as well at once have recourse to annual Parliaments, the immediate tendency of which would be to make the House of Commons a democratic assembly. Now, he should wish to direct for a moment the attention of the House to the probable effect upon the Irish and Scotch measures of the course which the noble Lord proposed. To have parties fairly represented in that House during the important discussions to which they would give rise ought to be the object of everybody who was anxious to make and render the Bills as conducive as possible to the public weal. But was it to be anticipated, he would ask, that parties would be so represented if the House, exhausted by the debates which must take place on the English Reform Bill, were to be called upon to take up the Irish and Scotch measures, which he understood, from the observations of the noble Lord that evening, he was about to postpone for three months?

Lord JOHN RUSSELL: What I said was that I would propose to postpone these Bills for three months or withdraw them, the one proposition being equivalent to the other.

Sir James Fergusson

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON : That strengthened his argument. He was justified in contending that the Scotch Members had acquired an enviable notoriety for not obtruding questions relating to that country unnecessarily on the attention of the House. They were in the habit of settling such questions, as far as possible, quietly up stairs; but they were, he thought, perfectly justified in demanding that the settlement of a question which concerned the whole nation should take place in a full House, and receive the most careful consideration at the hands of hon. Members representing all parts of the United Kingdom; for, if the contrary course were adopted, and principles which were held of importance, as applied to England, were treated lightly or altogether set aside when their application to Scotland or Ireland became the subject of debate, the result must tend to the disadvantage of the country at large. It had been made a cause of complaint in the case of the first Reform Bill that but little regard was paid in framing it to the landed interest, and the consequence of that complaint being founded on justice was, that a large majority of the Members for Scotland, not only in towns but counties, were returned by urban influences. He trusted, therefore, that in disposing of the important question of the reconstruction of the representation of that country, the English Members would be afforded a fair opportunity of lending their assistance, which, however, could not be the case if hon. Members were preparing for an approaching election. That legislation for the two countries should proceed upon an equal footing was an opinion so strongly impressed upon the mind of the hon. Member for Montrose that he had, upon the introduction of the Reform Bill of the late Government, felt it to be his duty to go so far as to move an Amendment to the Motion, because the Government did not propose to deal in it with the representation of Scotland or Ireland. The hon. Gentleman on that occasion said:—

"He rose to oppose the Motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for two distinct and separate reasons. In the first place he did so in the interests of Scotland, which were not fairly dealt with in the scheme of the Government. He had originally intended to have proposed his Resolution on going into Committee, and he still thought that would have been a fit time for the Scotch and Irish Members to have interposed; but the statement they had just heard from the right hon. Gentleman afforded them ample reasons for protesting against the piecemeal legislation proposed by the Government. . . . Had the right hon. Gentleman, instead of confining his survey to England and Wales, looked abroad upon the United Kingdom, he would have had no difficulty in discovering many towns, and counties, too, that were not sufficiently represented in that House. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) had in this respect, at least, satisfied the just requirements of Scotland. . . . the great benefit of the Bill proposed to the country by the hon. Member for Birmingham was that it dealt at once with the whole of the United Kingdom, and all the Scotch and Irish Members should lift up their testimony against any measure which was less extensive. He claimed for Scotland 19 additional members, &c."

He went on to say,—

" He inferred that the representation of Scotland (in point of numbers) was to remain just as it was. He stood there to protest against that injustice, and he should warn the Government that the Members for Scotland would give the most strenuous opposition to any measure which did not deal fairly with that country."—
[3 Hansard, clii., 1005-6.]

Now, the hon. Member for Montrose was, he felt assured, too honest and straightforward a politician to make such remarks as those from mere party motives, and would doubtless pursue the same with regard to any Bill, by whatever Government introduced, if it should fall short in those respects. He (Sir J. Fergusson) himself, in addressing the House on the present occasion, was actuated with no desire to make the question to which he was referring a Scotch grievance, but by the conviction that if the course which the Government proposed were adopted great injury to the interests of that country would be the result. He would point out to the House that, in accordance with the principles on which the Union between Scotland and England was carried out, the former was entitled, whether upon the ground of the relative proportions of taxation or population, to an increased number of representatives. At the time of the Union the amount of the Customs and Excise in England was £2,289,161; in Scotland, £63,500, or as thirty-six to one; while in the year 1830 the amount for England was £35,768,067, for Scotland, £4,134,082, or as eight and a half to one, which was also the present proportion. Next came the test of population, the population of the United Kingdom being 29,013,893, that of Scotland alone 3,139,860, while the scale of taxation was as £62,708,566 to £7,216,358, thus demonstrating that, these several elements being taken into account, Scotland was indisputably entitled to an increase of fourteen or fifteen Members. Now, unless the Reform Bills for the two countries were discussed in conjunction, it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to succeed in carrying an Amendment providing that a certain number of additional seats should be conferred upon Scotland, while, if such an Amendment were adopted, what, he should like to know, was to become of those seats in the event of a dissolution taking place before the Scotch and Irish Reform Bills had passed into a law? On constitutional grounds then, on grounds of expediency and of general convenience, the course which the Government were pursuing was open to the gravest objections. He had stated that the Scotch Reform Bill in 1832 followed the English in the same year. It was during a weary autumn Session the Bills were discussed; and the first sentences of the chapter of the Annual Register, giving the history of the Scotch Bill, said:—

"The carrying of the English Bill, and still more the manner in which it had been carried, insured a rapid course to the Reform Bills for Scotland and Ireland. Resistance on any point which either party deemed of importance was now ascertained to be useless. Deliberation was at an end. Both Bills had already been read a first time, and had then awaited on the table of the House of Commons the fate of the English Bill in the House of Peers. The forms of Parliament remained to be gone through before they could become law. . . . On the second reading no opposition was made, the Opposition knew that resistance was hopeless. Some of the Scotch Members who had adhered to Ministers in regard to the English Bill complained, however, that the Scotch Bill did not do justice to the landed interest, the county representation bearing no fair proportion to that of the boroughs. Sir G. Murray contended that the total number of Members given to Scotland was too small. . . . The smallest English county had two Members; the largest Scotch had but one. . . . The Amendment was rejected by 168 to 61. Various other Amendments were moved in the details of the Bill, and pressed to divisions, but always with the same result. Many of the geographical arrangements for the grouping of burghs were most undesirable, but were maintained in many cases avowedly to assist the Ministerial influence."—[See Ann. Reg., v. 74, p. 195.]

The writer went on to mention instances in which the arrangements connected with the Bill were notoriously made with regard to the exigencies of the Government party; and he could himself mention two towns in his own county which ought to have been united, but were not, because it was said the influence of the one interfered with the Ministerial majority in the other, and they were actually joined, the one to a place fifty miles off and the other to towns, between which and it the sea intervened.

Sir James Fergusson

He would read one other extract, showing the opinion held by a Liberal Member occupying an eminent position in that House as published in a work on the history of the Reform Bill, and strongly condemning the legislation separately for different parts of the United Kingdom. In Mr. Roebuck's History of the Administration of the Whigs he said:—

"The Bills for Ireland and Scotland were to be brought in; the first by Mr. Stanley, and the second by the Lord Advocate. The mode attempted before of making all these three Bills proceed pari passu had been found inconvenient, and now, therefore, a separate discussion was to take place of each Bill—a mode of proceeding fraught with great mischief, as it makes the people of Ireland and Scotland (but more especially the former) consider themselves a separate people, subject by this distinction in the process of legislation to direct oppression, because of the different measures of justice with which the three nations are served. One Bill might have been easily made applicable to the United Kingdom, and the whole people would then have found therein their one constitutional code. . . . It gives a colour of truth to the charge of unfairness and unequal dealing on the part of English and English Ministers with respect to the less powerful Members of the United Kingdom. The belief that such injustice prevails in all our legislation is carefully inculcated upon the minds of the ignorant, and habits and feelings of antipathy and hate are the natural consequences."

He had thus endeavoured imperfectly to state a case which he hoped would be endorsed, in no party spirit, by both Scotch and Irish Members, as so nearly affecting the interests of their constituents. He also hoped that English Members on both sides would, if they attached any weight to the arguments used, impartially ponder the propriety of by their votes inducing the Government to reconsider their decision with respect to the Scotch and Irish Bills. He should certainly regret if the Motion should become in any sense one to embarrass the Government. He might also be allowed to express his belief, although, as a private Member, he could not speak with authority, that in the different debates which had taken place during the present Session, in which the Opposition and those who conducted its proceedings had found it necessary to take exception to various measures proposed by Ministers, they had been actuated by no desire to disturb the Government. The statement was endorsed by those who led the Conservative party, and enjoyed their confidence, that they would shrink from displacing them on any party grounds; but, because they held that patriotic opinion, were they to be deterred from expressing their opinion upon measures which they believed fraught with danger to the institutions of the country? If so, they would be as much wanting in duty to their party as to the country of which they were citizens. The postponement of the Scotch and Irish Reform Bills to a future Session was a perilous, or, at least a doubtful course, against which he sincerely and earnestly protested. The noble Lord—to use a simile he had himself employed in introducing a measure of education with which he had fondly hoped that his name would be associated—had launched a triple venture in a sea which had already proved fatal to many gallant barks. With a clear sky, and no opposing gales, he had been compelled to return to port two of his vessels which had not encountered the first sea breeze. Could he hope that next year the circumstances under which he might renew his venture would be as fair and promising as now? Could he hope that it would not be with a clouded sky and increasing mutterings of the storm? He of all others in the country must know whether we are likely to have a peaceful and unclouded year. But, even if there were not so many whisperings of danger, it was at least a hazardous policy to build so much on a doubtful future. He had considered it his duty to protest against the postponement of two Bills vitally affecting Scotland and Ireland, thus dealing with three portions of the kingdom in a fragmentary manner, when they ought to have the same measure dealt out to all parts of the kingdom. He hoped Parliament would not lightly give its consent to a course the danger of which could not be estimated. He begged to move the Resolution of which he had given notice.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Debate be now adjourned.”

COLONEL DICKSON said, that as a representative of an Irish county, and feeling deeply the slight which had been put on his country, he rose to second the proposition of the hon. Baronet who had just sat down. He was not of the number of those against whom the accusation had been made so freely that they were opposed to reform, or actuated by motives of factious opposition. They had been accused of dealing in these matters in a party spirit. He did not hesitate to declare that he would rather see the sides of the House changed. Had the Conservative party been in power during the last year they would not have had a commercial treaty which, by its negotiation, had effectually paralysed our foreign policy; they would not have had a Budget which, with all deference to the brilliant but deceptive eloquence with which it had been introduced, had never seduced him, and which was, in fact, one of the worst Budgets ever proposed. They would have been discussing bonâ fide and useful measures of reform; instead of wasting their time with miserable abortions. Another accusation had been brought against that side of the House. The noble Lord opposite (Lord John Russell) had accused them of conduct unworthy of a great party. He (Colonel Dickson) did not pretend to belong to that great party, but he had given them a ready and conscientious support, because he believed their policy to be the best calculated to confer benefits on the empire, and that portion of it which he had the honour to represent; and he would tell the noble Lord what he considered unworthy conduct. There were two noble Lords opposite not supposed to entertain any great political or party affection for each other, who, refusing that fair consideration to their political opponents they expected should be extended to themselves, joined in a factious vote, and with a narrow majority, to oust a Conservative Government from power. They introduced their Bills, but, finding they could not carry them, instead of honestly dropping them, they delayed them from day to day, from week to week, and from month to month, till they were now in the middle of June discussing a measure which, had Ministers wished to carry it, they might have compelled the House to discuss it in the middle of February. Such conduct was unworthy of the noble Lords and of the position they held. He did not wish it to be understood that he was enamoured of the present Reform Bill. What he complained of was that the Bills for Ireland and Scotland should not move on, pari passu, and that the House should not have an opportunity of discussing and deciding the one with the others. He would not detain them by discussing the clauses of the Irish Bill, but he must say he thought they were totally unworthy of consideration. In fact, in the Irish Bill, there was scarcely anything to discuss. There was simply a reduction of the franchise, very small and unimportant; and a clause to enable Irish peers to represent Irish constituencies in the House of Commons. As a measure of reform it was entirely unworthy of consideration. But he protested against the system of treating with contempt any measure tending to the advantage of Ireland. When Irish measures came on they were discussed in thin Houses or met by counts out; yet they were approaching the end of the Session, and no Irish measures had been passed. He was not in the habit of bringing before the House Irish grievances. He did not profess to be an Irish patriot. He was for a thorough union with the mother country. He thought the union was mutually beneficial to the two countries. But the union should be on fair and equal terms. The Irish would not be the mere pioneers of civilization; they would not be hewers of wood and drawers of water for their Imperial masters. They claimed equal shares in British freedom and British laws. They heard great sympathy expressed for those who were suffering under the King of Naples, but there was a great part of Ireland which stood as a monument of disgrace to England, and as a proof of its misrule. He saw in Ireland a country with every natural advantage, and a people who, with their faults, were noble, amenable to discipline, and open to fair treatment; but what was the fact? A great portion of the country was still neglected, uncultivated, and waste, and the people deprived of those moral and physical advantages which separated the freeman from the slave. This was a state of things which ought not to be allowed to exist, and the only remedy to be applied was to have equal legislation in every part of the empire. He did not blame the present Government only. He thought all Governments had been equally to blame. In conclusion, he would repeat that it was his opinion that it would be unjust to postpone the Scotch and Irish Reform Bills, which ought, on the contrary, to be considered at the same time as the Bill for reforming the representation of the people of England.

SIR GEORGE GREY: Sir, I did not hear the opening portion of the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Ayrshire (Sir J. Fergusson), but now that I have heard the Motion with which he concluded I am at a loss to comprehend what possible relation there can be between the Motion of the hon. Gentleman and the speeches which have been delivered in support of it. Still less can I conceive how the adjournment of the debate could assist the object which the hon. Gentleman had in view—namely, the earliest possible consideration of Bills amending the representation of the people for all parts of the United Kingdom. The hon. Member for Ayrshire began by reminding the House that he was a young Member and deficient in experience as to its forms. I must, however, congratulate him, after having taken counsel with his friends, upon having manifested the skill and ingenuity of an experienced tactician in having developed a new mode, after others have been pretty well exhausted, of interposing delay and obstruction to the further progress of a Bill which no hon. Gentleman on the Opposition benches has yet met with the direct and manly opposition that the Government are entitled to expect. The hon. and gallant Gentleman who last spoke, said there was no disposition on the part of hon. Members near him to embarrass the Government, or displace them in favour of hon. Gentlemen in Opposition, and he claimed for them the right, which no one would deny, to assert their principles in a manly, open, and Parliamentary manner, and to oppose measures which they consider prejudicial. That is what we ask them to do—not to cavil at them, and not to obstruct them by dilatory manœuvres—but to meet them with a direct Motion, upon which the sense of the House may be taken. Not only are hon. Gentlemen opposite entitled to take that course, but they are bound to take that course if they believe the Bill to be one which they ought not to sanction, and prejudicial to the interests of this country. But although the hon. Member for Ayrshire says he is a young and inexperienced Member, he has sat in former Parliaments and taken a frequent part in debates, and I am, therefore, astonished that the hon. Gentleman should have shown such a want of experience, such an utter ignorance of the forms and proceedings of the House, and even of the nature of the Constitution. First of all, the hon. Gentleman gave notice of a Motion yesterday diametrically in opposition to one of the Standing Orders of the House, so clear and unambiguous that no one can doubt its purport. I assume that he received from you, Sir, an intimation that his Motion was contrary to the Standing Orders, and that it would be your duty, as the guardian of the forms of the House, to interpose when the Order for the Debate came on, and prevent his submitting that Motion to the House. The hon. Member says it is doubtful whether he would have been in order if he had moved the Resolution he originally drew up, but I apprehend vernment was departing from the course taken on the former occasion.

Colonel Dickson

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: What I said was that in 1832 the course of proceeding with one Bill before the other was adopted with great disadvantage to those countries the Bills relating to which were postponed.

SIR GEORGE GREY: It appeared to me the hon. Gentleman entertained the idea that it would be possible to go into Committee one day on the English Bill, and then, having advanced it a little, to take up the Scotch Bill, and so on. ["Oh, oh!"] If the hon. Gentleman had been in the House during the last Parliament he would have known that the course taken by the present Government is much nearer that which he deems the right one than that pursued by the late Government. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks not only did not, when he introduced the Reform Bill for England, lay the Bills for Scotland and Ireland on the table at the same time, but he actually invited the House to read the English Bill a second time without ever having given the slightest intimation to the House of the principle on which the other two measures were to be based. The right hon. Gentleman even went further, and said it was the intention of the Government, if the second reading of the English Bill should be acceded to, to ask the House to go into Committee on it before Easter. Consequently it would have been impossible previously to that time to lay on the table, and ask the House to read a second time, the Bills for Scotland and Ireland. I am bound to suppose that the hon. Gentleman is sincere in assuming the character of an ardent reformer; and I would ask him whether he is taking the course that will most promote the object he professes to have in view? After the experience we have had of late years as to the pressure of business on the Government, and the difficulty of obtaining full and ample time during the period when the House is fully attended by hon. Members for the consideration of all the important business which the Government has to submit to Parliament, I very much doubt whether the best mode of securing full and ample discussion for a Bill of this kind is not to attempt less in one Session. [Cheers from the Opposition.] I mean that it might be better to be content with passing one Bill of this kind in one Session. I am satisfied that greater progress will be made by taking the measures separately than by attempting to take the three together. I believe that that would be the course most conducive to the end which those Gentlemen profess to have in view. But of this I am sure, that to adjourn the consideration of this Bill to no named day is merely to interpose an obstacle to its passing, without enabling the House to come to any decision, or to express any opinion with regard to its future progress. I can understand many Gentlemen who are really honest Reformers feeling the great difficulty which attends the progress of a Bill of this kind during the same Session in which an unusual amount of time has been occupied by financial measures of extraordinary magnitude and importance. I can understand their feelings that it is a difficulty which is entitled to some weight; but I cannot understand any hon. Gentlemen professing to be reformers, and to desire to see the representation amended, lending themselves to these merely dilatory and obstructive Motions, without in the least advancing the views which they profess to entertain. With regard to the question of dissolution, I have already reminded the House that if the prerogative of the Crown be exercised at any time, it can only operate upon what are then the constituencies by law capable of electing Members. If this Bill should pass before the close of the present year, it will be absolutely necessary that many months intervene before the registration is completed. I do not say that there will be no dissolution, but if it should take place it will merely affect the constituencies now existing in the United Kingdom. No dissolution can operate on the new constituencies until towards the close of next year. If this Bill is disposed of in the present Session, the House will have ample time to consider and to pass measures of the same nature affecting both Scotland and Ireland before the new registration can be complete. After all the measures have received the consent of Parliament a dissolution may take place, though not at so early a period as some anticipate, so as to operate on the new constituencies. I hope, therefore, that the House will not now encourage these Motions, which, as I have said, only tend to obstruct and delay, but will take a course more worthy of its character, and one which will enable it to stand better in the opinion of the country, which cannot be deceived by professions of a desire for Reform in the face

[Second Night.]

tion of the working classes. That principle has unquestionably been affirmed both by this House and by the country; and I now call upon those hon. Gentlemen who represent the boroughs in the schedule to reflect whether they are doing justice to their constituencies, and placing them in a position which they would wish them to occupy before the country, when they seriously ask the House to postpone the consideration of the whole question of Parliamentary Reform until they shall, by means of the Census—the results of which will be ascertained two or three years hence—be able to show that these boroughs have been improperly scheduled? I am glad to find from what has taken place to-night that that proposition has been abandoned ["No, no!"] I have too much faith in the justice and the common sense of the House to believe that, after no one has ventured to meet the Bill with a direct negative, and after the principle of the Bill has been affirmed, they will avail themselves of the miserable pretext of waiting for the Census. The hon. and learned Member for Guildford (Mr. Bovill) the other night made a long and able speech which he might have made with more propriety in Committee. If he had in Committee brought forward reasons why the borough of Guildford had been improperly placed in the schedule, he would have received a patient and impartial hearing, and that borough might be withdrawn from the schedule, without affecting the ultimate fate of the Bill. Instead of taking that course the hon. and learned Member has determined to place Guildford in the van—in the van of obstructives, and proposes to hang up the consideration of the whole question of reform until the results of the Census have been made known, and it can be authoritatively decided whether Guildford has more than 7,000 inhabitants. Notwithstanding the few cheers which came from the other side of the House some minutes ago, I believe that when my hon. Friend the Member for Rye goes to a division, if he ever ventures to do so, he will find that the common sense of the House is against him and that they are not disposed to take the course he proposes. The Census has really nothing whatever to do with the essential portions of the Bill. The principle of the borough franchise and county franchise does not depend in the slightest degree on the population which may be proved to exist in certain boroughs and counties by the Census of 1861. The only portion of the Bill to which the Census can at all apply is that which relates to the redistribution of seats, and even to that I hold that it can apply only in a very small and infinitesimal degree. No one can expect to find anything in the Census which would prove that the Ridings of Yorkshire or South Lancashire are not entitled to receive additional representatives. The same may be said as to Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Glasgow, Leeds, and other large cities. Although some of them may have increased, of late years, in a more rapid ratio than others, no one can believe that they have altered their relative position to the other boroughs of the kingdom, nor is there any reason to believe that the mere Census would show that the boroughs now contained in the schedule ought not to have been placed there, even if we were to limit ourselves to decide such a question on mere arithmetical grounds. We must of course draw the line somewhere, and 7,000 has been chosen as a fair point at which to draw it; but it is not to be pretended that that number constitutes a substantial principle of the Bill. If this Motion is really to be supported by hon. Gentlemen opposite, as I am led to believe may be the case from the cheers they have given, I would ask them why they did not start the objection on the second reading of the Bill, when it would have been just as applicable as now? And, further, why did they not make the same objection to the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, to which it would have applied almost in the same degree as to the present measure, the only difference being that there was then an interval of two years, and now of one year before the taking of the Census? The hon. Member for Ayrshire, who comes forward now in the character of an ardent Scotch Reformer, expresses himself extremely dissatisfied with the state of the representation in Scotland, and anxious that the Session should not close without some Amendment taking place. I think the positions he has laid down in expressing those views are as liable to criticism as those I have already adverted to. He has asserted that it has been uniformly the custom to proceed pari passu with the Reform Bills of the three countries which form the United Kingdom. [Sir JAMES FERGUSSON: I said just the reverse.] I understood the hon. Gentleman to complain that the Go-to dawdle away time until the health of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was re-established. Why was the Reform Bill not proceeded with at once; why was it subordinated to and placed behind the financial measures of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and why was the interest of the Session concentrated upon those revolutionary financial measures? The conduct of the Government taught Parliament and the country that they regarded free commerce with France, and the measures which hinged upon it, as of paramount importance, and Reform of the Representation as a matter of merely secondary consideration. Thus it was that, at the end of the first week in June, Her Majesty's Ministers found themselves reduced to the pitiable condition that they were compelled, as they said, to throw over the Irish and Scotch Bills, and to make an attempt—he believed only a colourable attempt—to proceed some stage further with the Reform Bill for England. When, on Monday last, for the first time, the noble Lord made the unexpected announcement that it was the intention of the Government not to proceed this Session with the Scotch and Irish Reform Bills, every hon. Gentleman representing Ireland and Scotland found the position completely changed; and that it was no longer possible for them, with the high and manly feelings which they undoubtedly entertained, to submit in silence to this extraordinary change in the policy of Her Majesty's Government. The feeling was not confined to the Opposition. It at once became incumbent on the Representatives of Ireland and Scotland, without reference to considerations of party, to mark their sense of the mode in which the interests confided to their charge were slighted and neglected by the conduct of Her Majesty's Government. It was then that his hon. and gallant Friend was induced to put on the paper notice of the Motion on which the right hon. Baronet had remarked. That Motion not being in order, his hon. and gallant Friend, determined to mark his sense of the conduct of the Government, did not yield to the technical objection, but took a course, which he ventured to say would call the attention of the House and the country to the extraordinary position of these Reform Bills in a most pointed manner. The hon. and gallant Gentleman deserved the gratitude of the House and the country for the temperate and manly manner in which he had discharged his difficult and delicate task. He could not sit silently by, therefore, and hear the right hon. Gentleman treat his hon. and gallant Friend as though he was a mere novice, ignorant of the forms of the House, of the history of the country, and of the spirit of the Constitution. On the contrary, he had shown that he was thoroughly acquainted with the history and the Constitution of the country and that he was thoroughly alive to the importance of the subject, which the right hon. Baronet had greatly under valued. The right hon. Gentleman gave the House to understand that it was almost impossible for a dissolution of Parliament to take place in the year in which the Reform Bill was passed; but in 1832 two or three Reform Bills were passed, and yet there was a dissolution in the same year; and if the Government had properly conducted the business of the Session, they would not have had so great difficulty in passing their three Reform Bills, and dissolving in the same year, as was experienced in 1832. The right hon. Gentleman now intimated that he and his colleagues had changed their opinions upon the subject, and that they held piecemeal legislation to be the proper mode of proceeding with respect to the question of Reform; and he affected, moreover, to discover in the conduct of the late Government a precedent for this course. But there was this considerable difference—the late Government introduced their Bill at the very earliest possible moment. The right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire, as the organ of the late Government, made his statement in February; and he stated, in the most distinct manner, that the English Reform Bill would be followed immediately in the same Session by the Scotch and Irish Bills. They expressed no more than they showed they were able and willing to perform, whereas the present Government began the Session with loud boasts and empty promises, set aside the Reform Bill for gigantic and revolutionary measures of finance, and now, in the middle of June, found themselves face to face with a discontented Parliament and a deluded people. That was the position of affairs; and whether the noble Lord, who had special charge of these unlucky Bills, would take the advice to withdraw them all three, so freely tendered on both sides of the House, and by those organs of public opinion which gave a general support to the Government, it

Sir George Grey

[Second Night.]

of acts which only tend to delay. If the House wishes these Bills to be put off for two or three years, let them express that wish by a direct vote, and not under the shelter of professions of a desire to advance Reform lend themselves to Motions which only tend to defeat an object which successive Governments have proposed to effect, with a view to a safe and salutary amendment in the representation of the people.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he must congratulate the right hon. Baronet upon having made a speech which he must have been anxious to deliver on the Amendment of the hon. Member for Rye. The right hon. Gentleman said that was the question before the House, but he had heard the Speaker put the question that the Debate be now adjourned. Towards the conclusion of his address in answer to the hon. Member for Rye, the right hon. Gentleman did condescend to make some observations in reply to the statesmanlike speech of his hon. Friend the Member for the County of Ayr, and he wished to call the attention of the House, not to the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman against the Amendment of the hon. Member for Rye, but to those observations with which he attempted to reply to the statements of his hon. and gallant Friend. The right hon. Gentleman assumed an air of injured innocence, and said that this was one of those paltry attempts at procrastination and delay by which hon. Members on both sides, equally reluctant to sanction the provisions of this measure, had from time to time attempted to impede its progress. The right hon. Gentleman should recollect that, as far as the Opposition side of the House was concerned, up to the present moment not a single Amendment had been put from the Chair. It was true that two important Amendments were submitted to the House—one by the right hon. Chairman of Committees, a Gentleman certainly not connected, however remotely, with the party who sat on that side of the House; and the other by an hon. Member who stated that it was the pride of his life to be the devoted follower of the noble Lord at the head of the Government. And yet the right hon. Baronet could look across the table and taunt the Opposition with attempts at delay and procrastination when he knew as well as any man in the House that those who were most anxious to defeat the Bill sat upon the benches immediately behind him. But he would ask the right hon. Baronet, under what circumstances was it that his hon. and gallant Friend felt compelled by his duty to his constituents and to the country to submit the Motion for the adjournment of the Debate? The right hon. Baronet told them that as an earnest and sincere Reformer he was now convinced of the inutility and impossibility of proposing to reform the representation of the three countries in the same Session. When did that light dawn upon the mind of the right hon. Gentleman? Why was Parliament summoned a fortnight earlier than usual? [Sir GEORGE GREY: Not a fortnight—only ten days.] The right hon. Gentleman said it was only ten days. Well, be it ten days. Why was Parliament summoned any number of days earlier than usual? Why was it announced from the Throne that measures would be introduced for the reform of the representation of the three kingdoms? Why, above all, upon the very evening when the Reform Bill for England was introduced, were separate Bills for the Reform of Ireland and Scotland also introduced? And why, if the right hon. Gentleman's view was entertained by the Government, were those two Bills made to follow in the list of business night after night the Bill to Amend the Representation of the People in England? It was clear from the first that it was then in the mind of Her Majesty's Government—and most properly so—to reform Parliament in the three divisions of the Empire, if not simultaneously, clearly within the limits of the present Session of Parliament. He asked whose fault was it that the Session was so far advanced that in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government now it was impossible to pass three Reform Bills? Was it the fault of the Opposition? He would like to know when in the annals of Parliament measures of such vast importance had received such slight consideration and discussion as that with which the financial measures of the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been allowed to pass. If there were any fault—and he admitted that there was—it was not the fault of the House of Commons or of the Opposition, but of Her Majesty's Ministers, who, by their treatment of the business of the House, had shown that they did not regard the reform of the representation of the people as the first, the greatest, and the most paramount duty which they had to discharge. Parliament was called together earlier than usual and was suffered

Sir George Grey

to dawdle away time until the health of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was re-established. Why was the Reform Bill not proceeded with at once; why was it subordinated to and placed behind the financial measures of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and why was the interest of the Session concentrated upon those revolutionary financial measures? The conduct of the Government taught Parliament and the country that they regarded free commerce with France, and the measures which hinged upon it, as of paramount importance, and Reform of the Representation as a matter of merely secondary consideration. Thus it was that, at the end of the first week in June, Her Majesty's Ministers found themselves reduced to the pitiable condition that they were compelled, as they said, to throw over the Irish and Scotch Bills, and to make an attempt—he believed only a colourable attempt—to proceed some stage further with the Reform Bill for England. When, on Monday last, for the first time, the noble Lord made the unexpected announcement that it was the intention of the Government not to proceed this Session with the Scotch and Irish Reform Bills, every hon. Gentleman representing Ireland and Scotland found the position completely changed; and that it was no longer possible for them, with the high and manly feelings which they undoubtedly entertained, to submit in silence to this extraordinary change in the policy of Her Majesty's Government. The feeling was not confined to the Opposition. It at once became incumbent on the Representatives of Ireland and Scotland, without reference to considerations of party, to mark their sense of the mode in which the interests confided to their charge were slighted and neglected by the conduct of Her Majesty's Government. It was then that his hon. and gallant Friend was induced to put on the paper notice of the Motion on which the right hon. Baronet had remarked. That Motion not being in order, his hon. and gallant Friend, determined to mark his sense of the conduct of the Government, did not yield to the technical objection, but took a course, which he ventured to say would call the attention of the House and the country to the extraordinary position of these Reform Bills in a most pointed manner. The hon. and gallant Gentleman deserved the gratitude of the House and the country for the temperate and manly manner in which he had discharged his difficult and delicate task. He could not sit silently by, therefore, and hear the right hon. Gentleman treat his hon. and gallant Friend as though he was a mere novice, ignorant of the forms of the House, of the history of the country, and of the spirit of the Constitution. On the contrary, he had shown that he was thoroughly acquainted with the history and the Constitution of the country and that he was thoroughly alive to the importance of the subject, which the right hon. Baronet had greatly under valued. The right hon. Gentleman gave the House to understand that it was almost impossible for a dissolution of Parliament to take place in the year in which the Reform Bill was passed; but in 1832 two or three Reform Bills were passed, and yet there was a dissolution in the same year; and if the Government had properly conducted the business of the Session, they would not have had so great difficulty in passing their three Reform Bills, and dissolving in the same year, as was experienced in 1832. The right hon. Gentleman now intimated that he and his colleagues had changed their opinions upon the subject, and that they held piecemeal legislation to be the proper mode of proceeding with respect to the question of Reform; and he affected, moreover, to discover in the conduct of the late Government a precedent for this course. But there was this considerable difference—the late Government introduced their Bill at the very earliest possible moment. The right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire, as the organ of the late Government, made his statement in February; and he stated, in the most distinct manner, that the English Reform Bill would be followed immediately in the same Session by the Scotch and Irish Bills. They expressed no more than they showed they were able and willing to perform, whereas the present Government began the Session with loud boasts and empty promises, set aside the Reform Bill for gigantic and revolutionary measures of finance, and now, in the middle of June, found themselves face to face with a discontented Parliament and a deluded people. That was the position of affairs; and whether the noble Lord, who had special charge of these unlucky Bills, would take the advice to withdraw them all three, so freely tendered on both sides of the House, and by those organs of public opinion which gave a general support to the Government, it was not for him to say; but of this he was convinced, that the country must feel grateful to the hon. and gallant Gentleman for having so pointedly and so ably called the attention of Parliament and the country to the anomalous position in which this most important question, which had long agitated and distracted the country, was placed; and that the conduct of the Government would be reprobated from one end of the kingdom to the other as fully as it deserved.

[Second Night.]

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, that as a Scotch Member he could not assent to the proposition that the English Reform Bill should be stopped because the Government intended to postpone the Scotch and Irish Reform Bills till next Session. That proposition, while it would damage the English Bill, would not in the slightest degree advance the interest of Scotland or Ireland. It was urged as an argument in favour of that proposition, that if the Scotch and Irish Bills were postponed until the English Bill was passed, those Bills would have to be considered by a moribund Parliament; but that, he thought, would be an advantage instead of a disadvantage, because those Bills would, so far as the English Members were concerned, be discussed by men whose opinions would not be influenced by a dread of offending their constituents. He had not concealed from his constituents or from the Government his opinion that the interests of Scotland had not been fairly considered in the distribution of seats proposed by the Government, but he had told his constituents that their prospect of obtaining redress lay in appealing to the justice of the English Members. That appeal, however, would not be made more successfully if they assisted in not merely delaying but destroying the English Bill. When that Bill went into Committee the Scotch Members would have an opportunity of making their appeal to the English Members. The Scotch and Irish Members would have had reason to complain of the Government if, at the commencement of the Session, Reform Bills for Scotland and Ireland had not been introduced simultaneously with the Reform Bill for England. In the present state of the business of the House, it was not unreasonable to propose that the Scotch and Irish Bills should be postponed. There was nothing in the history of legislation or in the practice of Parliament to make it imperatively necessary that the Scotch and Irish Bills should proceed, pari passu, with the English Bill; and he felt, therefore, it to be his duty to oppose the Motion of the hon. Baronet.

Lord John Manners

MR. LONGFIELD said, he should support the Motion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, as it would lead at once to that which must certainly take place sooner or later—the postponement of the English Reform Bill sine die, and would afford the Government an opportunity of bringing in next Session a general Reform Bill totus, teras, atque rotundus, dealing with the United Kingdom as a whole. Looking at the number of Amendments on the paper, he maintained that there was not the slightest probability that the Bill could pass during the present Session. Those Amendments were directed to almost every detail of the Bill, and if carried would so thoroughly revolutionize the spirit in which it had been framed that entirely new machinery would become requisite to carry out its provisions. It was merely a question of time when the Ministry would think it right to announce that the business of the Session did not admit of the Bill being proceeded with; and it was a mere anomaly to go into Committee to consider one, two, or three Amendments, out of sixty or seventy which had to be disposed of. It had been said that the Opposition were guilty of bringing forward Motions which could not be carried, in order that the measure might be indefinitely postponed. He denied that such a charge could with justice be made against hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House. The blame was really attributable to the period of the Session at which the Bill had been brought forward. Who did not recollect the triumph with which it was introduced on the 1st of March—the noble Lord's fortunate day, “his crowning mercy of Worcester,” “his Day of Dunbar,” “his Battle of Austerlitz”—for equally with Cromwell and Napoleon he had yielded himself up to a petty superstition in being an observer of days and times—and no day would do for him for the purpose but the one in which he had slain and scattered his foes to the winds. With what pride had he not turned to his hon. Friends at either side, and with what blank dismay their faces met this, for it was only the noble Lord who had the good fortune to remember the circumstance which had dwelt so tenaciously in his memory, that on the 1st of March thirty years ago he had introduced the Bill to regenerate his country. If the present measure had been brought forward, not with an eye to coincidences, but with the serious intention of passing it into law, would it not have been submitted to the House upon the 1st of February? He did not set himself up as a modern Reformer in any sense of the word. He was not one of those who thought it impossible to carry on the business of the country unless the House were composed of representatives chosen by £6 householders, or by constituencies definitely fixed at 6,000 or 7,000. He believed that by "Reformers" were frequently understood those who set themselves to imagine inefficiency and the reasons for it, instead of making the best of the existing appliances. He believed that the hon. Gentlemen whom he was then addressing were just as capable of conducting the business of the country with dignity and efficiency, as would be the case if the most ideal Reformer of modern times, after covering quires of paper, and convening meetings innumerable to give effect to his views, were allowed to carry out all his crotchets, and suffered to return Members of Parliament by £8 or £6 constituencies, or by household suffrage. It was always the bad workman who complained of his tools, and instead of taking the slightest trouble to cut down the Army Estimates, which they alleged to proceed from an abuse of aristocratical power, "Reformers" spent their time complaining that the Members of the House of Commons were not selected by a certain number of £6 voters. He was not the advocate of change, but he accepted it as a painful necessity that certain alterations in the manner of electing Members were inevitable. But while admitting that the nauseous draught must be taken, he thought that the only way in which the change could be fairly carried out was by an equitable redistribution of seats in England, Ireland, and Scotland, which must be accomplished by the withdrawal of the separate Bills and the introduction of one general measure. By the course which the Government adopted in bringing forward a separate measure for England they prevented Irish and Scotch Members from feeling any interest in the question. What was it to them that Tiverton, Tamworth, and Tavistock—principally to be remembered by the alliteration—were spared, while Guildford and Hertford were smitten? What interest had Irish Members in the fate of those three happy T's—the teetotums he might call them? To them it was perfectly indifferent what course might be pursued in England; what family boroughs returning Whigs were spared, while increasing boroughs returning Tories were swept away. As long as the same number of Members were returned for England, it was matter of comparative indifference how they were distributed; for injustice to Ireland would equally be perpetrated. Indeed, if additional Members were not to be given to Ireland, he could not see what that country wanted with a Reform Bill. There had been one in 1832, and another in 1842, the third time he supposed was the charm; and the opportunity was to be taken of usurping on behalf of the peerage the representation of the Irish peasantry. If a general Reform Bill for the United Kingdom were introduced, the rights of the different countries could be fairly and equitably considered; but the consequence of dealing separately would be that neither Scotch nor Irish Members would have an opportunity of urging the respective claims of their countries from an Imperial point of view. At the time of the Union, Lord Castlereagh made a calculation, based on population, revenue, exports and imports, showing that Ireland was entitled to 108 Members; but, with that partiality for round numbers to which many persons were prone, he reduced the number to 100, which had since been raised to 105. If a calculation were now made, Ireland, upon the basis of the population, would be entitled to 164 Members, and on the score of revenue to 82. The mean of these two numbers would be 123, but he was willing to fix it at 118. All that the Government Bill proposed to allow was four additional Members, to be divided equally between Scotland and Ireland. Further to illustrate the inequality of the representation, it would only be necessary to instance the county of Cork, which was as large as any four or five counties in England, with the exception of Yorkshire, being 110 miles long and seventy broad, its population amounting to 600,000 or 700,000, nearly equalled that of Wales; and it had 15,000 registered electors, principally of the better class. Adding the boroughs included within the limits of this great county, it only returned eight Members to Parliament, while Devonshire, which was not more than half the size, returned twenty-two, and Wales, with an equal population, returned twenty-eight. They had, therefore, an irresistible case in favour of regulating the representation of the entire kingdom, instead of passing a Bill dealing with it in detail. It was really impossible the present Bill could make any progress. The Estimates must be brought on; could another Vote on account be taken? The noble Lord (Lord John Russell) had said that a very slight reduction was ever made on the Estimates, when introduced. But this was only because they were brought in late in the Session, when the Members of the House were worn out and wearied, mind and body. It was morally certain that the Bill could not progress; but a few evenings were at the disposal of the Government, and there were seventy Amendments to be considered. The measure must have an end, and he advised the Government to withdraw it quietly with a graceful bow and as much magniloquence as they pleased. His object in voting for the Motion of the hon. Member for Ayrshire was not delay—that had been fully attained by the course of the Government itself and the long speeches of the hon. Gentlemen behind them, who had so often found occasion

[Second Night.]

“To hint a fault, and hesitate dislike.”

His object was not delay, but justice; and that would be best obtained by supporting the Motion.

MR. INGRAM said, he had heard with regret the statement of the noble Lord the Member for the City, that he was willing to consider the propriety of raising the proposed franchise. If the franchise established by the Bill were changed from a £6 holding to one of £7 or £8, or if the franchise were made a rating instead of a rental one, the whole character of the measure would be destroyed. With regard to his own constituency (Boston), he had just received a return which he knew to be correct, showing that the Bill as it stood would increase the number of electors by 1,000; but if a rating franchise were substituted for that fixed by the Bill the increase would only be 97. He would sooner have no Reform Bill during the present Session at all than enter on the consideration of the present measure with the view of altering the proposed franchise from a rental to a rating. An alteration of the franchise from £6 to £7 or £8 would not be satisfactory to the working classes, who were fully entitled to the franchise proposed by the Bill. If the holding were altered from £6 to a higher amount he believed the agitation would continue for years to come. What antagonism existed between the £6 householders and those of £7. The £10 householders who now had the franchise showed no opposition of interests of those of £12. What grounds were there for supposing that the class to be enfranchised had interests opposed to those of the other inhabitants of the boroughs in which they resided? He would rather see the Bill postponed to another Session than that any alteration should be made in the £6 franchise, and he hoped to hear from the Government that they were determined to maintain it.

Mr. Longfield

MR. PERRY WATLINGTON was unwilling to occupy the time of the House, but as the representative of an important constituency, which would be largely and in a peculiar manner affected by the measure now under consideration, it seemed to be his duty to make a few observations upon this occasion. When he considered the conduct of previous Administrations upon this question he was free to admit that it had seemed to him that there was but one course open to Her Majesty's Government, and that was the course which they had thought it right to pursue. At the same time he could not believe that there was any strong feeling in favour of Reform at all throughout the country, much less did he believe that there was any strong feeling in favour of such a measure as that which had been introduced by the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. He was quite sure that there was no desire to press forward legislation merely for legislation's sake, or to complete a Bill which would be attended with any amount of risk. But, whilst he was quite prepared to admit the necessity which compelled Her Majesty's Government to introduce a Reform Bill during the present Session—since the measure they proposed had been introduced—the effect which it would have upon existing constituencies seemed to be so doubtful—the want of accurate statistical information so manifest, and the importance of that information so great, that he trusted the Government would see the wisdom of withdrawing for the present that Bill from the consideration of the House. It was true, indeed, that the House had agreed to the second reading of the Bill—it was true that they had thus affirmed its principle, but this principle, after all, was so wide and general that the whole work of legislation yet remained to be accomplished. That the principle agreed upon was a broad and general one, no one could doubt.

It was, indeed, simply the principle of extension of the suffrage, for what the principle was upon which the suffrage was to be extended had not yet been determined. No distinct reasons had been given for the details of the Bill. So much had to be accomplished he did not think the Bill could be passed this Session. The noble Lord had told them that it was his desire to increase the number of electors in the borough constituencies by one-half, but upon what principle this proportion was selected he had not shown. Why one-half was better than one-third, or better than two-thirds, he had left altogether unexplained. The noble Lord had told them that the Government had well considered this question—and it was certainly quite right that they should do so; that they had considered the question of the £9 franchise; that they thought that would not add a sufficient number to the present body of electors; that then they considered the question of the £8 franchise, and that that was rejected for the same reason. Then, said the noble Lord, we considered the question of the £7 franchise, but we did not stop here; we took the £6 franchise. But why the Government did not stop there, and why they took the £6 franchise, the noble Lord had not attempted to explain. If it were desirable simply to enlarge the constituencies by adding to the number of electors only, why add in so irregular a manner?—why should we double the constituencies of Bradford and Salford, triple the constituency of Wolverhampton, whilst the constituencies of Ashburton and Arundel will be increased only by one-half, and that of Honiton by one-sixth? If, on the other hand, it was desirable to enfranchise particular classes, why enfranchise these classes in a certain set of boroughs, and leave them unenfranchised in others, merely because the rents in one are higher than those in the other? The fact was, that though they had agreed to the second reading of the Bill, the real principles of the measure had yet to be discussed, and he did not believe that they could get through a satisfactory Bill this Session. Then, with respect to the Returns which had been laid before the House. If the extension of the suffrage was mainly to be in the direction of a diminution of the amount of rent, which gave a qualification, it did seem of great importance that they should be able to ascertain with tolerable accuracy the probable number of electors that would be added by the Bill. With respect to boroughs, the Returns had certainly been shown to be most unsatisfactory, neither were they less so as regarded counties. The Government had republished some of the results of the Returns of 1856, and the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department had given to the House certain calculations upon them. He had deducted 15 per cent for female occupiers, non-payment of poor rates, &c., from the number of occupiers of houses from £10 to £50 rateable value, in order to obtain the probable number of additional electors, and 50 per cent for other causes—a total deduction of 65 per cent—whilst he added nothing for the difference which a rental qualification would make, instead of a rating qualification, and nothing for the probable increase of £10 occupation since 1856. But even applying these principles to the case of South Essex it would appear from calculations that the effect upon South Essex would be to give to one town in the division, Stratford, 20 per cent of the whole electoral power, instead of 12 per cent which it now had—a very important alteration, and one upon which more accurate information ought to be obtained. It appeared from the Returns before the House that there were—

In South Essex of houses of rateable value, between £10 and £50	} 7,362
Deduct, according to Home Sec- retary's calculation, 65 per cent }	4,778
<hr/>
There would then be of new elec- tors by present Bill	} 2,584
Add present electors	6,701
<hr/>
New constituency	9,285

Now, he had ascertained that there were in Stratford alone 4,790 houses, at rents between £10 and £50—houses which, therefore, might give qualifications under the present Bill;—but, supposing only one-fourth of these were taken, that would give of new electors in Stratford 1,197, and adding to these 700 present electors, we should have 1,897 total electors in Stratford, out of a constituency of 9,285, or about 20 per cent, instead of 12 per cent, as at present.

The fact was, he believed, that no satisfactory calculations of numbers of electors, whose qualification is rent, could be obtained from Returns taken from the “gross estimated rental” column of our rate books. And why? First, because the term, "gross estimated rental" was differently understood by different people; and secondly, because, as that column was of little practical importance in our rate-books, and did not govern the rate, it was often very carelessly filled up by valuers and parochial officers. According to the view taken by the Poor Law Auditors, it meant the rent received by the landlord, the tenant and landlord each paying respectively his own proper charges and expenses; but he found it laid down in Mr. Lumley's book that the "gross estimated rental" signified the rent which the landlord would receive, suppose he were to pay the tenant's rates and taxes and his own. Now, there was a vast difference between those two opinions, and, it being impossible to arrive at any satisfactory conclusion from the Returns which had been furnished, he, for one, thought it was long ago expedient that the Bill should be postponed until further and more reliable information had been obtained. Then as regards the care with which this column in some parts of the country is filled up. In the Returns of 1856 he found that there were no fewer than 69 parishes in Cheshire, where the "gross estimated rental" was the same as the "rateable value," and 24 parishes in which no "gross estimated rental" was entered at all; whilst in Northumberland there were no less than 306 parishes where the "gross estimated rental" was the same as "the rateable value." How could calculations be made upon such uncertain data as these? The hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham told those indeed who sat upon that side of the House that the course they ought to follow was very plain and simple. He told them that it was their duty to accept this Bill of the noble Lord's as it were upon trust. The noble Lord said the hon. Gentleman knows much more of the subject than you do—he has given much more attention to the matter than you have done—he is not a statesman from whom you need dread any injury to the Constitution of the country—therefore, says the hon. Gentleman, it is your duty, aye, more, your obvious and pressing interest, to accept the measure which he has introduced. Now, he (Mr. Perry Watlington), differed entirely from the hon. Gentleman in his view of the fitness of the noble Lord for a leader of the Conservative party. As an humble Member of that party he could at any rate feel no confidence in the noble Lord. He could not forget that only last year the noble

[Second Night.

Mr. Perry Watlington

Lord, when occupying a seat upon the Opposition side of the House, told them that he could see no reason why a Reform Bill should not be introduced and carried during the autumn of that year; but, as soon as the noble Lord changed the side of the House upon which he sat, and took his place upon the Treasury Bench, he quickly found a reason why this should not be the case, though that reason was never satisfactorily explained to the House. Again, the noble Lord, in July last, repudiated altogether the idea of entering into a negotiation for a Commercial Treaty with France; and in this he was warmly supported by the noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government. Hon. Gentlemen went down, in consequence, to the country at the close of the Session, fully impressed with the belief that the policy of the Government was directly opposed to such a proceeding. They returned to find that the negotiations for a Treaty were not only commenced, but fully completed, and the Treaty itself signed. Again, he (Mr. Perry Watlington) could not but remember that in 1852 the noble Lord introduced a measure for Parliamentary Reform; in 1854, he also introduced a measure for the same purpose. But the principles of those measures differed, and they both differed from that of 1860; and he believed that, if a longer tenure of office was granted to the noble Lord, he would, in 1861, introduce another measure differing in principle from all three, and, perhaps, one that would be more in accordance than his present Bill is with the wants and wishes of the people of this country. For such reasons as these he felt no confidence in the noble Lord as a political leader, and he differed most completely from the hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham in the view which he took of his duty and his obvious and pressing interest. He confessed when he first heard the hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham declaiming with that warmth and energy by which his addresses were characterized; when he heard him with so much earnestness and apparent sincerity explaining to him his duty, he felt almost inclined to say, surely the hon. Gentleman must be right, and I have mistaken the course I ought to follow with regard to this Bill; but when he further considered the matter, when he calmly reflected upon the advice that had been given, he asked himself this simple question—Why should he follow the advice which the hon. Gentleman gave to him as one of his audience in that place, rather than the advice which he would have given to him had he been one of his audience elsewhere? So he turned to an account of the meeting which had been held at Bradford last year, and he found that had he been fortunate enough to have been one of the hon. Gentleman's audience at that place, he should have been recommended to "repudiate without mercy any Bill of any Government, whatever its franchise, whatever its seeming concession, if it did not allot the seats obtained from the extinction of the small boroughs mainly among the great city and town population of the kingdom. This question of distribution is the very soul of the question of Reform." Surely in this there was an indication of the absolute necessity of an extensive re-distribution of seats. How, then, could the hon. Gentleman recommend him now to accept the Bill of the noble Lord? Again, upon the same occasion the hon. Gentleman said: "Well, shall we do the work, or shall we only nibble at it? If we are not to do it satisfactorily, we had better not attempt it at all. Unless we are ready to have a good Bill, let us have no Bill at all. A bad Bill is a revolutionary Bill; a little Bill, though it may not be revolutionary, is of no good, and is very perilous." And, in order to discover what, in the hon. Gentleman's opinion, a good Bill was, he had looked a little further, when he found that the following resolution had been carried at the meeting unanimously:—

"That the public opinion of the country is ripe for a large and comprehensive measure of Reform that will include the admission of £10 occupiers to the county franchise, the establishment of household suffrage in boroughs, vote by ballot, and a more equitable distribution of representatives to population; and pledges itself to use all constitutional means to procure the passing of a measure through Parliament in the ensuing Session that shall embrace these points."

With such views, how could the hon. Gentleman give him the advice that he did to accept the measure now introduced by the noble Lord? He had certainly heard since he had had the honour of a seat in that House many different views expressed as to the duties of a representative of the people, varying from the idea of a mere delegate to that of one possessed of complete independence; but the view which the hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham had put forth was a most extraordinary one indeed. According to that, they had not come there to represent the opinions of their constituents—they had not come there to express their own individual views; but they were there to follow the leading of a noble Lord, a Member of the hated and much-abused aristocracy, and he, too, one whose principles they had always most strongly repudiated upon the hustings. In such a view of his duty he could not concur; he could not follow the advice of the hon. Gentleman to accept the noble Lord as his leader; he must take the liberty to act in accordance with the dictates of his own conscience, and his views of what was right, which led him earnestly to express a hope that the noble Lord would withdraw his Bill until further and more exact information could be obtained to enable the House to legislate in a manner more satisfactory to the country and conducive to the public interests than their present information permitted.

MR. ALCOCK said, he was not disposed to deny that there existed an apparent apathy of the people upon this question, but he attributed it, not to diminished interest in Reform, but rather to the superabundant confidence they felt in the pledges of the Government, and their power to carry the measure through Parliament. Let Ministers turn their backs on the Bill, or let the House of Commons unwisely interpose to prevent its being carried, and they would arouse a feeling of disappointment and an amount of just indignation of which they could form no adequate conception. In the two counties with which he was connected—East Surrey, which he had the honour to represent, and North Lincolnshire, where he had property—the £10 franchise would double the constituency, and raise the number of the electors to about 20,000 in each of those two divisions. To refuse such a boon to the counties, after it had been assented to by the previous Government, would be a grievous injustice. With respect to the £6 franchise, he thought Earls Derby and Grey had done the working classes great injustice, attributing to them at once bad motives and dangerous objects, and had spoken of them in a very disparaging manner. The working classes were assuredly not actuated by base and personal motives; but they were too heavily taxed, and it was earnestly to be hoped that the time was coming when they would be able to exercise political power, and so to use it as to obtain their rights. Until lately they paid as much on each of the articles tea, sugar, malt, and tobacco, as was raised by the income tax on the whole property of the country. The income tax for one year up to Michaelmas last did not amount to £5,700,000; whilst the average amount of duty on tea, sugar, malt, and tobacco, was at that time as much, so that the revenue raised from these four necessities of life altogether was four times the amount of that derived from the income and property tax. He recollected having read a report in The Times of a public meeting in favour of Reform held by working men in Smithfield, in November, 1858, in which one of the speakers, after referring to the taxes on tea and sugar, two articles in which a working man spent about one-eighth of his earnings, asked, "Would this be suffered to exist for one moment if we had the power to elect representatives?" In all fairness, propriety, and justice, the working men of London were entitled to the franchise, and it was for the House to dare to throw out the Bill. He was most anxious to see the Reform Bill passed this Session. He was perfectly satisfied with it; and he hoped the noble Lord and his colleagues would either insist on its passing or dissolve Parliament.

[Second Night.]

Mr. CUMMING BRUCE said, he was disposed to think, if the English Reform Bill were postponed, the fact would in any degree create that indignation which had been referred to by the hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the House, nor did he think that his fellow-countrymen would go into mourning on hearing of the withdrawal of the Scotch Reform Bill; but of this he was very sure, as a Bill to amend the representation of the people of Scotland was inevitable sooner or later—as it had been promised, and so many were anxious to enjoy the franchise, it would be the grossest injustice if the Bill for England were proceeded with while the Scotch Bill was postponed, thus excluding all chance of claiming that due increase to the number of the representatives of Scotland to which she was fully entitled. The people of Scotland would be very grateful to the hon. Baronet for having brought forward this matter. He was glad to see present the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) who had long turned his attention to the claims of Scotland to an increase in the number of its representatives. If the Bill for England were proceeded with they would be excluded from anything more than the paltry addition of two Members. Was it not most unjust that Aberdeen, with a population of 100,000, and Inverness with a population of 90,000, should be only allowed a single Member each, whilst many smaller places in England enjoyed a double representation? The noble Lord received the support of two-thirds of the Scotch Members, and it was therefore rather ungrateful of him to disregard the claims of Scotland, more especially as the Members for that country had never been returned by means of bribery or corruption. The noble Lord was a very able leader of the House, and he had been selected to drive the unicorn team which pulled the chariot of Reform. The first thing he did, however, was not only to discard the unicorn, but to reduce his team to a single old gray horse, which he expected would pull that heavy machine up hill. The people of Scotland were not disposed to accept an inferior position; and, without laying too much stress upon the whole contests between the lion and unicorn, he thought that they were entitled to demand that legislation for them upon this subject should proceed pari passu with that for England.

Mr. BAXTER said, that having addressed the House on the question of the Second Reading of the Bill he should not have again risen but for the pointed reference which had been made to him during this debate, by hon. Gentlemen who had spoken from the opposite side of the House. He wished therefore to say a few words in explanation of the course which he had thought it his duty to take last year, and the course which he intended to take that evening, in regard to the question of reform. He would remind the House that the circumstances under which the House was now asked to go on with this Bill were very different from those under which he last year proposed his Resolution that the House would deal with the representative system of the United Kingdom not by three separate Bills, but by a single measure. At that time Her Majesty's then Government had given notice of their intention of introducing a Bill for amendment of the representation of the people to be confined to England alone, and had given no promise that they would bring in a Bill to amend the representation in Scotland. His impression was then, as now, that such a Bill never had an existence, and he thought it his duty to call the attention of the House at that time to the injustice of proceeding in that manner. He felt very strongly that it would have been far better to have considered the whole subject in one Bill than in three different measures. However, his proposition did not meet with the general acceptance of the House, and, in deference to many appeals which had been made to him, he withdrew the Motion. But now the circumstances were different. They had arrived at the month of June, and believing that the people of Scotland were extremely anxious for a reform of her own representative system, he had to ask himself what was the best and most likely mode by which that object might be attained as speedily as possible? He could not shut his eyes to the fact that at the time of the year it was altogether out of the question that the House should pass Reform Bills for all the three kingdoms, and therefore, as a friend of reform, he felt it his duty to do his utmost to secure the passing of this measure with the certainty that in that case the Bills for Ireland and Scotland would follow as a matter of course early in the next Session of Parliament. Therefore he could not support the proposition of the Member for Ayrshire (Sir James Fergusson), nor could he separate that Motion from the policy which had of late characterized the whole proceedings of the Opposition in reference to this question, namely, a policy of delay and of obstructing the public business, which he scarcely expected from the great Conservative party in that House. By speaking against time, by prolonging the discussion in the most unnecessary manner, and by frequent attempts to count out the House, even during the consideration of the Army Estimates, they had endeavoured to prevent this Reform Bill, which they had not the manliness openly to oppose, from passing into a law during the present Session. He believed that the Motion of his hon. Friend, (Sir James Fergusson) was only a part of that policy, and he should think himself wanting in his duty to Scotland, as well as wanting in his duty to the cause of reform generally, did he for one moment entertain the idea of giving to that Motion his support. At the same time, he hoped that if no progress was to be made this Session, that eventually there would be legislation on this subject in the way which his hon. Friend had pointed out. He certainly adhered to the opinion that this question ought to be dealt with, not by three separate Bills, but by one general measure, under which plan alone could Ireland and Scotland fairly raise the question of their claims to a redistribution of Members, and he only regretted that his hon. Friend had not last year supported his Resolution, which had for its object the attainment of that result. An hon. Gentleman opposite had referred to the claims of Ireland to additional Members; but he reminded the hon. Gentleman that the Returns supplied to the House a year or two ago showed that upon the basis of population and taxation Scotland was entitled to nineteen additional representatives, while Ireland had now one too many. For the reason he had given, he could not support the Motion of his hon. Friend.

Mr. Alcock

MR. GEORGE said, that notwithstanding the hon. Member for Montrose had accused every one who stood up on the Conservative side of the House of being actuated by obstructive motives, he should endeavour to express his views on the question before the House. He was not one of those who thought that an Irishman was to be precluded from expressing his opinion on matters affecting the United Kingdom. He considered that the whole subject should be dealt with in an united Bill; and when the Bill for Ireland was indefinitely postponed, he thought, as an Irishman, he had good reason to complain. It was impossible to alter the franchise in England without indirectly affecting the representation of Ireland. If the franchise was reduced in England to £10 for counties and £6 for boroughs, it would be impossible even for a single Session to maintain the franchise in Ireland at £12 for counties and £8 for boroughs. He was of opinion that those franchises ought to be maintained in Ireland, and therefore he was much interested in any question of an alteration in the suffrage in England. The original franchise in Ireland—almost from the time of Henry VIII.—was the old 40s. freehold franchise. That went on increasing to an inordinate degree; so that there was scarcely a rood of land without its voter. Even every garden and every tree qualified a voter. In 1792 or 1793 the electoral franchise was most properly and rightly conferred on the Roman Catholics in Ireland; but afterwards it was found that the constituencies had become so unwieldy that an election sometimes lasted for twenty-one days. Accordingly in 1829, when the question of Roman Catholic emancipation came to be considered, it was found necessary to extirpate the 40s. franchise and to substitute in its stead a £50 freehold and a £20 leasehold franchise, with some £5 and other franchises which were not worth mentioning. It was, however, found in 1849 that owing to famine, and emigration, and other causes, the number of electors had been lamentably and fearfully reduced from the figure at which it stood immediately after the Act of 1829. In 1849 and 1850 the population of Ireland was about 6,000,000, while the entire number of electors was only about 34,000. In the county which he had the honour to represent, out of a population of 180,000 there were not more than 1,000 electors, and in the year 1849 and in the year 1850 the number of voters had decreased to 815. A Bill was that year passed creating an entirely new franchise in Ireland—an occupation franchise of £12 for counties and £8 for boroughs. That franchise was on the rating and not on the rental. A general valuation of the country had been made, and all parties were agreed as to it. The basis of rating was therefore one that gave satisfaction, and he should recommend its adoption in England instead of a basis of rental. It ought to be borne in mind that there was reform legislation for Ireland so late as 1850, and many reasons might exist for altering the franchise of a country in which there had been no such legislation since 1832, which might not apply to one the franchise of which had been remodelled at so comparatively a recent period as 1850. So great had been the alteration made in the number of voters in Ireland by the Bill of 1850, that the electoral body had been raised from 34,000 to 173,000. It was impossible to argue, then, that it was necessary to increase the numbers of the constituencies on the ground that they were too small, either in Ireland at large, or in the particular counties to which he had referred; and he contended that the question of English representation could not possibly be disposed of with fairness to Ireland, and the same might be said as to Scotland, without bearing in mind the circumstances and necessities of these two parts of the kingdom. A £12 rating franchise in the counties of Ireland, and an £8 rating franchise in the boroughs, constituted a fair representation, and speaking of one large constituency in that country he could take upon himself to say, without reference to politics or religion, that he did not know one out of that 6,400 electors that he would willingly see deprived of the franchise at this moment; but he was equally certain if the proposed Reform Bill for Ireland were carried, and 1,191 new votes were added to that particular constituency, that, so far from improving, it would greatly detract from the respectability of that constituency. What applied to one county was applicable to all. He would not enter into the question whether the representation of Ireland might not be amended in other respects. But with regard to a distribution of seats that was a question which required the subject to be postponed till it was before them as a whole. He did not believe it possible to legislate for England by itself without indirectly affecting the representation of Ireland, and he was inclined to think that it would be better to give England a franchise of £12 and £8, as it existed in Ireland, than to give to Ireland a £10 and a £6 franchise, as would be the case if they dealt with the state of the English franchise alone. Upon these grounds he could not be a party to advancing further with the measure relating to England.

Mr. PEASE said, he believed that the country was anxious for the time when deeds should give place to words, and he would not, therefore, detain the House at any length. For thirty years he had been connected with the working classes, and it appeared that the observations which had been made in reference to them had been made from the want of practical information upon the subject. Hon. Members seemed to have formed their opinion of the working classes from what they had seen of them at the hustings, when even children were in the habit of making a noise; but from what he (Mr. Pease) had seen of them—having been intimately associated with them in business, in commerce, and in the various institutions established for their benefit, he was prepared to say that, whatever the number proposed to be enfranchised by the Government Bill might be, whether 300,000 or more, inspired him with no alarm. The right hon. Member for Hertfordshire (Sir E. B. Lytton) had imagined a conversation between a candidate and an elector on the elector being asked for his vote, and he apprehended that many of them would know nothing about China. Now, in the course of his (Mr. Pease's) canvass he was rather closely catechised by a working man as to the conduct of England in reference to the opium trade, and also, as to what was to be done about the revenue of the church by a miner in his working dress; but he told him that as he did not think they would be dealt with by the Parliament of his time, he had not given the matter his consideration. He could, however, assert that the working classes took an intelligent interest in what was done by that House. They drew upon the working classes to enable them to carry on their wars, and a heavy burden of taxation had been imposed upon them, which they bore with a magnanimity greatly to their credit. The numbers of those classes greatly increased, and why should they not have a greater share in returning representatives to Parliament? The subject had been recommended to them by Her Majesty in her Speech from the Throne, and two Governments in succession had said that a reform of the representation was necessary, and it would be greatly to be deprecated if it should go forth throughout the land that that House had spent weeks in idle talk, as being afraid of infusing too democratic an element into their councils. The language sometimes used in speaking of the working classes was, he thought, greatly to be deprecated, for, with very few exceptions, they looked up to persons of station in society as their representatives. He trusted that the House would not endanger its reputation or shake the confidence now reposed in it by postponing the consideration of this Bill in Committee.

Mr. George

MR. STIRLING said, he did not think the remarks of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down were relevant to the question then under discussion. That question indeed was most important, and had been too long neglected; and he therefore felt grateful to his hon. Friend the Member for Ayrshire, and was glad that the matter had been brought forward in so able a manner by a Scotch Member even at so late a moment. He could not think, however, that either that side of the House or his hon. Friend was responsible for the delay. He was tempted to rise on that occasion by the remarks which had fallen from the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter). That hon. Member had accused hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Opposition benches especially, with endeavouring to obstruct and delay the passing of this Bill; but looking at the history of these debates he believed he was entitled to say that obstruction had come quite as much from one side as the other. The present Motion, it was true, had been made at a late period, but that was mainly owing to the hon. Member for Montrose himself, who placed a notice upon the paper several weeks ago for the discussion of the very point which was now under consideration, the hon. Gentleman being of opinion that Scotland was entitled to a larger share in the representation than the Scottish Reform Bill conferred upon it. That notice appeared on the paper about the middle of May, and until last Monday he (Mr. Stirling) had not the least idea that it had been withdrawn. He thought, therefore, that some hon. Member for Scotland or Ireland was bound to bring the question before the House. So far were the Scotch Members from doing anything to delay the Bill that, up to that moment, very few of them had taken part in the discussions. Indeed, with the exception of his hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Black), who made an able and damaging speech against the Bill, he could not then call to mind the name of a single Scotch Member who had spoken since the discussion on the introduction of the measure. On that occasion he himself ventured to remark that great disappointment would be felt in Scotland at the circumstance that it was not proposed to increase the number of Members for several important places. He was of opinion that five counties justly deserved such an increased representation—he alluded to Lanark, Ayr, Fife, Perth, which he had the honour to represent, and Aberdeen—counties which possessed a population varying from 150,000 to 200,000, who bore their full share of the burden and impost of taxation. That day he had received from the University Court of the University of Glasgow a memorial addressed by them to the noble Lord at the head of the Government, and to that memorial he begged to call the attention of the Lord Advocate, not only because the right hon. Gentleman was the representative of the Government in this House for Scotch affairs, and the introducer of the Scotch Reform Bill, but because he held an office of dignity and trust in the University of Glasgow, which he (Mr. Stirling) had once the honour to fill. In their memorial the University Court said—

“In the Bill now before the House of Commons it is proposed to give to the four Scottish Universities only one representative—a concession which is totally inadequate to satisfy their just demands, and would be attended in its working with much practical inconvenience.”

He had lately been in correspondence with several persons in Scotland, who were acquainted with its Universities, and he would undertake to prove at the proper time that the number of persons who would be represented under the Bill by this single Member, was much more considerable than the learned Lord seemed to think, and that if the Universities in England had five representatives in this House, the Universities of Scotland might fairly claim two. Now, supposing the English Reform Bill to pass and the House to assent to the proposition that it would be an injustice to refuse additional Members to the places he had named, how, he asked, would they then be able to repair that injustice? Why, it would be utterly out of their power. There was another point to which he would advert for a moment. He was never more surprised in his life than when he heard the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary inform the House the other evening that he saw no difficulty in passing a Reform Bill for England in the present Session and leaving until next Session the duty of passing similar measures for Scotland and Ireland. To adopt such a course would, as it was well put by the right hon. Member for Bucks, have the effect of disqualifying for one or more Sessions all the English Members of the House. The right hon. Gentleman would no longer represent the constituency of Buckinghamshire. The noble Viscount at the head of the Government would not represent the constituency of Tiverton; and the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary would not represent the constituency of London. He had the greatest respect for the Scotch and Irish representatives, but he had no desire that they should be promoted into a sort of Rump Parliament, and become the only Members of the House who were strictly qualified to legislate for the nation. Next Session they would have to meet the great deficit which the Budget for this year had so marvellously provided, and, it was not beyond the range of possibility, that provision would at the same time have to be made for the expense of a European war. Surely, therefore, they ought to take care that no disqualification should be attached to any portion of the Parliament which would be called upon to dispose of these great and important questions. Under these circumstances he thought that the statement of the noble Lord might well create astonishment through the length and breadth of the land. As a test of the opinion of the House upon the reasonableness of the noble Lord's views, he hoped his noble Friend would divide the House upon his Motion.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, it was his intention in the few observations he was about to make, not to allude to the general features of the Reform Bill, but to confine himself to the observations which had fallen from hon. Gentlemen on the other side respecting the Irish and Scotch Bills. He had listened to the hon. Member for Ayrshire (Sir James Ferguson) with that pleasure which he always experienced in hearing a well-composed, well-expressed, and well-delivered speech, but he wished that the hon. Gentleman had had a more consistent topic and a more consistent Motion. The professed object of his hon. Friend, was to point out the importance of considering the Reform Bills affecting the three countries at the same time. But his Motion had not the slightest connection with that subject, and could not even have the smallest bearing upon it. The House was about to enter on an adjourned debate upon a Motion declaring it inexpedient to proceed with the Reform Bill until the result of the Census had been obtained. By a singular caprice, which had not, however, been very unusual in that debate, the details of the measure had been discussed on the Motion for the second reading, and they were now, on going into Committee, met with a Motion to postpone or destroy the Bill altogether. But not content with that, his hon. Friend the Member for Ayrshire moved that the debate upon that very question be adjourned. What result he expected to arrive at from such a Motion it was not easy to understand. His object was that the English Reform Bill should be withdrawn, inasmuch as the Irish and Scotch Bills were not brought forward at the same time. But if the Motion on which the debate was adjourned were carried the Bill would be substantially withdrawn, and therefore the present Motion would not bring him one step nearer to his object. It was not easy to follow out the logic of his hon. Friend's speech, or to reach his conclusions; but the substance of his argument appeared to be that it was wrong to split the question of Reform into three separate Bills for England, Scotland, and Ireland—that it ought all to be embraced in one measure—and that, as it was not so, none of the Bills ought to be proceeded with. He went on to argue that the Bills could not be proceeded with this Session, because they could not be properly considered at morning sittings, when the House was wearied of the subject. Having thus cut off the possibility of legislating this Session, he then proceeded to cut off the possibility of legislating for next Session also. He argued that they must not count upon legislating next Session, because they might be then in troublous times. He also argued that a moribund Parliament, as he called it—a Parliament which was doomed—ought not to take cognizance of great public questions. But if that argument were carried out to its legitimate result, no Parliament could ever pass a Reform Bill. For, according to his reasoning, a Parliament which passed a Reform Bill was doomed and moribund by that very act. But he (the Lord Advocate) entirely demurred to the constitutional view of the question which he had heard from very great authorities in the House upon that subject. He denied altogether that because a Reform Bill had been passed the House which passed it ceased to represent the constituencies of the country. There was no foundation whatever for such a doctrine. Many measures might be passed affecting the representation of the people, either general measures in regard to the whole country and the whole franchise, or measures to affect only a part of the franchise and of the constituency. Take the case of a Registration Bill, to alter the registration of voters, which might very materially affect the constituencies of the country. But would any man tell him that, until a subsequent dissolution, the House of Commons were not the representatives of the people? It was quite clear that if the English Bill were passed this Session there could be no registration in order to have a dissolution in less than a year and a half, and if the hon. Member really desired that the Scotch and Irish Bills should be considered, there was a very simple and easy mode which might have suggested itself to his ingenious mind. The hon. Gentleman might have gone to his friends and said, "Do not let us in the month of June waste the precious moments before going into Committee on the English Bill. Let us go into Committee upon it, and possibly the Government will relinquish the notion of giving up the other two Bills; but, at all events, if we pass the English Bill we can come, not in a weary autumn Session, but fresh in February, to consider the Scotch and Irish Bills, to pass them before Easter, and to have a general election under the three Acts at the same time." There was nothing to prevent that simple plan being adopted, and all those bugbears which the hon. Gentleman had reared up to show the evil and danger of passing one Bill were really pure delusions of his own.

Mr. Stirling

He wanted to know what hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition bench were going to say to this Motion. Did they hold that it was unconstitutional to pass a Reform Bill for England, and to postpone the Bills for Scotland and Ireland? If they did, why had they not given expression to their views before? The Bills were introduced separately. They were observed upon the night of their introduction. The second reading of the English Bill had passed without a division, and not a word had been heard from any one to argue that the three Bills ought to have been passed together. His hon. Friend the Member for Ayrshire spoke on the introduction of the Scotch Bill. If he held his present views then, why did he not express them? Since 1832 the question whether it was more convenient to deal with the whole representation of the United Kingdom in one or in three Bills, had been considered over and over again, and the conclusion always had been that it was better to take the three kingdoms separately. They were taken separately in 1832, in 1852, in 1855, and they were now separate in 1860, and it was only when they were going into Committee on the English Bill, after the second reading had passed without a division, and when the question was raised whether or not they should adjourn the consideration of the measure till after the Census of 1861, that Gentlemen opposite had discovered that the question should not be dealt with in separate Bills. The real inference was plain enough. He should not stop to point it out. He had heard the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) say, "The question is not of putting them into one Bill, but of withdrawing the two Bills." But that was not what the hon. Member for Ayrshire said. He said, "Do not let us go wearied and fagged into the consideration of the Scotch Bill in August." He said they ought to go on with the three Bills pari passu. But they could not go into Committee with the three Bills pari passu. They must consider them clause by clause, and one after another. Why talk of withdrawing the Irish and Scotch Bills? Did hon. Gentlemen opposite affect to doubt that if they would only help the Government to go into Committee—if they would only do what he thought they ought to do—and consider the details of the English Bill that the Government might even this Session proceed with the Scotch and Irish Bills? If those Bills were withdrawn it would be because it was plain that there was no time to pass them. But why was there no time to pass them? He would not stop to answer the question. [Ironical cheers.] He was not going to be betrayed into an argument upon the general character of the Bills; but there were a few observations he desired to make. It was said, in the first place, that the people were indifferent to the Bill—that they were not enthusiastic about it. That statement was true to a large extent if it was meant to compare the present state of feeling with what took place in 1832; but if there was less enthusiasm than in 1832 there were plain and manifest reasons for it. The gross abuses in the system of Government which had been long growing up in the State, and which had culminated in 1832, had since been entirely swept away. It should be remembered that a nation never did stir itself as this nation did in 1832 unless there was good and real ground for it. He should be sorry to see the nation stirred as it was in 1832, for it was manifest that a period of public excitement was not the best for the correction of public abuses. He was glad to say that in this country we could discuss measures for giving a larger portion of power to a lower class than now possessed it, without such excitement as prevailed in 1832, and there was nothing that gave him more hope as to the future prospects of this country than that fact. The question of the representation was now a simple matter of legislation that might take place just as any ordinary legislation; and happily they were in such circumstances of peace and tranquillity that they might do so with effect. Hon. Gentlemen opposite had been looking to the future, and saying that other times might not be so quiet as the present. Why, then, did they not help the Government to legislate on this question now? But it was said that the working classes admitted by the Bill would overwhelm the present constituency. He had no distrust of the working classes. He believed that the accession which they would draw from the working classes by the Bill would add fresh, new, and vigorous blood to the constituencies. Under what was categorically called the working classes was embraced a great variety of interests and a great portion of ability, industry, honesty, and intelligence. He believed the upper portion of the working classes would bring to the exercise of the franchise an intelligence and an interest in political affairs which perhaps they would not find among many of those embraced in the present constituency. Hon. Gentlemen talked as if the measure would overwhelm and swamp the old constituencies, but it was a vain imagination to suppose that the working men would band themselves together for one candidate, or for the promotion of certain peculiar ideas. They would often go with the classes above them, and they would be split into parties by differences of opinion, just as the constituencies were at the present moment. The traditions of this country led people to look to the upper ranks, and it was a mere chimera to suppose that by this Bill they were opening the flood-gates of democracy and undermining the foundations of the Constitution. They were told of trades unions and strikes, but would the fancy franchises of the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman opposite have saved them from the trades unions? They embraced the very men who were in the trades unions; for it was not the reckless portion of the working classes, but the intelligent among them, who were members of these associations. The trades unions might show that they were not good political economists, especially when they thought they could keep up by combination the price of their labour, but he would not say on that account that they were not fit to vote for Members of Parliament. If that argument were carried to its legitimate result it would affect the franchise of more than the working classes. The question before the House was whether the Amendment on the order for resuming the adjourned Debate should be sanctioned by the House and the Bill virtually defeated. Believing that this was a measure which would go deep into the foundations of the constitution, and which would produce very large results for the benefit of the country, he trusted the House would not confirm the Motion of his hon. Friend.

[Second Night.]

Mr. WHITESIDE: It appears to me that the learned Lord has affected to misunderstand the main question before us. The immediate question, no doubt, is whether this debate shall or shall not be adjourned; but I did not understand from the hon. Baronet the Member for Ayrshire that this was the form in which he wished to bring his views before the House. He only did so because he had been informed by the highest authority in the House that he would not be in order in bringing forward the precise Motion of which he had given notice. The proposal now before us is a consequence of the extraordinary course taken by the noble Lord who has had charge of all the Reform Bills that have been introduced during the last thirty years; the real question is, whether Government, having proposed to Parliament a measure consisting of three Bills, and having stated that these included the entire subject of Parliamentary Reform, were entitled, after having permitted the question to be in that position for several months, to make two of the Bills disappear, in order that they may appear hereafter to cause fresh discussion in this House, and fresh agitation throughout the country. I remember that some months ago the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) acting in the interests of Scotland, and, like a true Scot, having her interest ever at heart, called upon the noble Lord to say whether he meant to submit a measure of Reform for Scotland at the same time that he brought forward his Reform Bill for England. The noble Lord undertook to do so, and assured the hon. Members for Scotland and Ireland that all those blessings were to be inflicted on them that he has always so ready at command under the name of Reform. I assure the noble Lord that I am speaking quite sincerely when I say that he took the right course in answering that he meant to do so—that the Scotch Bill should be introduced in due course, and that the Scotch Members should have an opportunity of discussing it before the question of Reform was entirely disposed of, as it virtually would be, for all purposes of representation, by the Bill for England. The noble Lord was as good as his word. He has done precisely what was done in 1832, when after the Bill for England came the Bills for Scotland and Ireland. They proceeded pari passu, and they were disposed of before the end of the Session, and at the end of the year there was that dissolution which naturally follows the passing of Reform Bills. The noble Lord, being eminently versed in constitutional learning, naturally desired, as he said himself, “to walk in the paths of the Constitution,” and to act on the precedent which he had laid down, and the three Bills, therefore, were brought in this year at the same time. The hon. Member for Lanarkshire (Sir E. Colebroke) to-night used an argument which was not as clear and logical as those which he generally uses. He said he wished to serve Scotland—and he was of opinion that his county—and a very important county it is—ought to have more Members. [Sir E. COLEBROKE: Certainly.] That is his opinion; but if the English Bill is passed as it stands, and that for Scotland is postponed, it will be quite impossible for him to get any more Members for Lanarkshire. Where are they to come from? It will be of no use then for the hon. Member and the other Scotch Members to exert their eloquence—of which nobody is more sensible than I am—or the noble Lord the Member for London and the noble Viscount at the head of the Government—the most enthusiastic Reformer of the age, because they will say “You have spoken too late, you should have prevented the English Bill passing; why didn’t you support the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for Ayrshire; if that Motion had been carried, the question of additional Scotch Members might have been argued—it was arguable; but you have waited too long, and now poor Scotland must be content with the amount of representation which she possesses.” I must appeal, therefore, to the hon. Member to reconsider his argument—or rather to listen to the force of his argument—and to vote for the Motion, as I contend he is imperatively bound to do. As to Ireland, I do not mean to say that I am much struck with the Bill which has been introduced, though upon this, as upon many other Irish questions, I have also been disappointed. I was most anxious to hear what the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant had to say. I wished to hear him explain on the second reading what is the meaning of this Reform Bill, because having conversed with hon. Members from Ireland, of all politics, I have not found any one of them able to explain what the right hon. Gentleman exactly meant to accomplish. I believe he intended in one or two particulars to upset the Act of Union. I am certainly surprised that a Statesman of his eminence should deal with the Act of Union as if it were a measure of no importance, a trifling matter like a Turnpike Bill or a Beer Bill, as if it were a settlement to be unsettled as a matter of course. It was described by the great Minister whom you profess to follow as one of the most important compacts ever entered into between two nations. There is a clause in this Irish Bill relating to the Irish peers. They are Gentlemen who have not much to do, and it was intended to give us in Ireland the advantage of having them to represent our towns and counties. But so long as Marylebone continues I do not see any particular necessity for infringing on the Act of Union in this particular. Nobody respects the Peerage more than I do; but if I have the opportunity, which the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenantancy seems determined not to give us, I shall certainly give my reasons why I think the Act of Union should be permitted to remain on the firm basis on which Mr. Pitt imagined he had placed it. I for one do not think it ought to be looked on as a matter of course—though the argument would come, perhaps, with more force from an English Member—that, a Minister of the Crown should alter the Act of Union at his pleasure. This is a matter which has been very much overlooked. If you deal with the Act of Union as a mere trifling measure, whatever there is in that Act favourable to Ireland may be laid aside at any moment, though I have always understood that it was a great national compact not to be disturbed. What is the position in which we stand at the present moment? I have provided myself with the three Bills—the Bill for England, the Bill for Scotland, and the Bill for Ireland. I observe with some astonishment that the Bill for Scotland is thicker than either of the other two. I intended to ask the learned Lord Advocate how it was that he had contrived to lengthen out to such a prodigious extent the small matter which he had to work upon in reference to Scotland; but I perceived that the learned Lord has shown his usual good sense, and that he has done for this Bill what was desired for the English Bill, incorporated in it a system of registration. That is a practical reform, and of course it would be instantly rejected by English statesmen. “A system of registration,” says the learned Lord, “is a good thing;” so he puts one into the Scotch Bill; but the noble Lord the Member for London just sketches out two or three lines in this thin and feeble affair of his, and throws it down, leaving the practical question of registration to take care of itself, perhaps to be drawn upon as fresh matter for agitation in another Session, or to be of use when he wants to carry an abstract Resolution against the good sense of Parliament and the best interests of the country. I will take the liberty of asking the noble Lord why these three Bills were brought before us? I have asked myself that question, and I have answered it, I believe, to my own satisfaction. The noble Lord, being an eminent authority on the Constitution, would be asked what was to be done by the Cabinet, who of course defer to him in all questions of altering, amending, or spoiling the Constitution, and he would reply, “As we hav’n’t three Constitutions, three Parliaments, or three separate kingdoms, but one Constitution, one Parliament, and one United Kingdom; and as whatever is done in reference to Scotland and Ireland will act upon England, therefore we must deal with the whole question of Parliamentary Reform at the same time.” I presume that was the reason why the noble Lord introduced these three Bills together. And he was quite right in doing so; but, if he was quite right, so he must be quite wrong in withdrawing two of them. The ingenuity of the noble Lord is great, but I should like to ask him how it was that he persuaded the noble Viscount at the head of the Government—contrary to the good sense which he has usually shown in this matter—to introduce three Reform Bills when one was too many, and how, having introduced three with a view of settling the whole question, he justifies himself in the withdrawal of one and proceeding with the other two? I listened with great attention to the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Mallow (Mr. Longfield) on behalf of the county of Cork. That county he tells us is 100 miles long—I was not aware of it before—and I do not know how many miles broad; that is perfectly true; and has a population as large as the Duchy of Modena, with perhaps that of the Romagna into the bargain. I know what was impending over the Chief Secretary for Ireland if the debate had come on. Hon. Gentlemen would have said, the size of this county, and of that county, their riches, their population entitle them to additional Members, and, if you had given an additional Member to Cork, you would have had Donegal and Antrim, which are nearly as large and populous, and more wealthy and important in a commercial point of view, putting in a claim also for additional Members. You would have had a very interesting debate, but I do not think the Chief Secretary was at all desirous that that debate should come on. He has brought in a Bill which gives an additional Member to Cork county; but I ask the right hon. Gentleman, if he had been convinced by fair arguments on the part of the Irish Members that he ought to give additional representation equally to the North and the South of Ireland, where were the Members to come from if the English Reform Bill were passed?

[Second Night.]

Mr. Whiteside

The discussion would have been an absurdity, and nothing is more repugnant to the House of Commons than a discussion without any point. [Loud cheers from the Ministerial benches, and counter cheers.] I feel that that cheer explains satisfactorily the course taken by the Government, because it is quite clear that every hon. Gentleman who cheered means that if the Reform Bill for England were settled and the numerical representation decided as to England, any discussion concerning the number of representatives for Scotland and Ireland would be a ridiculous waste of time. If that is not the reason of hon. Gentlemen opposite, I trust one of them will give his reasons in a manner perhaps less audible but more tangible. After you have decided the numbers to be given to England there would be nothing left to give to Ireland or Scotland. The Lord Advocate, like the right hon. Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey) in his speech to-night, never answered a word of what had been said by his opponents. That is a very convenient way of conducting a discussion, no doubt, and of the two the Lord Advocate did it in the most judicious way. "What do you mean," he says to us, "to maintain that it is impossible to have a reform of Parliament without a dissolution immediately following—do you mean to impugn the validity of an Act of Parliament agreed to by both Houses?" No, we do not mean anything of the sort, and therefore the learned Lord has been triumphant on that part of the question. But that is not the question. The question is not whether this Reform Bill should be followed by a dissolution, as we were told to-night would not be necessary, but whether by the mere passing of the Bill the House of Commons would not lose character, and sustain a diminution of weight and influence in the country. That is the true question. You first condemn the House of Commons, you declare that a certain number of boroughs shall not return Members to Parliament; you declare that certain others shall lose one Member—and then, according to the Lord Advocate, you may proceed to legislate as if nothing had taken place. I admit that the measure of the House of Commons would have the same effect in point of law as they had before;—but suppose the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Hertford (Mr. Cowper) happened to be promoted,—than which there is nothing more likely—in what manner will you act? You will already have taken away one Member from Hertford. You have condemned that borough, and declared that from the time of the passing of that Act of Parliament it shall give up one of its representatives; will you, then, as a matter of course, issue the writ and fill up the vacancy, having just declared by the voice of Parliament that it shall not be filled? Is that a constitutional course? Why, I venture to say, that it is not for a moment maintainable in argument. The noble Lord the Member for the City of London might have said manfully—I have laid on the table three Bills composing one measure; I abide by it, and if you were to sit from now to November that measure shall be carried. I could understand the noble Lord being persuaded, I will not say by his colleagues, but by his own good sense, to withdraw the whole measure until a more convenient opportunity arose to resume the question of Parliamentary Reform; and, to do him justice, he is always ready to resume it whenever a fair opportunity arises; he is prepared either to oppose Parliamentary Reform by an abstract Resolution, to carry Reform after his own fashion, or not to carry it at all, as the case may turn out. I could understand his saying—"The circumstances of Europe are grave—I have not received much encouragement—the state of the question is not very favourable to legislation, and I will postpone the measure to some future time." All or any of these courses I could understand; but I should like to hear from the noble Lord a reason for the course which he has adopted, for that I cannot understand. I can assure him, if he cares to hear it, that he surprised us all very much the other night, when we thought we were in full career towards a great settlement of Parliamentary Reform, by the sudden announcement that he intended to withdraw the Scotch and Irish Bills. Is this his intention—to withdraw the Scotch and Irish Bills, to proceed a certain length with the English measure, and then to drop it likewise; and at another time first to take up England, then to take up Scotland, and next to deal with Ireland, and so to keep the question of Parliamentary Reform for ever hanging over our heads like the sword of Damocles? I have the greatest pleasure in listening to the noble Lord on every subject except Parliamentary Reform, but to hear him perpetually on that theme, either in relation to England, Ireland, or Scotland, is a thing, I frankly confess, that would be very painful to my feelings. And, therefore, I earnestly regret that the noble Lord departed from the course he originally intended. I fancy he must have come to the conclusion in his calmer moments that the good sense of the nation was as much opposed to the principle of his Bill as it is to that other great delusion which was introduced to us with such triumphant eloquence by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I have no doubt the noble Lord is perfectly sincere in the course which he has taken; but, after the question has been critically examined in "another place" which I dare not name—after the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. Edwin James) and many other gentlemen of extreme Liberal opinions have impugned the returns on which the Bill was recommended—after Whig gentlemen of high position and eminent talents and learning have likewise impugned them—that the noble Lord should deliberately abandon two parts of the Bill and endeavour to squeeze through the third in the month of June, announcing in effect to Irish and Scotch Members that it is no use for them to speak, as there will be nothing for them to do after it is carried but to assent to whatever is proposed—is a measure that I certainly should not have expected from the good sense which usually characterizes the noble Lord. I should have thought the noble Lord had enough on his hands without wasting his time on Parliamentary Reform. Has he not enough in the affairs of Europe to occupy even so large and liberal an understanding? Why, he has Russia to quiet, Belgium to counsel, Prussia to inspire, France to conciliate or confront, as the case may be, and Switzerland to lament with! I confess I cannot understand why he should not reserve his talents—and no one has a higher respect for him personally than I entertain—for a subject worthy of those talents, and leave the poor old Constitution of this country where he found it. The Lord Advocate and another hon. Gentleman who spoke to-night said they could not see why separate Bills might not be carried for Scotland and Ireland as well as for England, remembering that a separate Bill was carried for Ireland some few years ago. That is a plausible argument, but it has no foundation in fact. It is a Registry Bill which the Lord Advocate has worked up into this formidable precedent. But it did not add to the representation of Ireland or take away from that of England. If the question to be discussed were not limited, as at present, it might be very useful for you to consider whether our system, founded on a valuation which was extended all over Ireland by that very Bill to which the right hon. Gentleman referred, might not prove a good measure for you to imitate before carrying out any new Reform Bill for this country. I must do the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Canterbury (Sir W. Somerville) the justice to admit that the measure in question was a real reform—and that is an important distinction to make; it has been attended with great advantages, and I speak of it with respect. If we were now discussing the case of Ireland, I might suggest that it would, perhaps, be advisable to postpone your measure even for a few months, to try the effect of a general valuation in England, such as you have given us in Ireland. But you have no confidence in your own measures, nor yet in your own principles. Having given us that Bill not more than five or six years ago, will you not abide by it—will you not let us enjoy its effects? In introducing the three Bills simultaneously, I think the noble Lord was right in every point of view. It was the course he recommended in 1832—it was the course taken by Mr. Stanley, when Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, and it is the course taken by the right hon. Gentleman on the present occasion. I should like to hear him explain why the Act of Union is to be subverted in two or three particulars; he has, unfortunately, not had that opportunity, and the object of this Motion is to afford it to him. If it be carried, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland will be able to state why Irish Peers are to represent Irish boroughs, and why, if a man gets a place, he is not to be called on to face his constituents. I cannot comprehend why a Minister should have taken the course which is now proposed. I am induced to suppose that he resolved to do so as a last expedient; and that as it was impossible to carry the measure in its entirety, as it was physically impossible to expect that Parliament could discharge the work which had been laid upon it, the noble Lord the Member for London said, "I will carry the Bill for England, and leave Scotland and Ireland to take chance on future occasions." And it is very possible he may have added, that when the time came to fulfil that Resolution, he trusted to the good sense of the House of Commons to reject the proposal.

[Second Night.]

Mr. Whiteside

MR. BRIGHT: Sir, I do not know that I am wiser than anybody else with regard to the end of this discussion, but with regard to its object I think there can be very little difference of opinion. We have before us one Amendment attempting to defeat and apparently succeeding in tripping up another Amendment. The first Amendment was moved on this side of the House, and at the outset was rather a tempting bait to the hon. Gentlemen opposite, but after examining it a little further, they came to the conclusion that to base the rejection of the Bill on the reasons stated in that Amendment would be false, and, more than that, would be ridiculous. Therefore they found that they could not as a party support the Amendment, and to get rid of it this second Motion is proposed to-night. [Cries of "No" from the Opposition and cheers from the Ministerial benches.] Per- we shall discover the truth if we come after the division to-night to decide on the Amendment of the hon. Member for Rye. I shall not say anything about that Amendment after what has been said by so many previous speakers, and I am quite sure that hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House must have made up their minds on it. I will make only one observation on the speech of the hon. Gentleman who has addressed us. It was of that inconsistent character which I have observed in the speeches of Gentlemen on both sides of this House who opposed the Bill. He told us, in a manner the most confident, that the working classes did not care in the least for reform, and read a letter which he had received from some person with whom he is brought into connection at a Committee on which he is sitting, who said that the working classes did not care for this Bill, because it did not admit them in sufficient numbers to the franchise. And then, towards the latter part of his speech, he held out to us, in most portentous shape, Mr. Potter, the Secretary to the Builder's Union, and pointed out that an army of no less than 600,000 men, every one of whom would obey the behest of Mr. Potter, would be admitted to the franchise, if this Bill became law. The question before the House is really not whether we shall wait for the Census returns, or whether this Bill shall be postponed until the Irish and Scotch Bills have made their reappearance; but the question is this, is the House willing during the present Session, or as long as its present Members remain in office, to grant any measure of reform? That is the question which the House is bound to answer. If I held the opinion that reform was not necessary, and that it was better not to grant it, I should belie the course that I have always taken in this House and out of it, if I had not the manliness to make that declaration to the House and to the country. I will not quarrel with hon. Gentlemen opposite, but I will put it to them whether the position they are taking up this Session is fair and honourable with regard to this question. I know how much, for I have seen it here, men's reasons may be impaired and disturbed by party spirit; but still for all that I think there are facts with regard to this question which might make many men upon that side of the House, and some upon this, doubt the wisdom of the course they have recently adopted. Last year the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) proposed a Bill on this question. He thought it important—or else he played false to the House and the country—he thought it so important that he proposed to add 500,000 new electors to the present electoral body in the United Kingdom. I am merely stating what he stated over and over again in the speeches he delivered. I know that he says now, and that his friends say, that they did not take those 500,000 in a gross lump, like the noble Lord is said to propose to do in this Bill. He has informed the House, and his friends have repeated it, that his plan was to select all the good men everywhere, and from those good, respectable, and I presume, conservative, and reverential citizens, to add 500,000 to the electoral body. I ask where do these 500,000 pattern citizens live? They do not live in houses of the value of £10 and upwards, at least in boroughs, or they would be already enfranchised. Hon. Gentlemen opposite say they do not live in houses between £10 and £6, because it is clear that not half of 500,000 would be included in any scheme which did not lower the franchise to £6. I do not know where they are. I suppose these intelligent men live somewhere in tents, but they certainly are not citizens, nor heads of families, nor householders, and are not included in the number which the noble Lord intends to include by this Bill. They are to be found somewhere else, and some ingenious mode of discovery is to be adopted by means of "fancy franchises" to bring them out. But the right hon. Gentleman was not content with that offer, and I ask his followers just to attend to the case I will submit to them. He said afterwards that he would go further than that Bill proposed; and he would reduce the franchise in boroughs, and more than that, he admitted the claim of the working classes to enfranchisement, and said he would admit them with generosity and sincerity. ["Hear, hear!"] I am glad to hear hon. Gentlemen on that side admit that they are animated by the same feelings as myself. But more than that. The right hon. Gentleman is understood to have given a distinct pledge to certain Members of this House, not that he would do just that in this particular shape, but that if he was enabled to bring forward a Bill again—that is, if we were not able after the general election, to dislodge him from the Government, he would bring in a Bill which would give a franchise of £10 in counties and a £6 franchise in boroughs.

[Second Night.]

MR. DISRAELI: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, and would rather myself take a proper time in the course of this debate, but when the hon. Gentleman's argument is founded upon statements which are entirely fallacious I feel bound to correct him. What the hon. Gentleman has said about anything I have stated in this House is correct enough, and any hon. Member may judge from the records of the House, and I do not dispute or impugn his statement about it, but anything the hon. Gentleman has heard from hearsay I beg to state is perfectly unfounded. I never made any representation, directly or indirectly, to any person at all inconsistent with that which I have stated publicly in this House.

MR. BRIGHT: If what I have advanced be correct, I shall not hold it to be inconsistent with the statements the right hon. Gentleman has made in the House. I have my information from speeches which hon. Members of this House must have read as well as myself; speeches delivered by Members of this House in various parts of the country after the last Session. I shall not charge—I shall not hold, the right hon. Gentleman to that statement—because I must say that I could not, after what the right hon. Gentleman has said, repeat it. But at the same time the House will admit that when Members of this House have stated elsewhere—[Cries of "Name," and "Read!" from the Opposition.] It is very easy to read. I can read extracts from those speeches; and if hon. Gentlemen would like to hear I will read. I do not wish to do so, because I do not wish to bring Members of the House into collision upon matters of this kind. I was willing to take the statements of the right hon. Gentleman that there was some misunderstanding. But hon. Gentlemen must be aware that a speech was made by the hon. Member for Sunderland in August last year, in which he stated that one of the conditions on which he offered his support to Lord Derby was, that the late Government in regard to reform should declare they were prepared to bring in a Bill, and to use all their power to pass it, providing that the borough franchise should be a £6 franchise, and that for the counties a £10 rental franchise, and that at least thirty of the smaller boroughs should be disfranchised. That was one of the conditions he had made before he promised his support to the late Administration; these were the conditions he enforced when he gave his consent to the opposition to that party move, which was headed by the noble Lord the Member for London.

CAPTAIN JERVIS: I rise to order, Sir. That statement was contradicted at the time. The correspondence was published containing the contradiction.

MR. BRIGHT: Why, Sir, coming on to this Session, the right hon. Gentleman has been himself up to a certain point not inconsistent with this statement. For if the House will remember the tone and the manner of a speech which he has delivered upon this question, they will find that his intelligent judgment led him to the conclusion that it might not be undesirable to endeavour to settle this question during this Session upon the basis proposed by Her Majesty's present Government. Did not the right hon. Gentleman tell us he would move no Amendment upon the second reading? And further, he went so far as to say he doubted extremely—I speak of the impression which I think his words must have produced on every Member of the House—whether he should think it necessary or desirable to offer Amendments in Committee. All this was fair to the House, and it was all along eminently satisfactory, because it showed that the man of the greatest eminence upon your side of the House, the man most competent to form an opinion, the man the most foreseeing with regard to the views and wants of the country, did not materially differ from Her Majesty's Government upon this great question. I grieve now to find he has taken another course—a course not into which he has led his party, but into which he has been driven by the more violent Members by whom he is surrounded. And when I have looked at the eminent position the right hon. Gentleman holds ; when I know how clearly he must see what ought to be done with regard to a grave subject like this ; I have lamented to see he was not able to persuade his followers to a course so enlightened and so sensible as that he was prepared to take himself. I have lamented to see that, like a character of old, he was "bound to grind in brazen fetters with that heaven-gifted strength." I believe if hon. Gentlemen opposite would now, not so much drive, as follow, the right hon. Gentleman, they would find that upon many of these great questions Parliament would act more in unison with the wishes and the true interests of the people. But I will turn to another point :—hon. Gentlemen opposite assume to be particularly loyal. They sometimes say that some of us are not so. But five times has the Queen of England told the Parliament of England that she wishes this question to be considered and settled. Five different Cabinets have expressed an unanimous opinion in favour of this question being undertaken and adjusted. There have been several Resolutions of this House and speeches—almost volumes of Hansard—of eminent men upon both sides of the House, admitting this not only to be a great question, but one that pressed for a Parliamentary settlement. But still you are unwilling ; you still oppose a measure so moderate as this, which you say, because of its moderation, the working classes, whom you dread, do not wish to see passed into law. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Rye (Mr. Mackinnon) gave us to understand that the House—I forget the exact words, but it was an unpleasant observation—was a mass of hypocrisy on this question. ["Hear, hear!" from an hon. Member on the Opposition side.] The hon. Gentleman opposite is not a hypocrite. Nobody charged him with that vice. But the hon. Member for Rye told us what some Members had told him on the stairs—that they were going to vote for the Bill, but they disliked it, and he led the House and the country to believe from what he said that a great number of those who support this Bill wish for no Bill at all, and hope there never may be one. It is a very perilous vice in a Parliament is hypocrisy. I believe the people of England will have infinitely more respect for any man who honestly believes, as a honest man may honestly believe, that it is better to keep the franchise restricted, and to keep the Government of the country in the hands of the rich. They will have more respect for such a man who avows his honest convictions than for those men who deal with such a question as this in one Session in one light, and in another light in another Session, just as it may suit their party objects and party purposes. We may be coming, and we shall come upon troublous times, if the House of Lords becomes omnipotent and the House of Commons becomes contemptible. There are some things upon this question which are agreed to, and some that are merely asserted and figure as matters of dispute. Now, I should like to ask the attention of the House to two points. Without going to the Census of 1861, we all know what the population will be when the next Census is taken. The population of the United Kingdom will be about 30,000,000. We know that if there be 30,000,000 of people in the United Kingdom, there will be 7,500,000 of men of twenty-one years of age and upwards. We know that at present not more than 1,000,000 of men can come up to vote ; and we know, therefore, that even allowing for those who are in the army and the navy, or who may be incapacitated from pauperism or crime, or other causes, there are 6,000,000 adult males to whom Parliament has not yet conceded the right of the suffrage. The Bill of the noble Lord proposes to make a slight advance. It proposes to open the door to a number—it may be 300,000, and a very extreme calculation might make it 400,000 fresh voters. I believe it may be 300,000, and I doubt if it can be 400,000 throughout the whole of the United Kingdom. If it be 300,000, it is only opening the door so far that only one man in twenty of those now excluded will be allowed to come in. Can anybody believe that the terrors you have expressed or that your alarm at this proposal is well founded ? It is utterly impossible. I do not believe any man in this House or out of it, if he were told that only one in twenty of the adult males now excluded were to be admitted by this Bill, could honestly say he believed it a measure perilous to the country or to the constitution in any sense whatever. I think I may take that to be almost agreed upon. But there are some things merely asserted ; and I wish to allude to one or two of them. It has been asserted during these discussions—I will not quote particular speeches, but I trust to the House for confirming what I say—it has been asserted over and over again, that the admission of this number, and therefore I may almost say of any number, of men to the franchise above the 1,000,000 is to give up the representation of the country and the power of Parliament to classes altogether unworthy of it. I may refer to the language of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Hertfordshire (Sir E. Lytton), in one of the most eloquent and elaborate speeches ever made in this House, a speech every word of which had been considered over and over again, and which therefore was not delivered in the heat of debate—I say upon referring to that speech it is there asserted that to open the door to one out of twenty men now excluded, that is to 300,000 or 350,000 of our countrymen, is to hand over Parliament and the Government to what he designated as poverty and passion. I cannot very well permit myself, especially with the great and unfeigned respect that I have for much in the character of the right hon. Gentleman, to speak of that phrase in the language which necessarily arises to my lips when I think of it. But the noble Lord, the Member for the City, quoted the other night from an article in a periodical which is supposed to represent hon. Gentlemen opposite. I confess I was rather surprised that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire appeared to take some offence at it, because I thought the noble Lord intended to say what was friendly of him and complimentary to the right hon. Gentleman. [A laugh.] Well, so it struck me, and I think the right hon. Gentleman will not deny that that was the tenor of the observations. That article did not spare a good many people besides the right hon. Gentleman. It is said, I do not know on what authority, to have been written by a noble Lord I see opposite me (Lord Robert Cecil). I believe the authorship was first indicated by the supposed hostility which exists in the mind of the noble Lord to the general policy of the right hon. Gentleman. Well, I understood the author of the article to say that the course of policy we were now pursuing, and the result of such a measure as this would be to leave us for the Government of the country to a "blessed choice" between "debauchery and crime." He referred to publichouses as furnishing the debauchery; but he might have known that if in any particular borough the public-house interest amounts to 10 per cent of the electoral body, inasmuch as no more will be admitted under the Bill, the influence of that interest will be diminished in proportion as you increase the numbers and the influence of the general body of electors. Now, I want to ask the House to consider these three statements—one made by the right hon. Baronet, the other assumed to be made by the noble Lord (Lord R. Cecil), and the statement of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) that there was a danger lest everybody admitted to the franchise would combine to conspire against all the institutions of the country. To what does this argument lead us? According to the right hon. Baronet six-sevenths of your population—that is, 6,000,000 out of 7,000,000 grown men in the United Kingdom—are suffering and passionate. The argument of the Quarterly Review is that they are sunk in debauchery and crime. That they are ready to combine against all the existing institutions of the country and against all classes above them is the prime and the sole argument of the right hon. Gentleman's long speech. Now, if I thought this were true I confess I should despair of the future of my country. But I will undertake to show that this testimony is not worthy of the slightest credit. I will undertake to say that I know a great deal more of the working classes of this country, and especially of those in the north of England, to whom this Bill especially refers, than either the right hon. Baronet, the right hon. Gentleman, or the author of the article in the Quarterly Review. Excepting the Sessions which I have had, it may be the honour, but certainly the ill-fortune to spend in this House and in London, I have been for thirty years, at least, in daily communication with these classes. I have lived among them; many of them were playmates of mine when I was a boy; I have superintended their labour; I have paid their wages; and have had as great an opportunity as any man in this House of knowing what are their opinions and their wishes with regard to those great political questions which we have to discuss. Now, I shall ask the attention of the House to a statement respecting the working men of Rochdale. After the accusations which have been made, which were not necessary for your argument, and which I grieve were ever made at all, I feel bound in defence of the working classes to make this statement to the House; and, if hon. Gentlemen on the other side are really interested in those classes, they will thank me for the facts I am about to lay before them. They refer to certain associations in the borough of Rochdale, whereby working men exclusively have created large mercantile concerns, and have managed them for many years past with the greatest possible success. A co-operative society was established at Rochdale in 1844. It began with twenty-eight members, who subscribed £1 a-piece, so that they started with a capital of £28. At the end of 1859, fifteen years afterwards, it had no fewer than 2,703 members, and a capital of £27,060. It had done business during the year to the amount of £104,000, and had divided among its members, in proportion to the amount of their purchases from its various shops and establishments, the sum of £10,739. During the first quarter of the present year, ending on the 20th of March last, the business transacted was £34,000, or at the rate of £136,000 per annum, leaving to be divided among the members a profit for the quarter amounting to £3,375. Its establishments consist of a large grocer's shop, one for the sale of clothing, a butcher's shop, and another I think where shoes are sold. Hon. Gentlemen who suppose that these working men are not aware of what is being said and done in this House will attach some importance to the facts I am now about to adduce. The society has a library and reading-room, open free to all its members, who now number 2,900. Two-and-a-half per cent, amounting during the past year to £300, is deducted from the profits of the business to purchase books and newspapers for the use of the literary institution. The library contains between 3,000 and 4,000 volumes, and is increasing rapidly every quarter. The news room is well supplied with daily and weekly papers and monthly and quarterly periodicals; and doubtless, some of the members have read the article in the Quarterly of which we have been speaking. Maps, globes, telescopes, microscopes, and other scientific apparatus of the most recent construction, are provided for the use of the members, and a Sabbath school is attached to the institution. The Society has at various times subscribed to the Dispensary, the Deaf and Dumb Asylum, the Blind Asylum and the Manchester Royal Infirmary, and it has recently presented to the Corporation of Rochdale, at a cost of £100, a beautiful drinking fountain in bronze, which has been put up in a central position in the town for the benefit of the public. It has also established—and I am sorry Mr. Urquhart, once a Member of this House, is not present to hear this, great credit being due to him for having taught the use of such places—it has established, at a cost of £200, a Turkish bath, which is already remunerative, and the advantages of which are appreciated by many of the middle as well as of the working classes. As a proof of the wise system upon which the society is conducted, I may mention that no credit is given even for a single day. Frugal and provident habits are inculcated. To save something, it is pointed out, is the first step to independence. Pauperism has been diminished; and education, intelligence, and morality have been greatly promoted. Now for another remarkable fact. Arbitrators have long been appointed, for the purpose of adjusting any differences, which may arise between a Member and the Committee, and yet in the fifteen years during which the institution has been established those arbitrators have never once been called upon to give a decision. That is not all. In this same town of Rochdale the workmen have established a corn mill, which was begun in 1850. In 1851 the capital was £2,163. In that year it suffered a loss of £421, which was made up by subsequent gains before any division of profits was made. At the end of 1859 the capital was £18,236; the business done was £85,845, leaving a profit of £6,115 for the year ending March 24, 1860, the number of Members was 550, and the state of the concern stood thus:—capital, £21,192; business done, £92,270; and profit, £8,278. There are many hon. Members in this House engaged in the cotton trade. I am one of them. Well, the Rochdale Co-operative Manufacturing Society likewise has now 1,600 members, with a capital exceeding £50,000. Its present business is not large, but it has built, and is now filling with machinery, a new mill, which will cost not less than £32,000. The mill is paid for, and the machinery will be paid for on delivery. The whole is expected to be complete in September next. Each of these societies is managed by a Committee of eleven Members. Meetings are held, in the two first mentioned, every three months, and in the last every six months. All Members can attend and vote, and no Member has more than a single vote. I have thought it desirable to place these facts before the House, because I am able to produce evidence in support of everything I have said in regard to them; for I know many of these men and the establishments. I know something of the working population among whom I live, and I believe there is not a person in this House who will dare to stand up after I sit down and say with respect to the men who have thus conducted a large business, saved their money, and promoted all these means of spreading education, intelligence, and sobriety among the people, that it would be perilous to the institutions of this country, if those institutions are worth anything, to give such men a vote for Members of Parliament. But there is another point urged, and that is that by this Bill, if you pass it, you hand over the Government of the country not only to ignorance and to passion, but also to poverty. Now, I should like the House to listen to one or two facts which appear to me important; and I advise the House to look fairly into this question between the working-classes, who wish to be admitted to the franchise, and you, who wish to exclude them. If you are ignorant of the facts, you may possibly commit an error which you will live to deplore some day. It is generally assumed that the great body of the people are very poor and ignorant, and that they cannot use any political influence you may give them judiciously; that is, that they cannot tell whether any gentleman living in their neighbourhood is a suitable man to be intrusted with the expression of their sentiments and with the care of their interests in this House. Now, if we contrast the wealth of the represented classes with that of the unrepresented classes, the difference is not so great as hon. Gentlemen imagine, and as I imagined before I looked into the facts. By the Census of 1861 the population will be, say thirty millions—of these, seven millions and a half will be adult males. There are now about one million of voters, and there must be six millions and a half not on the list of voters. Assume that 500,000 of these do not belong to the working classes, or are engaged in the army or navy, or are paupers, or criminals, and cannot be electors, and there will remain six millions of men earning wages unenfranchised. Suppose this Bill to pass, and that it adds to the number of electors, which it will not, 500,000 from the upper end of this mass, consisting of small traders, clerks, foremen, small capitalists, and the more highly paid working-men, there will remain not less than five millions and a half unenfranchised after the passing of this Bill. Now, let us compare the yearly income of these working men with the income derived from all the real property in the United

Mr. Bright

[Second Night,

Mr. Bright

[Second Night.]

Mr. Bright

Kingdom, including lands and buildings, and adding to it the income of all the farmers as shown by the income tax returns. From a return to the House of Lords dated July 20, 1859, it appears that the total income under Schedule A in Great Britain and Ireland is £136,000,000, and under Schedule B, being the income of farmers, £52,000,000, making £188,000,000 in all. Assuming the income of each of the 500,000 persons proposed to be enfranchised under this Bill to be £80 a year, or 31s. weekly, the annual income of the whole would amount to £40,000,000. If you take the 5,500,000 persons still to be excluded from the franchise, and estimate their annual income at only £40 per head, or 15s. 6d. weekly, then their total income would amount to not less than £220,000,000. The annual income of these two classes taken together would amount to £260,000,000. That of itself is a strong fact, and shows that the men now excluded from the franchise have, though not in real property, lands, or buildings, an annual income arising from wages paid for honest labour nearly double the income derived from real property, lands, and buildings, together with the income of all the farmers. But, estimating the number of women who work at 2,000,000, and that they individually earn about 8s. a week, then we have a further sum of £40,000,000. Next include the wages of 1,000,000 of young persons of both sexes, between the ages of 14 and 21 years, and, estimating their average earnings at 5s. a week, you have a further sum of about £12,000,000. The whole income of these working classes I believe to be understated at £312,000,000 a year, while the whole income represented by all the income-tax schedules in April, 1857, amounted to £313,000,000. The whole of this latter income is represented more or less equally in both Houses of Parliament. The land is represented in and controls almost entirely one House, and has at least half the power in the House in which I am speaking, but the other income to which I have just drawn the attention of hon. Members, the price of labour received in the shape of wages, returns not a single Member to Parliament to defend its interests or express its wants. It does not give one single vote at the polling booth to any single Member of Parliament at this moment. I shall go into no more facts, and I think the two statements I have made will carry conviction to any impartial mind that it is not wise or just to treat lightly the character and condition of the unenfranchised classes of this kingdom. If the charges made against them were true, what would they prove but the utter condemnation of the whole system of your Government in past times? And, if these charges are not true, then I say, you are pursuing an unwise and dangerous course in making them. What is the object of hon. Gentlemen opposite in the persistent delays with which they meet this proposition? I am told—of course hon. Gentlemen opposite will very likely contradict it—it is said you want to batter and damage the Government, so that by and by you will be able to come to this side of the House, and the right hon. Gentlemen on that bench will come and sit on this bench. I have no doubt whatever that there is considerable anxiety on that score. I have observed that when the Gentlemen who sit on this side of the House sat in Opposition, they were very anxious to get on the Ministerial side, and sometimes took means which I thought unworthy of a great party to dislodge their opponents. I am happy to say that I never co-operated in any of those attempts. ["Oh, oh."] You will recollect that when you (the Opposition) were on this side of the House, your Government was continually taunted with the charge of being kept in office by the right hon. Member for Ashton (Mr. M. Gibson), and myself, and those who acted with us. They said of you and us then what some of you have—I was going to say foolishly—said of the present Government and us now; but I can make great allowance for the feeling which actuates the Opposition to change sides, because, from the anxiety which every one shows to get on the Ministerial Bench, there is, I presume, some peculiar happiness in arriving there. I will assume that you (the Opposition) succeed in getting the noble Lord to withdraw the present Bill, which, however, is not likely, and that you so damage the Government that it cannot continue as a Government any longer, but breaks up as many other Governments have been broken up before, and that the Earl of Derby comes back to power. Well, then, is this Reform question settled? Is the right hon. Gentleman opposite prepared to carry out the statements which he made?—I do not mean private statements, but statements made in public, and which he has not yet repudiated, and probably never will. The right hon. Gentleman expresses his assent; therefore he proposes, if he comes back to power, to add 500,000 electors to the present number. Nay, more than that, because after the general election he found he must go further, and open the door to the working classes, as he said, with sincerity and generosity. Hon. Gentlemen opposite, however, do not seem to calculate on any such concession, for I understand them to think—those 6,000,000 of persons to whom I referred being now excluded from the exercise of the franchise—that if they can get rid of this Bill the door of the Constitution will be locked and barred for a long time to come—nobody knows how long; that the question of Reform will not re-appear, and that we may go on in the old humdrum fashion, regardless of the wishes of that multitude of our fellow-countrymen who during the last thirty years have asked you in the humblest and most deferential tones for some portion of influence in the State. Do you, let me ask, imagine that you can go on raising £70,000,000 per annum, or rather £71,500,000, as we are now informed by another authority, from the population of this country, and calling upon those 6,000,000 whom you exclude from all voice in Parliament to pay their full share—nay, in my opinion, much beyond their full share—of this amount? Do you propose that they should still contribute to this enormous revenue and that not one of them should even be able to speak through the lips of a Representative in this House on the subject of the imposition of taxation or of the mode in which it is laid on the shoulders of the various classes of the people? The noble Lord who sits opposite to me (Lord R. Cecil) upon a former occasion referred to this question, and expressed his apprehension that if we were to have a Reform in Parliament there would be an undue interference with what he called the incidence of taxation; but for my part I believe that there is no class of people in this country who, taken in the bulk, are more just than the working classes. There are, of course, exceptions to that rule; there are among them individuals who are ignorant, violent, and unjust, but there are as many such in your class in proportion to its numbers. Those who know the working classes best, who mix with them intimately in the north of England—in Lancashire and Yorkshire—fear them least and trust them most. If you who sit on the benches opposite were as well acquainted with them as we are you would not have exhibited that affected patriotism and that unaffected ignorance which you have displayed in dealing with this great question. In making these observations I do not mean to threaten the House with the occurrence of any terrible or immediate disaster in case they should throw out the present Bill, and refuse to deal with this question of Reform; but I would strongly advise you to adopt the contrary course. I should wish, as you are aware, to see a much more extensive measure of reform passed into a law than the Bill provides. I may, however, remark, that hon. Gentlemen opposite, many of whom are the most inaccurate speakers on these topics I have listened to, especially when they set about quoting anything I happen to have said, have over and over again stated—and I have more than once corrected them—that I regard the present Bill merely as a measure which, if it be passed this Session, will have cleared the way for the advocates of reform to rap next Session at the door of Parliament for one of a more extensive character. Now, those hon. Members who may bear in mind anything I have said on the subject will recollect that, so far as the question of the suffrage is concerned, I never made any such statement. My honest opinion is, although I believe it would be desirable to go further than this Bill does in the extension of the suffrage, yet that if the suffrage were brought down to the rate of £6, a considerable number of persons would, as a consequence, be admitted to the exercise of the franchise, and that a point would be fixed within which a number equally great might, by the exercise of frugality and industry, hope at no distant day to be included. Such a concession, therefore, would, in my opinion, be of the greatest possible benefit to the working classes—I speak particularly of Lancashire and Yorkshire—and a line would be drawn at a point which could be reached by them if they exert the virtues which you say it is necessary that the working man should have before he is entitled to a vote. With regard, however, to the redistribution of seats, I am prepared to say now, as I have often said before, that this Bill touches merely the fringe of that question. I have over and over again stated, both in public and private, that I would as soon see the Bill a simple suffrage Bill, not dealing with the redistribution of seats at all, as in its present shape. As, however, the Government have made proposals on the subject—it may be the best they could under the circumstances—I have been willing to lend them all the support in my power in the honest conviction that it is the duty of the House of Commons to pass the Bill, and that if they do not pass it many hon. Members may live to regret the course which they shall have taken in its regard. I am sure the House will admit that I have not said a single word in a tone of menace with respect to this question. I am not in a position to menace anybody. Some hon. Members say that I do not possess the confidence of the working classes, and I can safely say that I never took any special steps to obtain that confidence. They, like all other classes, have their crotchets and their foibles, and of them I have always spoken with that sincerity—you may, if you please, call it severity—with which I hope it is my habit to express the opinions which I entertain. I have opposed them as much as I have worked with them. I have told them from public platforms what I felt to be the truth as honestly as I speak it here. The idea of making my speech palatable to lord or commoner, or workingman, by taking a particular political course to meet the wishes of any one of them is one of the very last which I should think of harbouring, and I should despise myself for ever if I were turned a single hair's breadth by such influences from the path which I deemed it to be my duty to pursue. But, passing from that topic, I would implore you now to bear in mind that the greatest events in history have risen apparently from the most trifling causes. There has, however, almost invariably been a groundwork laid in those instances which it may have occupied ten or twenty years or more to construct. How that may be in the future nobody can predict. At the present moment you have an unfavourable season; weather very cold for June; rains almost incessant. If such weather should continue during the whole of this month a bad harvest may be the result. The time may come when two or three such harvests may cause a gloom throughout the land. I would also say to hon. Gentlemen opposite, who seem to me to be always trading in the apprehension of war, that it is not so much war you have to fear as insurrection and revolution on the Continent. Such events light up the fire of excitement in England, for so long as man is man and possesses human sympathies this must be the case. Even the noble Lord who generally sits on the seat below me (Lord Elcho), but who is I know not where now—I suppose with the

Mr. Bright

Rifle Volunteers—and whom I never heard give utterance to a single syllable in favour of Reform—talked—I forget his exact words—at a meeting of those gentlemen who are organized to defend us against some imaginary foe, about the lion heart of Garibaldi, who had left Italy to snap asunder the chains and bonds of the Sicilians. Now I do not object to that sort of phraseology, but when you find a man who never, so far as I am aware, used his influence to give those of his countrymen who are excluded from the franchise a vote, express all this enthusiasm for the achievements of Garibaldi and the liberation of Sicily, what, I should like to know, must be the effect of passing events on the great mass of his countrymen supposed not to be subject to the same mental control as a Member of this House? The time I say, then, may come when your rashness may give way to terror, and when the accusations you have brought against the working classes may be deemed unsuitable, and something like flattery usurp their place. I do not say that such a period will ever arrive, but when I see an attempt made to preclude the passing of a proposition so moderate as this—which, wherever a public meeting has been held throughout the country since it has been laid before Parliament to consider its provisions—and many such meetings have been held, although you may be in perfect ignorance of the fact if you read only The Times—has been received by the members of the working classes, who mainly composed those meetings, with a great feeling of satisfaction—I cannot help feeling strongly on the subject, and warning you against pursuing the course which you are pursuing. The demands of the working classes are most moderate and constitutional. They ask you merely to advance a little beyond the line which was laid down by eminent statesmen who presided over affairs in this House in 1832. They seek at your hands nothing unheard of, novel, or perilous, but simply call upon you to extend the boon which was then with so much subsequent advantage to the country granted, to them, somewhat further at the present day. There are among hon. Gentlemen opposite many who now listen to me who I am perfectly certain are not individually satisfied with the course which they are urging the Government to take with respect to this measure. You refuse this slight concession, and yet you do not refuse it in a manly manner. The 300,000 or 400,000 members of the community whom the Bill proposes to enfranchise, and the small number who at some future day may hope to come within its scope, cannot but imagine that you have treated them with distrust,—nay, that some of you, in speaking of them, would appear to have been animated by a feeling still more contemptible and deplorable. I recollect the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Hertfordshire published a work some years ago in which he said, “Who knows the great generosity of the people of this country?” and he did what I shall not do, exclude from the comment the nobility who constituted the Government of the State. I concur, however, with the right hon. Gentleman in the opinion which he entertains of the great generosity of the English people. I say the people are generous. On their industry are based your wealth and greatness; and, believe me, I am no less your friend than theirs when I implore you with all the power and earnestness which it is possible for me to infuse into words to pass this Bill and treat your countrymen with generosity and justice.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS: Mr. Speaker, there are few subjects which the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) is not capable of understanding perfectly. There is no one more capable of understanding what is the real question before the House; and when the hon. Member for Birmingham rises in his place and, complaining of delay in the progress of this measure, pronounces a speech in which he never once approaches the subject which is really at issue, there can be one reason, and only one reason, for such a course, and it is that the hon. Member prefers to speak on a different subject rather than on the subject which is before the House to-night. The hon. Member for Birmingham has made a speech which, if it be relevant to anything in particular, is a speech in favour of the third reading of this Bill; and I cannot help myself thinking that it had occurred to the hon. Member that, perhaps, an opportunity might not be given of pronouncing the speech upon the third reading, and that he determined to seize the opportunity he has rather than wait for an opportunity he never may have. Now, Sir, whether there ever will be a third reading of this Bill; if so, whether the hon. Member for Birmingham will again repeat the speech we have heard to-night; and, if so, whether any person will then answer that speech,

I do not venture to speculate, but I would desire, with permission, to address a few observations to the House on the question which I think is really before it. The right hon. Baronet the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who first spoke in this debate on the side of the Government (Sir George Grey), complained that my hon. Friend the Member for Ayrshire (Sir James Fergusson) had changed the issue of the question before the House. The answer to that charge is short and conclusive. Those who have changed the issue before the House are Her Majesty's Government. The issue before the House for the last three months has been whether we should have in the present Session a measure for the amendment of the representation of the United Kingdom; and on Monday night, for the first time, upon the Motion that you, Sir, should leave the chair, the Government announced that their course was changed, and that, whereas the issue up till then had been a measure for the representation of the whole kingdom, the measure now was one for England only, and the Bills for Scotland and Ireland were to be withdrawn. Then, inasmuch as that announcement was not made until we were on the very eve of going into Committee, there was no opportunity of bringing before the House the grave consequences that result from such a change, except by means of the Motion which has, with such ability and effect, been made to-night by my hon. Friend. Now, on the question of order, let me add a word or two. I think the House has some reason to complain of the course taken by the Government on this matter. On Monday last we had on the paper a number of Instructions intended to be moved on going into Committee on the Bill. Two of those Instructions raised questions of great gravity and importance—questions of registration, polling places, and polling papers. The hon. Gentlemen about to move the Instructions stated to the House that they desired these questions should be discussed, not with regard to one part of the kingdom, but with reference to the United Kingdom, and, as such, to make those Instructions to the Committee about to be formed. What course was taken by the Government? The noble Lord the Foreign Secretary opposed the Instructions, and upon this ground, that they were Instructions going to the case of the United Kingdom, whereas there were other Bills for Ireland and Scotland before the House.

Sir Hugh Cairns

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: The hon. and learned Gentleman is under a misapprehension. The opposition to the Instructions arose on a point of order, and was raised from the Chair.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS: I must remind the noble Lord of what I myself heard. After you, Sir, had suggested the irregularity, when an hon. Member proposed to cure it by inserting the words "United Kingdom," the noble Lord rose, and in his place said that was a greater irregularity still; for, said the noble Lord, this Bill relates to England only, and here are Instructions which relate to the United Kingdom. Of course, Sir, we bowed to your decision on the point; but the question I ask is—was it right in the noble Lord, hearing and knowing the ground of your decision, and knowing, which we did not, that although there were Bills for Scotland and Ireland on the paper, that was a mere form, and that the Government had determined to withdraw them—was it, I ask, right in the noble Lord to take the objection he did, to hear the decision you gave, and sit in his place without rising and saying, "I cannot allow this to pass; no doubt there are Bills before the House for Ireland and Scotland, but the Government are going to withdraw them, and therefore these Instructions ought to be discussed on the Bill for England as if the other Bills were not before the House." So much for the question of order. The question raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Ayrshire is one, I think, of very great gravity and deserving well the attention of the House. I hold the opinion myself that, with regard to the question of amending the representation of the people, there are two courses that may be pursued by the Government. They may come down to the House and say, "We think there ought to be an Amendment of the representation of the people, but the only place that requires amendment is England, and there is no occasion for Bills either for Scotland or Ireland, and we do not mean to propose any." That course would be quite plain and intelligible. I can well understand, with reference to Ireland, for instance, that the Government should not consider there ought to be any further reduction in the franchise, there having been one so lately. Another course is to come down to the House and say, "We think there ought to be an amendment of the representation for all parts of the kingdom; at the same time, it is not convenient to put the three branches of the kingdom in one Bill; we will have separate Bills, but still those Bills may be considered as one great measure for amending the representation of the people." That was the course the Government adopted; and what I contend, what I shall show conclusively, is this,—that if you adopt that course you are bound, I do not say to put the whole measure into one Bill, but I do say to pass the whole measure in one Session, or else postpone it to such a time that it may be considered in one Session. Now, although we have three Bills in name they are so intimately connected together that virtually you cannot dis sever them. Take the question of the disfranchisement of boroughs. That is a very delicate question. It comes home, I am sure, as much as any question can to the feelings and prejudices of hon. Gentlemen; and it is most deeply affected by the course which the Government proposed to take. On what principle do you disfranchise boroughs? On that point there is no difference of opinion on either side of the House. The noble Lord announced his principle very much in the same terms as my right hon. Friend (Mr. Disraeli) did last year. You do not disfranchise a borough merely because it is a small borough. You first try what seats you want to obtain for enlarged or newly-created constituencies, and when you sum up all the seats which you require you cast about to see how you can procure the means of gaining those seats by disfranchisement. The course the Government took is this—they told us "We desire twenty-five seats for England; we desire two for Scotland and two for Ireland. That makes twenty-nine seats in the whole." Now, what are the materials out of which the Government are to obtain these seats? They start with four from the disfranchised boroughs—Sudbury and St. Albans. They then take 25 boroughs of England, from each of which they take one Member, and that at once makes the whole 29 seats. As long as you proceed with all your measures together it is a complete plan—enfranchisement and disfranchisement going side by side; but what do you propose to do now? You say we put off the Irish and Scotch Bills; what is the consequence? Who knows when they will be brought in again, or if they ever will be passed? In the meantime you do not want 29 seats, but only 25 seats. As the Government has four seats already at command, they only want 21; but the present Bill is to disfranchise 25 English boroughs to supply 21 seats. What is the consequence? You have got, in point of disfranchisement, four seats too many. No doubt, the Government may say, "We will set that right in the Bill; we will disfranchise four seats the less." But what 21 boroughs out of the 25 will you take? Your principle is to take all the boroughs under 7,000 population, and which return two Members,—these are 25 in number; that rule cannot be applied to produce you only 21 seats. Now, although you have got separate English, Irish, and Scotch Bills, you have linked the whole three together by your scheme of enfranchisement and disfranchisement; and I appeal to the House whether it will consent actually to disfranchise four seats before being satisfied that there are four places to which those seats may be assigned. I will take now another question, which has been already touched upon—a very delicate and tender one—that of a dissolution of Parliament. But I must first set right the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor for the Duchy, who, with rather scant courtesy, and no small energy of manner, corrected, as he thought, my hon. Friend the Member for Ayrshire upon this point. I do not think it is quite the way, in this House where arguments have been adduced with such temper and ability as were evinced by my hon. Friend, to say that an hon. Member, when he talks of a dissolution of Parliament and a new constituency, shows he knows nothing about the Bill of which he is talking. I will not say of the Chancellor of the Duchy that he knows nothing of what he is talking about. But take this Bill. I open the Bill at the 20th clause, and I find the proposal of the Government is, that the new constituencies are to be entitled to vote after any dissolution that takes place after the last day of November in the present year [Sir GEORGE GREY: "Read to the end."] I will read to the end, "and subject to the conditions affecting his right to be registered in any year shall be entitled to be registered in any register of voters to be formed for such county, riding, or division, or for such city or borough, in or after the year 1860. [Sir GEORGE GREY: He must comply with the conditions.] The right hon. Gentleman is exceedingly rapid in his conclusions, and I am following him as fast as I can. Thus the register of voters is to be formed not only after the year 1860, but in it.

[Second Night.]

The right hon. Baronet says the conditions must be complied with. Well, what are they? That before a certain day notice must be given of the claim to be placed on the register for the present year. That day is six weeks off. We do not know if the Bill is to be proceeded with; but if so, it may possibly receive the Royal Assent within six weeks, and every person qualified by it may give the legal notice. But if not, what is to prevent the insertion of words enlarging this 20th clause—it is a mere form—and giving time for the notice? The result would be the same as that produced in 1832, when at a later period of the Session than this the Reform Bill received the Royal Assent, and many weeks after the Bills for Scotland and Ireland were passed, and yet there was a registration, a dissolution, and an election, the time having been enlarged for giving the necessary notice. Having cleared the ground so far, I hope the right hon. Gentleman is satisfied that we can have a dissolution and an election. The next point is a delicate one; of course we cannot ask the Government what advice it will tender to the Crown with regard to a dissolution; and if we did we should not get a reply, and the refusal would be a very proper one. But there is one proposition on the subject that is very safe; and I think I may hazard it without any dispute, even from the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. If the English Reform Bill is passed, I presume the Government will either advise the Crown to dissolve Parliament, or it will not. That is a safe and logical division of the subject; and I am quite indifferent as to the alternative the Government may select, because the only difficulty is to know which of the two will be the more absurd. I will take the first supposition, and assume that the Government does advise the Crown to dissolve Parliament. Then, if the election is taken on the new registry, the consequence will be that we shall have a Parliament in which the Members for English boroughs and counties will be elected by a constituency wholly different from that which returns the Irish and Scotch Members. I will not go into figures, but you will have the English Members elected by a constituency, say, double the number of that which returns the Irish and Scotch Members. And that is not all. As soon as this Parliament is brought together, what will it have to do? The first thing it will have to consider will be the Reform Bills for Scotland and Ireland. In the meantime the Irish and Scotch Members will sit as criminals brought up for judgment till such time as these Bills receive the Royal Assent. And who will be their Judges? We have heard a petition quoted this evening which designated the present measure as an "instalment" only, and only as such was accepted. The meaning of that I take to be that the new Parliament is considered likely to go much further than the present House is prepared to do. Thus, the English Members elected by the new constituency will be the judges of the measure of Reform to be applied to Ireland and Scotland. Is it fair that this should be done by a Parliament that is neither the present one, nor elected by a constituency like the present? Nor is this all. If the Government advises the Crown to dissolve Parliament after the passing of the English Reform Bill, will it next year, also advise the Crown to dissolve it after passing the Irish and Scotch Bills? If so, the very pleasant and convenient consequence will be, that this winter we shall have a dissolution after passing the English Bill, and in the next winter another dissolution following the Scotch and Irish Bills. That is one branch of the alternative; now let me take the other. I will assume that the Government does not advise the Crown to dissolve. What will then happen? Having a new constituency double the number of the present, you will have this House sitting next spring, taxing the people and legislating for the people; at the same time there will exist in the country a constituency wholly different from that which elected the present House. And perhaps the House may be acting entirely against the wishes of that constituency, while it is taxing and legislating for the whole of the country. Talk of a division between representation and taxation! Was there ever a division between them like this? Was there ever such a case known in this country as the existence of a new constituency, having the right to elect the Members of Parliament, yet not permitted to exercise that right, and being taxed and legislated for by Members they did not select, and which, if they had had the opportunity, they would not have returned to serve in Parliament at all? We have heard some observations by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on this matter well worthy of remark. There were many points in his Budget; but one not less surprising than the others was this—he told us that the great object in producing the Budget of the present year was to leave everything beyond it—the income tax, tea duties, and sugar duties, as totally open questions for the Parliament in the next year. And not only that; the right hon. Gentleman used these remarkable words; he spoke of the masses—[The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER expressed dissent]. The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head, but if accurately reported his words were these:—

“If masses of our fellow-countrymen . . . are to be admitted to the franchise . . . do not let us presume to lay the foundations of jealousy—perhaps of disloyalty and disorder—by promulgating the doctrine that in proportion to the larger number of the people responsible for the election and conduct of Parliament the powers of that Parliament are to be limited.”

This was said in answer to a remonstrance against the course of the right hon. Gentleman in not making permanent some of the taxation for years in advance. The right hon. Gentleman put his refusal to do so simply on this ground, that if you were going to admit the “masses” of the country to the franchise, you ought not to fetter the hands of the new Parliament with regard to the financial arrangements for future years. But if you do admit these masses to be registered as the electors of the country, and if they find next year, by some Budget equally remarkable as the present, a system of taxation imposed which, to judge by past experience, will probably be as opposite as possible to the present, do you not think some of these masses may say, “The Chancellor of the Exchequer prepared us last year for showing jealousy, disloyalty, and disorder,” and that that jealousy, disloyalty, and disorder, they will be much more entitled to show, if, having given them the franchise and placed them on the roll of electors, they find the House of Commons continue to impose taxation of which they disapprove, and on which they have had no opportunity of expressing an opinion? I take the question of a dissolution, therefore, on either alternative the Government pleases. I have shown what will follow if the Crown is advised to dissolve Parliament; and what will be the results if it is not so advised. The proposition of the Government is that the House should go into Committee on the English Bill, and that the Irish and Scotch Bills shall be abandoned. If the English Bill is to be pressed on in this urgent manner, and disconnected from the two Bills that have always been associated with it, I think it is desirable, at all events, that we should be quite sure we have got full and proper materials for the consideration of the English Bill. That is more necessary for this reason—the noble Lord admitted distinctly that the Government first tried an £8 franchise, but, finding it would not bring in a great number of new electors, it was not thought worth while to disturb the country for that. It then tried a £7 franchise, which brought in a somewhat greater number, but not enough. Then it tried the £6 franchise, and that brought in something like 200,000 voters. This the noble Lord thought was not so many as to endanger the constituency of the country, yet enough to justify the introduction of the Reform Bill. Now, that argument depends entirely on the correctness of the noble Lord's data as to his figures. Let us now see how matters stand with regard to the materials. Upwards of three months have elapsed since the Bill was introduced. I want to know what the Government have done in the meantime. From various sides questions have been raised with respect to the accuracy of the Returns upon which the Government proceed. Yet, so far as I am aware, no step has been taken by the Government either to satisfy the House that its fears are groundless and that the alleged errors do not exist in reality, or, on the other hand, to correct those errors and supply us with better materials. We have been told, indeed, that in “another place” about which we know nothing, the Government have assented to an inquiry; but even with respect to that inquiry we have, I think, some right to complain. If there were no grounds for inquiry, if the Government were satisfied that the materials already in their hands were perfectly correct, why were our minds disturbed by finding them evince so much weakness as to their own case that they assented to the appointment of a Committee in “another place?” But if the Government have a doubt as to the correctness of their Returns, why should we not have a similar inquiry here, in which we might ascertain for ourselves the truth of those rumours which are spread abroad, and which no individual Member has the means of testing? I shall not attempt, at so late an hour of the night, to deal in any large manner with the Returns of the Government; but I may be permitted to state, in the briefest way, three particular points on which I charge those Returns with being delusive, as to which I have never yet heard an answer, and as to which I do not believe an answer can be given. The first ground of inaccuracy is this. We have been shown the direction given with regard to the making out of these Returns, and in those directions there were the most careful, and I must say the most ingeniously framed, orders to the Poor Law authorities to remove all duplicate names from the list of persons entitled to be put upon the new constituency. But the Government entirely overlooked what is an equally important point, the fact, namely, that there is not a large borough in England with a considerable number of electors upon the roll, in which, among those electors there is not upon the present roll, a great number of duplicates. Take the case of Bristol. The Government Returns inform us that in Bristol there are 12,929 electors. But among those electors there are 3,082 duplicates. It may be supposed that, as there are freemen in Bristol, those duplicates may be attributed to them; but such is not the case to any great extent, for I am told that only about 800 duplicates are attributable to the circumstance of some freemen being electors by virtue of occupation. From the way in which the tables of the Government are framed, the 3,082 duplicates are reckoned a second time in the column showing the excess of the new electors over the old, and the consequence is that, whereas the Returns show that the excess in Bristol would be 3,487 as compared with 12,929, the real excess is 6,569 as compared with 9,847. It is vain to talk of legislation upon data of that kind. I cannot give any other case, but I have no reason to suppose that Bristol is an exception; on the contrary, I believe it will be found that the same circumstances exist in every other large borough in the kingdom. The second head upon which I impeach the accuracy of the Returns may be equally briefly stated. The tables give you the names of the occupiers of tenements rated to the poor, but they wholly overlook what is well-known to every one acquainted with the language of the revising barristers—namely, that there is hardly a tenement in any populous town inhabited by the working classes in which there are not what the revising barrister calls separate houses. In the language of the revising barristers, a single room may be a house. The question whether it is so or not depends upon a nice and interesting inquiry as to whether there is a common staircase, whether there is a door which all the lodgers can open, and whether the landlord resides in the building. Anybody living in a large manufacturing town will tell you that he knows scores of houses containing four, five, and even six separate dwellings, each of which, the rent being at least 2s. 6d. a week, would give the occupier the right to be put upon the registry as the tenant of a house of the yearly value of £6. The Government have entirely overlooked that circumstance, which I have no hesitation in saying will multiply the number of electors in many populous towns four and five-fold. I shall trouble the House with only one other instance of inaccuracy. We have already been informed of errors in the tables showing the gross estimated value. I shall state a single case—that of Leeds. In the Government Returns the gross estimated rental of the borough of Leeds is given at £548,198; but the Property Tax value, representing exactly the same property, is £688,000, making a difference of about £140,000.

[Second Night.]

MR. BAINES: The hon. and learned Gentleman excludes the land.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS: The land may make a small difference, but certainly not much.

MR. BAINES: I can assure the hon. and learned Gentleman that the land is very valuable indeed, for Leeds is one of the most extensive boroughs in the kingdom.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS: Does the hon. Member mean to say that the estimated value of the land in the borough of Leeds is £140,000. If he does, he makes the most surprising statement I ever heard in my life. Leeds is divided into a number of townships. The assessment is made in each township for itself. It is a matter of indifference to the township whether the rate is high or low, provided it is even and equal; but over the whole town there is a borough rate which covers all the townships, and the overseers vie with one another in keeping their assessments as low as they can, in order that the incidence of the borough rate may be as light as possible. The result is what I have stated, that there is a difference of £140,000 between the gross estimated rental and the property tax value, and the consequence will be that there will be a much larger addition to the existing constituency than is shown by the Returns of the Government. The present number of electors is 5,945; the Government tables represent the addition as 5,000, but it will be as much again, for the circumstance I have stated will bring in occupiers between £5 and £6, who are upwards of 5,000 in number. I have now stated the three points upon which I impeach the accuracy of the Government Returns, and I think I have shown reason enough for an individual Member why we should not be driven into rash and precipitate legislation upon a subject where the ground for legislation is the correctness of those data. I shall now call the attention of the House to another matter. The noble Lord asks us to go into Committee upon the English Bill, admitting that the state of business is such that he cannot hope to press on the Irish and Scotch Bills. I would ask the House for a moment to take a view of the business of the Session. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the peroration of a speech which I shall long remember, told us that he expected that this Session would be memorable because it would be fruitful of blessings. Well, we are four months advanced into the Session of Parliament, and I think it is nearly time that we should, as merchants say, "take stock" of our blessings. I do not think that even the exuberant fancy of the Chancellor of the Exchequer ever led him to suppose that the Bill which is now under consideration was one of the blessings which, to use an expression of my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Dublin, was to be inflicted on the people of this country. Therefore I put it out of consideration; but I will look at the other blessings to which I think that the right hon. Gentleman was referring. First there was the Budget. Well, various opinions have been entertained with regard to the Budget, but I am rather disposed to think that even its most sanguine admirers are beginning to consider that they are something like the people in the Eastern tale who were credulous enough to take a present of fairy gold at night, and who woke up in the morning and found that their gold had turned into dried leaves. Then we have the French treaty. Of course, it is not now the time to discuss any point with regard to that treaty, but only two days ago I happened to see a statement upon the subject in a very great and authoritative commercial organ, generally one of the strongest supporters of Her Majesty's Government; and what did it say? It said this:—

Sir Hugh Cairns

"The dissatisfaction among various English manufacturers at the consequences of the hasty manner in which the French treaty has been framed is manifesting itself, not merely in the silk districts, where the immediate consequences to the operatives have been especially disastrous, but also at Huddersfield, Leeds, Manchester, Leicester, and other important towns."

Then it gave a number of details as to matters affecting these different towns, and concluded thus:—

"It is disagreeable to have to make these statements, but they are on the lips of all mercantile people, and remarks respecting them may have the effect of drawing forth contradictions if they are incorrect, or, in the opposite case, encouraging assurances that there is a prospect of amelioration. It is but fair, likewise, to explain that those who expressed gratification at the treaty when it was first announced may now, without inconsistency, avow misgivings, since they naturally assumed that it had been well considered, and that they might take for granted it would meet all the reasonable wishes of the manufacturing classes, in whose interests it had been specially arranged."

Now, that is a very candid statement with regard to our blessing No. 2. We will go a little further. I suppose I may take the speech from the Throne as a programme of what our blessings were to be, and what do I find announced in that speech? A very attractive programme with regard to law reform. We were to have a fusion of law and equity, we were to have a measure for the amendment of the law of bankruptcy, we were to have a consolidation of the law as to public companies, we were to have a measure for the consolidation of the statutes, and we were to have a measure for simplifying titles to land. All these were mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. I do not see my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General in his place, and, as he is not present, I will say this with regard to him, that I do not believe there is in this House, I do not believe there ever sat in this House, a man more sincere, and certainly there never was a man more capable of carrying into effect any measure of legal reform. Therefore, in the observations I am about to make, I attach no blame to him; I am describing the state of the business of the Session. What has happened with regard to those measures of law reform? We have heard something about the fusion of law and equity. We have seen no measure having that object, but we have heard a story about what has happened elsewhere. We have heard that such a measure was produced in "another place," but that the moment it saw the light it was sat upon and hustled and trampled, and ultimately, after a life of a very few days, it has retired into that limbo in which all Bills of that kind find refuge, and from which it is not likely to emerge. The Bill for the Amendment of the law of Bankruptcy has been brought into this House, and I will say that whatever difference of opinion there may be as to its details, it is a great and worthy measure of law reform. But let us see how the business of the House stands with regard to it. It has been discussed for one night. It consists of 500 clauses and upwards, and in one night we got through, I believe, twenty-five. At that rate it would take nineteen more nights in Committee; and I want to know what prospect there is of the Government being able to give half of that number of nights or days for its discussion. The next measure which was premised was a Bill for the amendment and consolidation of the laws with regard to public companies—a measure which is loudly cried out for by the country, and is a practical measure about the advantage of which there can be no dispute. Well, that Bill has come down to this House, and it lies on your table. It consists of some 400 or 500 clauses, and not a clause has been read in Committee up to the present moment, and there does not seem much chance therefore of making much progress with it during the present Session. The next measure was that for the consolidation of the statutes. I do not know whether the hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. L. King) is in his place, but I am speaking upon a subject to which he has devoted no small attention, and I can fancy his disappointment at contrasting the present state of affairs with the promise in the Speech from the Throne. Where is the measure for the consolidation of the statutes? Why, we have had brought down from the House of Lords the old crop of hardy annuals which come down to us every year—the Bills for the consolidation of the law as to offences, beginning, I believe, with offences against rabbits and ending with high treason. We have them every year, and they have come back this year; but as to the measure for the consolidation of the statute law, I have neither seen nor heard anything about it in this House. I come now to the last measure of law Reform. That is a Bill about which there really is unanimity in the country; there is a great demand, great necessity for it, and great delight when it makes its appearance. I mean the measure for simpli-

[Second Night.]

Sir Hugh Cairns

fying titles to land. What is the history of that Bill? We have had upon the paper ever since Parliament met a notice of Motion by the hon. and learned Attorney General that on such a night he would move for leave to bring in a Bill to simplify the titles to land. That notice is on the paper still. It has been there week after week, but the Motion has never been made, the Bill has never been seen, and to talk of passing such a measure this Session is out of the question. I do not know what more blessings there are coming to us, but at all events we have secured very few of these. I want to know why these measures to which I have referred are not gone on with. They are postponed from day to day and from week to week in order to make way for this unfortunate production of the noble Lord's, which since the day of its unhappy birth has never heard a kindly word and never received a friendly smile from any Gentleman on either side of the House. The hon. Member for Birmingham has to-night given us a valuable piece of information. He said, "If you only would not take The Times, but would take another paper, and would read the accounts of the meetings which are being held in the country about this Bill, you would no longer say that the country is not anxious for it." He did not mention the name of the other paper that we were to take. [Cries of "The Star."] I hope that in private he will communicate the information to some of us, because I should like to see something of the meetings. In the absence of that paper, however, we have a document in this House which gives us some information. We have the Report of the Committee on Petitions. The hon. Member for Birmingham says that there are 6,000,000 of unrepresented adults in the country, who are extremely anxious for representation. I must say they keep the secret very much to themselves, because I find that up to the present time the petitions from these 6,000,000 adults do not include 10,000 names. Well, Sir, the aspect of this question with regard to this Bill, which has changed from week to week, which changed in consequence of the announcement of the noble Lord as to the Bills for Ireland and Scotland, has changed also in another respect, in consequence of another announcement which he made that night. I mean the announcement by which he invited us to go into Committee, and promised us changes which might be made in the Bill. Now, I certainly was surprised at that announcement from the noble Lord, and I will tell the House why. I remember what happened last year. I remember that my right hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire (Sir E. B. Lytton) made a speech upon the Reform Bill which few who heard it will ever forget, in which, in answer to the Resolution proposed by the noble Lord, he said, "You object to certain things in this Bill, you object to the franchise and to other matters; well, state your objections in Committee, prove them, and they will be considered." That was the statement of my right hon. Friend, and what happened after that? Why, Sir, one after another, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War—whom I do not see in his place—and other Members of the present Government rose in their places and used language of this kind. They said, "Was there ever anything like this? Here is a Government which proposes a Reform Bill. Of course, it has some principle; and yet the Government, after proposing it, as soon as a Motion impugning certain parts of it is proposed, come down to the House and say, 'If you will only go into Committee and prove a case we shall be quite willing to consider it, and we may perhaps come to some agreement upon the points in dispute.'" I thought that after that a very different course would be pursued by the Government this year. But what is the statement of the noble Lord? Speaking of the borough franchise, he said:—

"I have since heard many objections to that franchise. I have heard it said that it would quite overwhelm property and intelligence. That again is a question for Committee. And this I will say, that if you will propose any of the measures that have been mentioned this evening, either for raising the franchise by making it a rating instead of a rental franchise, or by increasing the amount of the rental, or in another way that has been pointed out, by admitting a great number of voters who are distinguished by property, or by a high degree of knowledge from those belonging to the working classes, any proposition of the kind shall be fairly considered by us in Committee. We certainly shall not declare ourselves so completely wedded to the franchise which we have put forward that we will not submit to treat on the subject. If, in Committee, such a proposal as I have alluded to be made, and if the House should prefer it to that which we have originated, it will be our duty to see whether the Bill with such an alteration would be a valuable measure, whether it would extend the franchise in a manner that would strengthen the institutions of the country; and, in that case, though we might not think it a change for the better, we should be ready to adopt that alteration." [3 Hansard, clix., p. 1992.]

Well, Sir, there is a thing called retributive justice, and if ever there was an instance of retributive justice in a short space of time it is to find the noble Lord, whose Resolution was then supported by his present Colleagues, rising in his place and using with regard to this Bill language to which that held by my right hon. Friend was almost as nothing. The proposal of the noble Lord itself requires a word or two. If the noble Lord, in the month of February last, had said on behalf of the Government, "Here is our Reform Bill; here are our statistics with reference to it; we think the franchises we have proposed are the best. If, however, you distrust our data, we are willing to have an inquiry into its accuracy. If you go into Committee it shall be an open question, whether you should adopt our franchises, or whether reason may be shown for altering them." If the noble Lord, speaking in relation to the Bills for the reform of the representation of the entire United Kingdom, had said this last February, I think it would have been a reasonable proposition, and one which I am satisfied would have been gladly accepted by this side of the House. But when four months of the Session have expired, and there hardly remains sufficient time for us to pass the Estimates and dispose of our other ordinary routine business, for the noble Lord to tell us, "We abandon our Irish and Scotch Reform Bills; we maintain our English Bill; let us throw it loose upon the Committee, leaving you to scramble there for clause after clause as best you may," is, I say, unworthy treatment towards this House, and a mode of proceeding to which we cannot creditably assent. Suppose, however, we go into Committee. What is the first clause of the Bill? Why, it prescribes what shall constitute your county franchise. But the noble Lord has admitted again and again that the principle on which the Government is acting is to fix the borough franchise first and then to keep the county franchise not identical with but higher than that for the boroughs. But if he says, "You may fight about the borough franchise; you may turn it into a rating franchise, or raise the rental if you prefer that course; we shall be satisfied to accept that proposal, although we do not think it the best," how, I ask, are you to pass the county franchise, the subject of the very first clause, until you know what is to be the borough franchise which the House will approve and the Government adopt? The Committee would, therefore, be entirely useless and illusory, as we should find the moment we came to the first clause. I say it is not intended to go into Committee to do what the hon. Member for Birmingham stated was recommended in the Speech from the Throne in five separate years. We are not asked to go into Committee now for the purpose of settling the whole question of Parliamentary Reform for the United Kingdom. More than that, I say, we are not going into Committee actually to settle or with the time and the materials for settling the question of Reform even for England alone. We shall be asked, as hon. Members who usually support the Government have told us, to dispute about abstract questions that will bear no fruit and lead to no result except, perhaps, as being a rehearsal for some future effort of the noble Lord. But I appeal to the House to rescue themselves, and also the Government, from so undignified a position. Let me ask you these three questions, the answers to which are most important—first, are there the materials on which we can depend for the discussion of the details of this Bill? Secondly, are there, consistent with the other business of the Session, time and opportunity for sifting those materials? And, thirdly, is it a wise or a constitutional proceeding to deal with the subject of an alteration in the law for the representation of the people as to different parts of the United Kingdom piecemeal? If, as I confidently believe, the answer of the House to each of these questions will be in the negative, then, I say, the right, the politic, and even the necessary course for us to pursue is this—the Bills for Scotland and Ireland now being withdrawn, let the Bill for England also follow their example.

[Second Night.]

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Mr. Speaker, the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down commenced his speech by rebuking the hon. Member for Birmingham for having departed from the subject-matter of the debate, and for having made, on the question whether the House should adjourn, a speech which he said belonged to the third reading of the Bill; and the explanation he was good enough to give for that proceeding of the hon. Member for Birmingham was, that, being satisfied that the Bill would never come to a third reading, he was anxious to deliver a speech which he felt he should not have an opportunity of delivering on the proper occasion.

Sir Hugh Cairns

But the hon. and learned Gentleman, with the most marvellous inconsistency, has fallen himself into that very error which he, unjustly and improperly, imputed to the hon. Member for Birmingham. He has made to-night a speech upon the Motion for going into Committee on the Bill which properly belongs to the discussion in Committee; but he has given on this occasion a far better reason than he ascribed to the hon. Member for Birmingham, for whereas the hon. Member for Birmingham assuming, as he says, that other people would not allow the Bill to go to a third reading, has anticipated the third reading by that speech to-night; the hon. and learned Gentleman having determined for himself and his friends that the House should not go into Committee founded upon his own decision, which he flatters himself he shall be able to carry into effect, has anticipated by a speech adapted to the Committee that stage of the Bill which he and his friends have determined the Bill shall never reach. But the hon. and learned Gentleman was not only inconsistent, but, if I may be allowed to say so, he was guilty of an act of gross insubordination. It belonged to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire at the close of the Session to perform that operation which is usually called "a review of the Session;" but the hon. and learned Gentleman in the month of June—the beginning of June—by entering into a review of the Session, has not only assumed the duties of the leader on that side of the House, but has actually infringed on our duties, for he likewise performed the operation of the "massacre of the innocents." The hon. and learned Gentleman not only diverged from the proper subject of debate by discussing the details of the Bill—a discussion which ought to be reserved for the Committee, but he went into a still wider range of digression, and began to discuss all the measures which have been proposed in the course of the Session, some of which have been, and some of which have not been submitted to the House. And, Sir, the hon. and learned Gentleman enumerated the blessings which he said were to have been showered, or have been showered down on the country in the course of the Session. But there was one blessing he forgot to enumerate, the "gift of tongue." The amplitude and the excess with which that blessing has been bestowed upon the other side of the House has been the main cause why we have been deprived of the full enjoyment of all those other good things to which he alluded. Why, Sir, if we have come now to the beginning of June without even having got into Committee on a Bill, which the hon. and learned Gentleman accuses us of having hurried through the House—if that is the state of the matter, what has been the cause of it? Why, the cause has been that we have been incessantly interrupted by delays—by the delays which have been purposely interposed by the other side to obstruct the progress of the Bill, and which those who wish to obstruct have not dared openly to attack. I really wish, Sir, to call the attention of the House to the condition in which we are. The hon. and learned Gentleman called on the House to rescue itself from the undignified position in which it was placed. I concur with the hon. and learned Gentleman. I do ask the House to rescue itself from what I do think a most undignified position. Does the House mean to pass the Reform Bill, or does it not? The hon. and learned Gentleman ended by asking a string of questions. I also wish to ask a question. I ask the House whether they are of opinion that a reform in the representation of the people is proper and right, or whether they are determined that there shall be no reform? Why, Sir, the course which has been adopted during this Session since the introduction of the Bill, would lead any reasoning man to say that it was the resolve of the House that there should be no Reform Bill—no Bill at all events, this Session; and the arguments we now hear adduced might equally apply to any subsequent Session in which a similar Bill might be proposed. Now, Sir, let me entreat the House to consider the position in which public men are placed in regard to this question of Reform. As long as the proposal for Reform originated on one side of the House, with one section of the House, and was resisted on principle by the other—so long as it might be doubtful what might be the influence of argument, or what the effect of a dissolution and re-election upon the strength of those two opposing parties, so long it was justifiable for those who opposed Reform to oppose it on principle, to object at every stage to every Bill that might be proposed to Parliament in order to carry out an arrangement to which they on principle steadfastly and determinedly objected. But is that the condition in which this question is now placed? We have had, as has been stated by the hon. Member for Birmingham, not only many repeated announcements from the Throne recommending this question to the consideration of the House, but now there is no longer any distinction in principle between the two parties who might aspire to the Government of the country. The moment that the Earl of Derby's Administration proposed a Reform Bill, and that Bill was supported by the whole Conservative party, from that moment it was impossible that the House of Commons could consistently and permanently refuse to pass a Bill for reforming the representation of the country. Therefore, those hon. Gentlemen who sit on the other side of the House are precluded from taking a course inconsistent with the line of argument they have pursued, with the conduct of their leaders, with their own conduct in support of those leaders, and with that which happened last year; and I say that it is not a straightforward or manly course to endeavour by delays to postpone the consideration of a measure, to the principle of which they are as much pledged as those who sit on this side of the House. Well, then, Sir, what is it that those Gentlemen object to? The Bill that we have proposed has been acknowledged to be very simple in its provisions. [Ironical cheers.] Yes, Sir, no man can deny that. It contains three leading enactments; a reduction of the borough franchise, a reduction of the county franchise, and a transfer of seats. But if hon. Gentlemen entertained those objections which they have so strongly expressed in the course of these discussions, why did they not oppose the second reading of the Bill? Every argument which they have used went to resist the second reading. They have objected on principle to the provisions of the Bill, and I say they ought to have objected to the second reading. They did not object to the second reading. They admitted, therefore, the principle upon which the Bill is founded, the principle—namely, of lowering those respective franchises, and a certain amount of transfer of seats; and their arguments entirely turned upon the details, and upon the degree to which those different arrangements should be carried into effect. Their arguments, therefore, necessarily drove them into Committee, if they were consistent in the line of argument which they adopted. If they were prepared on principle to admit and support and vote for a Bill which reduced the borough franchise and the county franchise, and provided for a transfer of seats, and their objections were only to the extent to which any or all of these different arrangements were carried out, I say, that, having agreed to the Bill on principle by not opposing it and voting for its second reading, they were bound in consistency to go into Committee, and there endeavour to establish the objections in degree and not in principle which they felt to the different portions of the Bill. But then the hon. and learned Gentleman finds fault with my noble Friend for having stated on a former evening that, if, when we got into Committee, the House should be of opinion that some modification was proper to be made in those three different arrangements, the Government were not so wedded to their own plan but that they would fairly consider any proposal that might be made in Committee. The hon. and learned Gentleman says that my noble Friend is inconsistent in that; because, when the late Government proposed their Bill, he, instead of going into Committee, moved a Resolution establishing certain principles, applicable to the Bill which they had introduced. But, Sir, the cases are totally different. What was the Bill of the late Government? Why, when they brought in their Bill they stated that the one fundamental principle on which that Bill was founded was the identity of the town and county franchisees, and that another principle equally essential to the Bill was that the county voters resident in represented towns should be deprived of their county votes. Consequently to have gone into Committee on that Bill with the intention of proposing any alteration in these fundamental principles would have been childish and absurd. My noble Friend, therefore, took the only course which was open to him, and asked the House to resolve before the Bill went into Committee that those principles were not the principles on which the Bill ought to be founded. Hon. Gentlemen opposite gave up their Bill consistently with the ground they had taken, because the Resolution of my noble Friend went to the fundamental principles of the Bill; but the objections now taken by the other side do not go to the fundamental principles of the Bill. They only go to the detail and to the degree in which those fundamental principles are to be carried out. As matters stood there might have been some consistency in the opposition which hon. Gentlemen opposite have made to a Bill which is founded upon principles different from those which constituted the essence of their own measure; but after that period the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire stated that his Government were prepared to depart from those principles, and to make a reduction of the borough franchise. Therefore, all difference of opinion between those who sit on that side of the House and those who sit on this in regard to the fundamental elements of the Bill has ceased, and it is now come simply to the question of the degree in which the principles of our Bill are to be carried out. That being the case, the hon. and learned Gentleman says, "Here we have been upwards of three weeks discussing this Bill, and have not yet got into Committee." Well, whose fault is that? I think it is a little too much for those who inflict an injury, to make that injury a cause of complaint against the party injured. But he says that our data are not satisfactory; that an inquiry has been instituted in "another place;" and why, he asks, has no such inquiry been instituted here? Has anybody asked for that inquiry? Did any hon. Gentleman, who felt a doubt about the accuracy of these returns, move for an inquiry? And have we resisted that Motion? Why, if that inquiry has not yet been made, it is incumbent upon those who thought it necessary to have proposed it, and they are not entitled to complain of its not having been made until they have brought forward the proposal themselves, and that proposal has been negatived. We have, indeed, heard one hon. Member after another, stating from his place that his knowledge of this or that borough led him to think that there was some difference, not in many cases very important, between the results of the returns which we had obtained and laid upon the table, and the results of his own personal and local inquiries. But these were precisely the points which ought to be urged in Committee, which are applicable to the Committee, and not to the second reading, or to the question of you, Sir, leaving the chair to go into Committee. Therefore I say that the whole of the discussions that have taken place, from the time that this Bill was introduced, down to the present evening, have been discussions, not embodying the opinions entertained as to the particular stage of the Bill under discussion at the time, but a series of objections, evidently urged for the purpose of creating delay, and obstructing a Bill, which either they did not venture, or did not, according to their own principles, feel themselves at liberty to oppose entirely upon the general grounds of the matter and tendency of the Bill. And to-night we have really come to the climax of these proceedings. Hitherto, when a debate has been spun out by a great number of speeches, and twelve o'clock has arrived, we have been told that it is too late to go on, and a Motion of adjournment has been moved; and at that hour of the night it has been impossible for the Government with any decency to refuse their acquiescence in the Motion, when they were told that shoals of orators were ready with speeches unspoken, but ready prepared, upon the subject of debate. But this evening we have had a novelty; and the Motion for the adjournment of the debate, usually made at twelve o'clock at night, has been made at half-past four in the day. An anticipated lassitude, a foretold incapacity of sitting out the debate, has come upon hon. Gentlemen opposite; and at half-past four they declare that it is impossible for them to find strength of body or of mind to go on with the debate; and they have begged and entreated to be allowed to go home and prepare fresh speeches on the subject! That may be a very fair reason, why Gentlemen, who have been for the last few days attending other amusements, have not been able to devote that time and attention which is necessary to prepare themselves for the occasion; but I do not think it is a decorous Motion to make in the House of Commons upon a question of great national importance. It is founded upon something which my noble Friend stated a few nights ago, in regard to the respective Bills for England, Scotland, and Ireland. My noble Friend stated that the prolongation of these discussions, the pressure of other business, and the period of the Session, rendered it unlikely that we should be able during the present Session to dispose, not only of the English, but of the Scotch and Irish Bills also; and that being the case, Her Majesty's Government thought that no public inconvenience could arise from postponing, until next Session, the discussion of the Scotch and the Irish Bills. The hon. and learned Gentleman has talked of abandoning the Scotch and Irish Bills, as though it were supposed that we were going to give up both those Bills; but my noble Friend stated no such thing. What he stated had simply reference to the order of proceeding, and to the fact that, if we were able to pass the English Bill this Session, it would be too late to take up the Scotch and Irish Bills; which would, therefore, render it necessary to propose them again in another Session. But the hon. and learned Gentleman says he has placed us on the horns of a dilemma; because either we shall or shall not have to advise the Crown to dissolve Parliament the moment the English Bill has passed; and he points out what in his opinion will be an absurdity and an incompatibility in either of those courses. Undoubtedly, it would be a most unusual and preposterous course of proceeding, if the moment the English Bill has passed, Government were thereupon to advise the Crown to dissolve Parliament, in order that a new Parliament might be assembled, and take up the Irish and Scotch Bills. Suppose, for instance, that had happened when Parliament met—which, without any great exaggeration, might have been expected—that when the English Reform Bill was proposed, all parties had given their minds fairly to consider the Bill, and earnestly to assist in passing such a Bill as they might think safe and proper, the English Bill would have passed at an early period of the Session, but would any man suppose that immediately after Easter, because the English Bill had passed, Parliament was to be dissolved in order that there might be another Parliament to consider the Irish and Scotch Bills? And yet the argument used by hon. Gentlemen opposite in regard to the postponement of the Irish and Scotch Bills to next Session would lead to that. They say, "If you pass the English Bill this Session, and therefore prospectively alter the English constituencies, then the Parliament elected by the old constituencies will not be entitled to come together next Session for the purpose of considering the other two measures." What difference in principle is there between a Parliament whose constituency has been prospectively altered going on in the same Session to deal with the Irish and Scotch Bills, to impose taxes, to pass important laws affecting all the great interests of the country—what difference, I ask, is there between such a Parliament doing that and the same Parliament performing precisely the same operation when called together after a recess? I am at a loss to see the distinction. Therefore it by no means follows that because Parliament should in one year complete the English Reform Bill, this House would therefore be incompetent to sit again next year to dispose of the Irish and Scotch Bills. It would certainly not be till these three Bills had been passed that, on that account, there would be any necessity for dissolving Parliament and appealing to the new constituency. Moreover, the new Reform Bill bestows on certain classes new rights which must be recorded by the registrar, and therefore until the new register has been made, even if all the three Bills were passed, it is clear a dissolution could not on that account take place. But I have stronger grounds. I am astonished that the hon. and learned Gentleman should have forgotten what passed in his own country in 1850. A great enlargement of the Irish constituency took place at that time. I forget the exact numbers, they were however rather above 100,000 than below it—but there was no dissolution at that time. No dissolution took place till the Earl of Derby's Government came into office in 1852. So that for nearly two years Parliament went on after that prospective change had been made in the constituency of Ireland. Therefore it is absurd to contend that the course which my noble Friend shadowed forth was one which could not be adopted consistently with constitutional principles and practice. It would be perfectly possible, and would involve no impropriety whatever, for the House to pass the English Reform Bill this year, and to sit again next January or February, or at any other time that the Crown might be advised to call it together, for the purpose of going on with the Irish and Scotch Bills; the dissolution being postponed not only until these Bills had been passed, but until arrangements had been made for the registration of the newly-endowed voters. I say, therefore, that the ground on which this proposal is made will not hold water. But still more extraordinary is the inversion, which could not, in point of order, be proposed directly, but which the Motion for Adjournment is intended indirectly to effect—the inversion, in my opinion, of putting the cart before the horse; that is, putting the Irish and Scotch Bills before the English one. [Cries of "No, no!" from the Opposition.] Allow me to say that was the object of the Motion which was announced. I presume the hon. Member who made this Motion will not get up and declare that his object in proposing to adjourn the debate sine die was to get rid of the Bill altogether. The fact is, that this Motion for the Adjournment of the debate was substituted for the Motion of which notice was given, that the English Bill should be postponed till after the Irish and Scotch Bills had been advanced a stage. The hon. and learned Gentleman undesignedly pointed out forcible reasons why such a course would be impossible. He said the disfranchisement is in the English Bill, and is to form the foundation of the enfranchisement in the Irish and Scotch Bills. Consequently, you must pass the English Bill before you can get the materials with which to endow Ireland and Scotland. The course, therefore, that the hon. and learned Gentleman would show by some twisted argument to be the right one, his own reasoning proves to be palpably improper and absurd, and the course we propose is the only one we can with propriety pursue. I say again, I do trust the House will seriously consider the position which this question now occupies, and the attitude which parties on both sides of the House have assumed in regard to it. Is the House prepared to affirm that there shall be no reform in the representation of the people? I do not ask hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House—I know that they will answer "No,"—but I ask hon. Gentlemen opposite whether, after all that passed when their leaders were in office, they will venture to affirm that there shall be no reform in the representation of the people? It is impossible. If, then, it be impossible, on what ground is it that they refuse to allow the House to go into the consideration of the Bill which we have proposed? I say, every argument they have used, every fact that stands recorded as to their conduct when their leaders were in office, compels them in consistency to go into Committee. It is only in Committee that they can establish those objections which have been so strongly urged by every one who has spoken on the opposite side of the House to the details of the Bill. We have told them we are ready to consider the details, and if the House agrees to any modification of these details, consistent with the principles on which this Bill is founded, we do not say that we shall not be prepared to submit to the decision of the House. But there are certain fundamental principles in the Bill which we could not consent to have infringed, because that would destroy the measure altogether. One main principle of the Bill is the reduction of the borough franchise. If hon. Gentlemen opposite are prepared to move that there should be no reduction of the borough franchise, they can do so. If they choose to say we refuse to go into Committee and discuss the details of the Bill when we object to its principles—we adhere to the principle of the Earl of Derby's Bill, that there should be no change in the rental qualification for the borough franchise; if hon. Gentlemen opposite would say that plainly and distinctly, then they would be pursuing a fair, manly, and intelligible course of proceeding. But they do not, they cannot take that course, because their leader and others who stand high in the estimation of the party have pledged themselves to a reduction of the franchise. Two distinguished Members of the late Government quitted their colleagues, because, I believe, they were in favour of a reduction of the borough franchise, while the rest were against it. Well, then, if hon. Gentlemen are not prepared to throw the Bill out altogether on its merits and on the principles which it embodies, I say they are acting a part utterly unworthy of a great political party when they endeavour by delay to prevent the House from going into the consideration of a Bill the importance of which they themselves when in office have admitted, the expediency of which when in office they have acknowledged and acted upon, the principle of which they no longer contest, and the details of which form the only ground of their objection. I say that upon every principle which ought to guide statesmen, upon every principle which ought to guide the conduct of a political party, they are bound to go into the consideration of this Bill in Committee, and there urge those objections to the details of the measure which, no doubt, they consistently and sincerely entertain. Is the time of year such as to make this impossible? It is later, no doubt, than it might have been. If they had acted on those fair and manly principles which ought to guide a great political party, there might have been more time to spare. Is this the conduct proper for a party which claims to divide the country into two camps, to represent the great portion of the property and intelligence of the country—that portion of the community which is most attached to the Constitution? I say that the fair, the proper, and the manly course for such a party to have followed was either to have said at once—"Your Bill is one to the principle of which we can never agree, and therefore we object to the second reading;" or, if they did not entertain that opinion to have said—"The principle of your Bill is one to which we cannot object, but to the details we do object; the franchise is too low; it will introduce too large a proportion of the democratic element into the constituencies, but as that is a question to be considered in Committee, we will go at once into Committee and endeavour to enforce our objections and establish our opinion." But such a party should not, under the shadow of a pretence of discussing without dividing, obstruct the whole of the great business of the country and prevent those measures being carried which the hon. and learned Gentleman says are so important, and some of which, in spite of all these delays, I hope we shall be able to carry before the Session is concluded. That is the course which such a party, having a due respect to its position, and a due regard to the interests of the country, should have followed. A Motion is brought forward at four o'clock in the afternoon to prevent discussion, which those who moved the adjournment seem, nevertheless, prepared to bring on, and, I hope, that the House, by rejecting that Motion will affirm that this Bill ought to proceed—that they are prepared to go into Committee, that they are prepared in Committee to hear, to discuss, and to consider all objections which can be fairly and bond fide made to the details of the Bill, and that this House will not, under the ill-founded apprehension of two dissolutions, which is entertained on the other side, or under the apprehension of a premature dissolution, be diverted from the straight path of public duty, but before the House separates, come to a Vote which will show, one way or the other, what is the opinion of the House with regard to the measure before it.

[Second Night.]

[Second Night.]

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I congratulate the noble Lord on his first speech on the Reform Bill, and I am not at all surprised that he should have fallen into some remarkable errors when speaking upon the subject, because hitherto he has taken less interest than might have been anticipated from a Minister so peculiarly responsible for the introduction of this measure. It is only because the noble Lord has not until this night taken a part in our debates, that I can at all account for that total misconception of what has been going on in the House with respect to this measure for the last three months which has characterized every statement the noble Lord has made this evening. What is the complaint of the noble Lord? The noble Lord does not deny that the business of the House with regard to this measure has been carried on in a most unsatisfactory manner. The noble Lord does not deny that here we are advanced in the month of June, and have not yet arrived at Committee on this Bill. The noble Lord is astonished at the position in which his Government is placed with this measure, and then the noble Lord with some rashness, as I think I shall show, falls to scolding the House, and says the delay which he has experienced has been unreasonable, unconstitutional, and irrational. Not being sufficiently acquainted with the conduct of this measure, which has been left to others, the noble Lord thinks of course that the delay has been occasioned entirely by the Opposition. Why, it was only on Monday last that the Government proposed to go into Committee. Here we are discussing the question upon Thursday, and the noble Lord accounts for the little progress which the measure has made by the vexatious delays experienced, when it is on the records of this House that the Government themselves, having the management of the business of the House, having generally all the days which are usually devoted to private Members entirely at its disposal, only last Monday proposed to go into Committee. But before the appointment of last Monday let us see what was the conduct of this House. What was the conduct of this factious Opposition seeking every delay and opposing to this constitutional proposition of the Minister all the devices which the forms of the House will permit, to prevent the progress of a measure, of which the noble Lord is so enamoured? Does the noble Lord complain that the second reading was not opposed? Is that a sign of faction? Is that a means of delay? Does the noble Lord complain that upon so important a measure—admitting, as he says we do, the principle of this Bill, the House—not the Opposition merely—should have taken that constitutional and solemn occasion to discuss what may be the consequences of the application of that principle in its various details, as they occurred to them in the course of that discussion? Was a debate of five days' length so unreasonable? Was that a space of time so unusual for a discussion upon such a subject that the noble Lord is justified in turning round upon the House and accusing it of delay? [Several hon. MEMBERS: Six days.] Whether five or six days, who are responsible for the length of that discussion? Is it the Opposition? I think it was stated, and correctly stated, that in numbers, and, I believe, also in length, the majority of speeches were made by the supporters of the noble Lord. The noble Lord turns round to us and says, that there is only one question to ask, "Are you in favour of a Reform Bill or not?" I say that if the noble Lord wants information upon that subject, I recommend him to apply to the hon. Member for the City of Edinburgh (Mr. Black). Let the noble Lord ask him whether he is in favour of a Reform Bill. He sits in his immediate vicinity and is in close political contiguity and sympathy with the noble Lord. For aught I know he is sitting now behind the noble Lord, and he can ask the question in a whisper. If the noble Lord is not satisfied with the opinion of the representative of that enlightened capital, the modern Athens, let him ask the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. H. Berkeley) what is his opinion, and whether he is in favour of the Government Reform Bill. And if the hon. Member for Bristol in private conversation indulges in that invective and sarcasm for which he is publicly distinguished, I would recommend the noble Lord to address his inquiry to a graver mind—to the hon. Gentleman who must share his confidence, because he owes to his patronage his eminent post—the Member for Salford (Mr. Massey). Let him ask the hon. Member for Salford whether he is in favour of Parliamentary Reform. Sir, the noble Lord may address this question to a great number of Gentlemen on his side of the House. Here, perhaps, we have taken refuge in more general views. We have stated some large constitutional objections to the course adopted by the noble Lord and his colleagues. But, for minute criticism—for vigilant captiousness, for a devotion to details which appears to be prompted by a sentiment of personal panic, I should say on this measure that the great Liberal party were more distinguished than the Gentlemen who sit on the Opposition benches. Parliament met early—at an unusual period. For a whole fortnight nothing was done. Why was not the Reform Bill introduced? I have shown the House that when the second reading took place the duration of the debate was not unusual, and was, indeed, only becoming such a theme. I have shown that the greater portion of that debate, and the portion most adverse to the merits of the Bill, came from the Ministerial benches and from the habitual supporters of the Government. I have shown that when weeks ago that debate was closed the Government did not propose to go into Committee until last Monday, the 4th of June, and now I ask the House and the country whether, under these circumstances, and in this state of affairs, the Minister is justified in the assertions which he has made this evening, and the tone which he has adopted upon the subject? But is this all? Not a tithe of the case. The noble Lord says we did not oppose even the second reading of the measure, but that we took other means to protract discussion and provoke opposition. What means? I deny the charge. Look at the records of the House, and examine those who are the authors of the Amendments to the Motion that you, Sir, do leave the chair. Where do they sit? Who are the Members who have suggested Amendments by which this measure might be arrested and ultimately defeated? I need not refer again to the hon. and much respected Gentleman who gave notice of the Motion for referring the Reform Bill to a Select Committee (Mr. Massey), a Motion, the nature of which very much fluttered the noble Lord the Member for the City of London, but which lit up the countenances of many hon. Members of the party opposite with an air of relief that was sparkling and encouraging to all who beheld them. But what is the state of the House at this moment? It is true there has been an Amendment to the Motion that the Speaker do leave the chair; but who has made it? Is it a Conservative Member who is to be held responsible for all the delays that have taken place, and whose conduct is to be the excuse for the clumsy and unsatisfactory manner in which this Bill has been conducted? I do not share the confidence of the hon. Gentleman who moves this Amendment; nor is that surprising, for he always sits behind the noble Lord, and when he made this Amendment he boasted that he had supported the noble Lord in almost every division for many years. Is it to be endured, then, that in such circumstances, instead of turning round to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, the hon. Member for Bristol, and his most confidential friend the author of this Amendment, the noble Lord, in total ignorance of what has been going on in the House—as it were just awakened from those rosy slumbers into which he always falls when the subject of reform is before the House—like an Ephesian sleeper, awakes from his dream, exclaiming “God bless my soul, what’s all this? It is the 7th of June and we are not in Committee on the Reform Bill. I will make a great declaration. We have been beset with vicious, factious Motions for delay!” And then the noble Lord denounces the factious and unconstitutional conduct of the party opposite to him, while all the time the noble Lord’s intimate friends and supporters who, as representing great cities he ought to be proud of, are the persons of whom he should complain. The noble Lord, in ignorance of all the warnings so solemnly given, of all the predictions put forth, and in defiance of all the calculations that have been made, comes forward on this the 7th of June for the first time, and condescends to say a word, I will not say in favour of, but about the Reform Bill. But let us see what we are doing this evening? The noble Lord is clearly in error as to all that has taken place this evening. I am not surprised at it, as the noble Lord was not here, having been present, probably, in a gayer and more brilliant scene. I would recommend to the noble Lord that in future he should adhere to the salutary rule that has regulated his Parliamentary conduct throughout the Session, and not venture again to speak either about the Reform Bill or the proceedings in this House with regard to it; because he has entirely misrepresented the Motion of my hon. Friend behind me (Sir James Fergusson), who, in a speech of great spirit and intelligence, introduced the subject before us to-night, and who was led to take the particular course which he did adopt in consequence of an intimation from you, Sir, that it was not competent for him to propose another Motion of which he had given notice. The hon. Gentleman, believing that he was following the proper Parliamentary course, made the Motion which is now before us.

Mr. Disraeli

But let me say one word as to what the noble Lord has at some length urged about the alleged opposition and criticism of this Bill by the House. Hitherto there has been no opposition, but there ought to be no criticism, on this measure, says the noble Lord, because we are all agreed in principle, and therefore discussion, except in Committee, is not to be tolerated. What does the noble Lord mean by saying we are all agreed in principle? It is desirable to have a true and distinct conception of the use of the term. The noble Lord says that before the Government of the Earl of Derby there were two parties—one for and one against Reform, and that he says was a convenient system. No doubt, it was a convenient system for the Liberal party. In Opposition they always constructed and organized themselves on the principle of Parliamentary Reform; but when they got into office nothing was ever done. The question was left open in detail to any individual who was entirely irresponsible as a Minister. This game had gone on for a long time. Three Prime Ministers had recommended Her Majesty to draw the attention of Parliament in Her Speech from the Throne to the Amendment of the representation of the people, and had laid Bills on the subject before the House of Commons. The late Government were of opinion that, after all that had occurred, seeing that Session after Session questions of Parliamentary Reform had been carried in detail by majorities, though not acted upon, it was advisable to bring in a measure. I will not argue now on the merits or demerits of that measure, but I must tell the noble Lord, as he commenced the controversy, that we brought forward that measure because, in our opinion, it was a Conservative measure, and we view his measure with suspicion, because we think its tendencies are not Conservative. It is very well to talk of being agreed in principles. All depends upon the application of those principles. The noble Lord is by no means justified in saying that because we may agree in the principle of Parliamentary Reform, and in some extension of the franchise, that therefore we are not bound to take into our consideration what may be the possible consequences of the measure now in our hands. I do not think that would be a wise course to take; on the contrary, the time that has been taken up, from accident in some degree, but in a much greater from the aversion of the noble Lord's supporters to this Bill, has tended much to enlighten the public mind. and when we are in Committee, if ever we get there, we shall be able to consider the principles which the noble Lord has laid down with much greater effect and with much more advantage to the community. These have been the principal topics of the noble Lord's speech, but he hardly addressed one syllable to the question immediately under our consideration. Absent, I suppose, from the House during the best part of the evening, he must have entered in clear ignorance of what had taken place in his absence. He must have supposed that we were continuing the Debate on the "vexatious Amendment" made by one of his principal supporters. He can hardly lay it down as a principle that when the Government have made the most important announcement that they will not proceed with the Amendment of the representation of the people as far as Scotland and Ireland are concerned, the House should not desire to consider the new position in which they are placed, and should not stop in a precipitate career to inquire what may be the constitutional consequences of such a course. The noble Lord has not referred to the dilemma in which he was placed by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Belfast (Sir Hugh Cairns), or, if he did just refer to it, he did not in any degree extricate himself from it. There is something even beyond that dilemma on which he has not touched, or at least had said just enough about it to show that he was scared at the difficulty which was placed before him, and which he found it impossible to avoid.

The noble Lord proposes that we shall this year Reform, as is the general phrase, or rather amend, the representation of the people—that is, largely increase the constituent body of the country, and bring in a new class, and that class belonging to a much lower sphere of Society than that which now enjoys the suffrage. He tells us now very differently from what was told us by his colleagues: "When this Bill is passed we shall not have time to deal with Scotland and Ireland, and we shall not consider ourselves justified, nor do we think any Minister would consider himself justified in counselling the Sovereign to exercise Her prerogative until the Amendment of the representation of Ireland and Scotland is also accomplished." That the noble Lord has announced now for the first time in unhesitating and unqualified terms. But what is the security that next year the representation of Scotland and Ireland will be amended? These are not times on which we can count on such results. I could dwell much on that point, but I will not at the present moment; but, admitting that next year these two great Imperial results are achieved, the noble Lord will not deny this, that, thanks to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, we shall have the whole question of the taxation of the country to consider next year, and under circumstances most difficult, most liable to misconception in the public mind, and most calculated to create disquietude and discontent among the masses who are to be enfranchised, and that these grave questions of finance are to be settled not only by a moribund, but a condemned and dishonoured Parliament. Is that a question unworthy of the discussion of the House of Commons? What have we been discussing to-night but that question? It is not a question to be settled by the reckless raillery with which the noble Lord has treated it to-night. It is one of the greatest questions which can be brought before the House, and we should be unworthy of our position, we should, indeed, have offered an unanswerable argument for the reform and re-construction of the House, if, under such circumstances, we attempted to evade the difficulty. So much for the speech of the noble Lord, and for his unfounded charge against the Tory party of having offered to his suspicious and, perhaps perilous legislation, unnecessary delay. I think I have answered that point. So much, too, for the noble Lord's argument that because he has chosen arbitrarily to assume that we have agreed to what he conveniently styles the principle of his measure, we are to be debarred from contemplating and considering in a statesmanlike manner what must be the consequence of the application of that principle to the state of society in which we live. So far, in the third place, as to the remarks of the noble Lord with regard to the important theme which has engaged the attention of the House to-night—not, as I think, in a languid debate, but in a discussion introduced with much ability, under circumstances most justifiable, and sustained on both sides with that power which the interest of the subject must inspire. The noble Lord has made no satisfactory reply. We have been favoured with his virgin speech on Reform, but the noble Lord has not treated the subject in a way which inspires me with confidence in the manner in which the Government is going to deal with it. The noble Lord, indeed, has left a painful impression on the House that he has taken up this subject rather from party necessity than from political conviction. The noble Lord has challenged us to a division. On these grounds I meet him; and I look to the result of that division without apprehension.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I will not long delay the House from a division. But there were some things said by the right hon. Gentleman of which I cannot refrain from taking notice. In the first place, the right hon. Gentleman has stated, as if it were a fact, as if it formed part of history, that when out of office we had been continually engaged in bringing forward this question of Reform, and that when in office we had not carried our views into effect. Now, Sir, during the whole time from 1832 till last year I do not believe we ever brought forward the question of Reform when the party of the right hon. Gentleman were in office. Recalling to mind the periods of 1835, of 1841, of 1846, and the year 1852, I do not think we ever brought forward the question of Reform to disturb a Conservative Government; on the contrary, it was when we were in office that we always introduced the subject.

But, the question we have now to determine is—is this a real, tangible, substantial objection to proceeding with this Bill, or is it a mere pretext in order to prevent a decision? And though the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Ayrshire (Sir James Fergusson) brought forward this Amendment with great ability I cannot conceive how it can be argued that it was our duty to say we would take the Irish and Scotch Reform Bills into consideration during the present Session. If we had done so—if we had stated at this period of the year that we would not proceed with the English Reform Bill until we could entertain the Irish and Scotch Bills together with it, it is quite evident that on each of those Bills the Opposition would have consumed the time of the House; they would have taken the course which they did upon the second reading of the English Bill; they would not have opposed the second reading, but they would have wasted the time, and then they would have said—"It is now too late to proceed with the English Bill." The only practical course we could pursue was to take up the English Bill now, and to leave those for Ireland and Scotland to another Session. And what is the reason which has been given by the hon. and gallant Gentleman who moved the adjournment against going into Committee? What was the argument employed by the hon. and learned Member for Belfast (Sir Hugh Carina)—what was the reason given by the right hon. Gentleman? It was that Parliament would then be condemned, and would be unable and unfit to discuss this question of Reform. But we have never said that Parliament would not be perfectly capable of legislation. We have not said, as we did in 1831, that there are 150 Members of the House who do not represent the people. After that Act was passed, I admit the House of Commons stood condemned; but what has been said with regard to the present measure amounts to this—that it would increase the value of the representation, that it would add to its force with the people, and that it would strengthen the institutions of the country, if a considerable number were added to the electors at present on the roll. But that does not imply any condemnation of the House of Commons—that is no reason whatever why the House of Commons should not continue to discharge its functions for another Session, and why, having entered on the consideration of the English Bill in the present Session, it should not take up the Scotch and Irish Bills at a future period.

[Second Night.]

The hon. and learned Member for Belfast said, I proposed the borough franchise first, because I wished to keep the county franchise higher; and that I only fixed upon the borough franchise with a view to secure the addition of a certain number to the constituencies. He misrepresented me in both these particulars. I never advocated a change in the county franchise upon any other ground than that the House had repeatedly averred that a particular rate would be a proper franchise for counties; and with regard to the £6 borough franchise, I always expressed my belief that men living in houses for which they paid a £6 rental were in many cases artisans who, by their intelligence and integrity, were well deserving of a vote. Well, then, why not discuss these questions in Committee? Why not take one side or the other? As my noble Friend has said, and as it has been repeatedly put to the House, if you consider this a revolutionary measure, that will destroy the institutions of the country, oppose it manfully. But if you do not say that; if you refuse to say that you will not admit the working classes in great numbers, then your only course is to go into Committee, and determine what the franchise should be. The party opposite, however, prefer taking neither of these courses; they will not make any fair and open declaration of their views, but they seek by delay and obstruction to prevent a discussion of the measure in Committee.

Question put—

The House divided:—Ayes 248; Noes 269: Majority 21.

List of the AYES.

Adderley, rt. hon. C. B. Astell, J. H.
Annesley, hon. Capt. H. Bailey, C.
Archdall, Capt. M. Ball, E.

Lord John Russell

Baring, H. B.
Baring, T.
Barrow, W. H.
Bathurst, A. A.
Beach, W. W. B.
Beaumont, W. B.
Bective, Earl of Beecroft, G. S.
Bentinck, G. W. P.
Bentinck, G. C.
Benyon, R.
Bernard, hon. Col.
Bernard, T. T.
Blackburn, P.
Blake, J.
Bond, J. W. M'G.
Booth, Sir R. G.
Botfield, B.
Bovill, W.
Bowyer, G.
Boyd, J.
Brady, J.
Bridges, Sir B. W.
Brooks, R.
Bruce, Lord E.
Bruce, Major C.
Bruen, H.
Bunbury, Capt. W. B.
M'Clintock
Burghley, Lord
Burrell, Sir C. M.
Cairns, Sir H. M'C.
Calcutt, F. M'N.
Cartwright, Col.
Cave, S.
Ceill, Lord R.
Cobbold, J. C.
Cochrane, A. D. R. W. B.
Codrington, Sir W.
Cole, hon. H.
Cole, hon. J. L.
Collins, T.
Cross, R. A.
Cubitt, Mr. Ald.
Cubitt, G.
Curzon, Visct.
Dawson, R. P.
Deedes, W.
Disraeli, rt. hon. B.
Drax, J. S. W. S. E. D.
Du Cane, C.
Dunn, J.
Du Pre, C. G.
East, Sir J. B.
Edwards, Major
Egerton, Sir P. G.
Egerton, hon. W.
Elmley, Visct.
Elphinstone, Sir J. D.
Emlyn, Viscount
Esmonde, J.
Estcourt, rt. hon. T.
H. S.
Farquhar, Sir M.
Farrer, J.
Fellowes, E.
Filmer, Sir E.
FitzGerald, W. R. S.
Forester, rt. hon. Col.
Forster, Sir G.
Galway, Viscount
Gard, R. S.
George, J.
Gilpin, Col.
Gladstone, Capt.
Goddard, A. L.
Gordon, C. W.
Gore, J. R. O.
Gore, W. R. O.
Graham, Lord W.
Greaves, E.
Greene, J.
Greville, Col. F.
Gray, Capt.
Griffith, C. D.
Grogan, Sir E.
Hamilton, Lord C.
Hamilton, J. H.
Hamilton, Major Hardy, G.
Hartopp, E. B.
Hassard, M.
Heathcote, hon. G. H.
Henley, rt. hon. J. W.
Hennessy, J. P.
Henniker, Lord
Herbert, Col. P.
Heygate, Sir F. W.
Hill, Lord E.
Hill, hon. R. C.
Holford, R. S.
Holmesdale, Visct.
Hope, G. W.
Hopwood, J. T.
Hornby, W. H.
Horsfall, T. B.
Howes, E.
Hubbard, J. G.
Hume, W. W. F.
Hunt, G. W.
Jermyn, Earl Jervis, Capt.
Johnstone, hon. H. B.
Jolliffe, rt. hon. Sir W.
G. H.
Kekewich, S. T.
Kelly, Sir F.
Kendall, N.
Kennard, R. W.
Kerrison, Sir E. C.
King, J. K.
Knatchbull, W. F.
Knight, F. W.
Knightley, R.
Knox, Col.
Knox, hon. Major S.
Lacoe, Sir E.
Lanigan, J.
Lefroy, A.
Legh, W. J.
Leighton, Sir B.
Lennox, Lord G. C. G.
Lennox, Lord H. G.
Lealie, C. P.
Lever, J. O.
Levinge, Sir R.
Liddell, hon. H. G.
Lindsay, hon. Col.
Long, R. P.
Longfield, R.
Lopes, Sir M.
Lovaine, Lord
Lyll, G.
Lygon, hon. F.
Lytton, rt. hon. Sir G.
E. L. B.

Macaulay, K.	Sibthorp, Major	Butt, I.	Gregory, W. H.
M'Cormick, W.	Smith, Augustus	Caird, J.	Gregson, S.
MacEvoy, E.	Smith, Montague	Calthorpe, hn. F. H. W. G.	Grey, rt. hon. Sir O.
M'Mahon, P.	Smith, Abel	Cardwell, rt. hon. E.	Grosvenor, Earl
Maguire, J. F.	Smith, S. G.	Carnegie, hon. C.	Gurdon, B.
Mainwaring, T.	Smollett, P. B.	Castlerosse, Visct.	Gurney, J. H.
Malins, R.	Somerset, Col.	Cavendish, hon. W.	Gurney, S.
Manners, rt. hn. Lord J.	Spooner, R.	Cavendish, Lord G.	Hadfield, G.
March, Earl of	Stanhope, J. B.	Childers, H. C. E.	Hanbury, R.
Maxwell, hon. Col.	Stanley, Lord	Clay, J.	Handley, J.
Miller, T. J.	Stirling, W.	Clifford, C. C.	Hankey, T.
Mitford, W. T.	Steuart, A.	Clifford, Col.	Hammer, Sir J.
Montagu, Lord R.	Stuart, Major W.	Clinton, Lord R.	Hardcastle, J. A.
Montgomery, Sir G.	Sturt, N.	Clive, G.	Hartington, Marquess of
Mordaunt, Sir C.	Stracey, Sir H.	Cobbett, J. M.	Hayter, rt. hn. Sir W. G.
Morgan, O.	Sullivan, M.	Coke, hon. Col.	Headlam, rt. hon. T. E.
Morgan, hon. Major	Talbot, hon. W. C.	Colebrooke, Sir T. F.	Henley, Lord
Mowbray, rt. hon. J. R.	Taylor, Col.	Collier, R. P.	Herbert, rt. hon. S.
Mundy, W.	Thynne, Lord E.	Coningham, W.	Hervey, Lord A.
Mure, D.	Thynne, Lord H.	Cowper, rt. hon. W. F.	Hodgkinson, G.
Naas, Lord	Tollemache, J.	Copeland, Mr. Ald.	Hodgson, K. D.
Newark, Viscount	Tottenham, C.	Craufurd, E. H. J.	Holland, E.
Newport, Viscount	Trefusis, hon. C. H. R.	Crawford, R. W.	Howard, hon. C. W. G.
Nicol, W.	Trollope, rt. hon. Sir J.	Crook, J.	Howard, Lord E.
Noel, hon. G. J.	Upton, hon. Gen.	Crossley, F.	Humberston, P. S.
North, Col.	Valletort, Viscount	Dalglish, R.	Hutt, rt. hon. W.
Northcote, Sir S. H.	Vane, J.	Davey, R.	Ingham, R.
O'Donoghue, The	Vandeleur, Col.	Davie, Sir H. R. F.	Ingram, H.
Packe, C. W.	Vansittart, W.	Davie, Col. F.	Jackson, W.
Pakenham, Col.	Walcott, Admiral	Deasy, rt. hon. R.	James, E.
Pakington, rt. hn. Sir J.	Walker, J. R.	Denman, hon. G.	Jervoise, Sir J. C.
Papillon, P. O.	Walpole, rt. hon. S. H.	Dent, J. D.	Johnstone, J. J. H.
Parker, Major W.	Walsh, Sir J.	Dodson, J. G.	Johnstone, Sir J.
Patten, Col. W.	Watlington, J. W. P.	Douglas, Sir C.	Kershaw, J.
Paul, H.	Way, A. E.	Duff, M. E. G.	King, hon. P. J. L.
Peacocke, G. M. W.	Wolby, W. E.	Duke, Sir J.	Kinglake, A. W.
Peel, rt. hon. Gen.	Whiteside, rt. hon. J.	Dunbar, Sir W.	Kinglake, J. A.
Pennant, hon. Col.	Whitmore, H.	Dundas, F.	Kingsoote, Col.
Pevensey, Visct.	Williams, Col.	Dunlop, A. M.	Kinnaird, hon. A. F.
Potts, G.	Willoughby, Sir H.	Egerton, E. C.	Laing, S.
Powys, P. L.	Woodd, B. T.	Ellice, rt. hon. E.	Langston, J. H.
Pugh, D. (Carmarthen)	Wyndham, Sir H.	Ennis, J.	Langton, W. H. G.
Pugh, D. (Montgomery)	Wyndham, hon. H.	Euston, Earl of	Lawson, W.
Redmond, J. E.	Wynn, Col.	Evans, T. W.	Leatham, E. A.
Ridley, Sir M. W.	Wynn, Sir W. W.	Ewart, W.	Lee, W.
Rogers, J. J.	Wynne, C. G.	Ewart, J. C.	Legh, Major C.
Rolt, J.	Wynne, W. W. E.	Ewing, H. E. C.	Lewis, rt. hon. Sir G. O.
Rowley, hon. R. T.	Yorke, Hon. E. T.	Fenwick, H.	Lindaay, W. S.
Salt, Thomas		Ferguson, Col.	Locke, Joseph
Sclater-Booth, G.		Fermoy, Lord	Locke, John
Selwyn, O. J.	TELLERS.	Finlay, A. S.	Lowe, rt. hon. R.
Shirley, E. P.	Fergusson, Sir J.	Fitzwilliam, hn. C. W. W.	Lysley, W. J.
	Dickson, Col.	Foley, J. H.	Mackie, J.

List of the NOES.

Aston, Sir J. D.	Biddulph, Col.	Butt, I.	Gregory, W. H.
Adam, W. P.	Biggs, J.	Caird, J.	Gregson, S.
Agar-Ellis, hon. L. G. F.	Black, A.	Calthorpe, hn. F. H. W. G.	Grey, rt. hon. Sir O.
Alcock, T.	Blencowe, J. G.	Cardwell, rt. hon. E.	Grosvenor, Earl
Antrobus, E.	Bonham-Carter, J.	Carnegie, hon. C.	Gurdon, B.
Arnott, Sir J.	Bouverie, rt. hon. E. P.	Castlerosse, Visct.	Gurney, J. H.
Atherton, Sir W.	Bouverie, hon. P. P.	Cavendish, hon. W.	Gurney, S.
Ayrton, A. S.	Bright, J.	Cavendish, Lord G.	Hadfield, G.
Bagwell, J.	Bristow, A. R.	Childers, H. C. E.	Hanbury, R.
Baines, E.	Brooklehurst, J.	Clay, J.	Handley, J.
Baring, rt. hon. Sir F. T.	Brown, J.	Clifford, C. C.	Hankey, T.
Baring, T. G.	Browne, Lord J. T.	Clifford, Col.	Hammer, Sir J.
Baxter, W. E.	Bruce, H. A.	Clinton, Lord R.	Hardcastle, J. A.
Bazley, T.	Buchanan, W.	Clive, G.	Hartington, Marquess of
Beamish, F. B.	Buckley, Gen.	Cobbett, J. M.	Hayter, rt. hn. Sir W. G.
Bellew, R. M.	Buller, J. W.	Coke, hon. Col.	Headlam, rt. hon. T. E.
Berkeley, hon. H. F.	Buller, Sir A. W.	Colebrooke, Sir T. F.	Henley, Lord
Bethell, Sir R.	Butler, C. S.	Collier, R. P.	Herbert, rt. hon. S.
		Coningham, W.	Hervey, Lord A.
		Cowper, rt. hon. W. F.	Hodgkinson, G.
		Copeland, Mr. Ald.	Hodgson, K. D.
		Craufurd, E. H. J.	Holland, E.
		Crawford, R. W.	Howard, hon. C. W. G.
		Crook, J.	Howard, Lord E.
		Crossley, F.	Humberston, P. S.
		Dalglish, R.	Hutt, rt. hon. W.
		Davey, R.	Ingham, R.
		Davie, Sir H. R. F.	Ingram, H.
		Davie, Col. F.	Jackson, W.
		Deasy, rt. hon. R.	James, E.
		Denman, hon. G.	Jervoise, Sir J. C.
		Dent, J. D.	Johnstone, J. J. H.
		Dodson, J. G.	Johnstone, Sir J.
		Douglas, Sir C.	Kershaw, J.
		Duff, M. E. G.	King, hon. P. J. L.
		Duke, Sir J.	Kinglake, A. W.
		Dunbar, Sir W.	Kinglake, J. A.
		Dundas, F.	Kingsoote, Col.
		Dunlop, A. M.	Kinnaird, hon. A. F.
		Egerton, E. C.	Laing, S.
		Ellice, rt. hon. E.	Langston, J. H.
		Ennis, J.	Langton, W. H. G.
		Euston, Earl of	Lawson, W.
		Evans, T. W.	Leatham, E. A.
		Ewart, W.	Lee, W.
		Ewart, J. C.	Legh, Major C.
		Ewing, H. E. C.	Lewis, rt. hon. Sir G. O.
		Fenwick, H.	Lindaay, W. S.
		Ferguson, Col.	Locke, Joseph
		Fermoy, Lord	Locke, John
		Finlay, A. S.	Lowe, rt. hon. R.
		Fitzwilliam, hn. C. W. W.	Lysley, W. J.
		Foley, J. H.	Mackie, J.
		Foljambe, F. J. S.	Mackinnon, W. A.
		Forster, C.	Marjoribanks, D. C.
		Foster, W. O.	Marshall, W.
		Fortescue, hon. F. D.	Martin, P. W.
		Fortescue, C. S.	Martin, J.
		Freeland, H. W.	Massey, W. N.
		French, Col.	Matheson, A.
		Gallwey, Sir W. P.	Matheson, Sir J.
		Garnett, W. J.	Mellor, J.
		Gavin, Major	Merry, J.
		Gibson, rt. hon. T. M.	Mildmay, H. F.
		Gifford, Earl of	Miller, W.
		Gilpin, C.	Milnes, R. M.
		Gladstone, rt. hon. W.	Mitchell, T. A.
		Glyn, G. G.	Moncrieff, rt. hon. J.
		Goldsmid, Sir F. H.	Monson, hon. W. J.
		Gower, hon. F. L.	Morris, D.
		Graham, rt. hon. Sir J.	Mostyn, hn. T. E. M. L.
		Greenall, G.	Napier, Sir C.
		Greenwood, J.	Noble, J. W.

Second Night.

Norris, J. T.
 North, F.
 O'Brien, P.
 O'Connell, Capt. D.
 Ogilvy, Sir J.
 Onslow, G.
 Packe, G. H.
 Padmore, R.
 Paget, C.
 Paget, Lord A.
 Paget, Lord C.
 Palmerston, Viscount
 Paxton, Sir J.
 Pease, H.
 Peel, Sir R.
 Peel, rt. hon. F.
 Peto, Sir S. M.
 Pigott, F.
 Pilkington, J.
 Pinney, Col.
 Pritchard, J.
 Puller, C. W. G.
 Raynham, Visct.
 Ricardo, J. L.
 Ricardo, O.
 Rich, H.
 Ridley, G.
 Robertson, D.
 Roebuck, J. A.
 Rothschild, Baron L. de Roupell, W.
 Russell, Lord J.
 Russell, H.
 Russell, A.
 Russell, F. W.
 Russell, Sir W.
 St. Aubyn, J.
 Salomons, Mr. Ald.
 Salt, Titus
 Scholesfield, W.
 Scott, Sir W.
 Scrope, G. P.
 Seymour, Sir M.
 Seymour, H. D.
 Seymour, W. D.
 Shafto, R. D.

Shelley, Sir J. V.
 Sheridan, H. B.
 Slaney, R. A.
 Smith, J. B.
 Smyth, Col.
 Somerville, rt. hon. Sir
 W. M.
 Staepoole, W.
 Stafford, Marquess of Staniland, M.
 Stanley, hon. W. O.
 Stansfeld, J.
 Steel, J.
 Stuart, Col.
 Sykes, Col. W. H.
 Thompson, H. S.
 Tollemache, hon. F. J.
 Trail, G.
 Trelawny, Sir J. S.
 Turner, J. A.
 Tynte, Col. K.
 Vane, Lord H.
 Villiers, rt. hon. C. P.
 Vivian, H. H.
 Walter, J.
 Warner, E.
 Watkins, Col. L.
 Wemyss, J. H. E.
 Western, S.
 Westhead, J. P. B.
 Whalley, G. H.
 Whitbread, S.
 White, Col.
 Wickham, H. W.
 Wilcox, B. M'G.
 Williams, W.
 Winnington, Sir T. E.
 Wood, rt. hon. Sir C.
 Woods, H.
 Wrightson, W. B.
 Wyld, J.
 Wyvill, M.

TELLERS.

Knotchbull-Hugessen, E.
 Brand, hon. H. B. W.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House do now adjourn."

The House divided:—Ayes 222; Noes 267: Majority 45.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH moved the adjournment of the debate.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, it was not his intention to ask the House to go on further with the subject on that occasion. He was quite satisfied with the division which had taken place; and as the sense of the House had been sufficiently expressed he should concur in the Motion for adjournment, and propose that the debate be adjourned till the Monday following.

MR. STIRLING said, he would beg leave to ask what was to be done with the Scotch and Irish Reform Bills?

Debate adjourned till Monday next.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE (IRELAND) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CARDWELL moved, that the Order of the Day for the second reading of the Irish Reform Bill should be discharged.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Order be discharged."

MR. HENNESSY said, he objected to the withdrawal of the measure.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he wished to enter his protest against the provisions of the Bill, and to express a hope that next year a very different measure would be introduced.

THE O'DONOGHUE moved the adjournment of the debate.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, he did not see what good the hon. Member could do by persisting in forcing another division. He, therefore, hoped that the Motion would be withdrawn.

Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned," put and negatived.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Order discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE
(SCOTLAND) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE LORD ADVOCATE moved, that the Order for the second reading of this Bill be discharged.

MR. CUMMING BRUCE said, he rose with the greatest pleasure to second the Motion.

Motion agreed to; Order discharged; Bill withdrawn.

WAKEFIELD ELECTION.—PROSECUTIONS FOR BRIBERY.

RESOLUTION.

CAPTAIN JERVIS moved a Resolution to the following effect:—

"That whereas by the Act 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, s. 14, it is expressly enacted that no person should be liable to be prosecuted for any offence committed against the said Act unless such prosecution shall commence within one year from the date of the said offence, this House is of opinion, with reference to certain prosecutions commenced at Common Law against divers persons at Wakefield for offences committed at the late General Election against that Act, but which prosecutions have not been commenced within the time prescribed by that Act, that such prosecutions should be abandoned."

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, it was impossible at that late hour of the evening (half after two o'clock) to proceed with the discussion of the Resolution, which involved considerations of great importance. He should therefore move the adjournment of the debate.

MAJOR EDWARDS: Sir, I have had great pleasure in seconding the Motion of the gallant Officer, and I do now entreat the Attorney General to withdraw these prosecution of witnesses under the Wakefield and Gloucester Commissions. The witnesses were induced under an Act of Indemnity to make the fullest disclosures without reserving any circumstances criminalizing themselves. After this, surely, it would be an act of positive injustice to institute prosecutions that would cancel the promised indemnity in the faith of which the witnesses were induced to make such disclosures. It is in vain to pretend that those disclosures would not be used as evidence against them. The facts are generally known, and could not fail to influence a jury. Under the circumstances the prosecutions would bear harshly on the parties, especially on Messrs. Leatham and Charlesworth, who had made the fullest and most unreserved disclosures of the errors into which they may have been led in a warmly contested election, and have already suffered a sufficient punishment for those errors in the long suspension of these prosecutions over their heads. From what transpired in the debate on Friday last, I believe the general feeling in the House on the subject, including the Attorney General himself, to be in unison with my own, and I therefore trust the learned Attorney General will no longer hesitate to abandon those prosecutions.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the House of Commons was called upon by the Resolution to perform functions which did not belong to it—namely, to interfere with the administration of justice. He might add that he did not think it would be satisfactory to the country that a decision on the question should be taken in so thin a House—[An hon. MEMBER: There are 100 Members present]—there being very few present but those who were there for the particular purpose of supporting the Motion. He could only say that, whatever the decision of the House under such circumstances might be, the prosecutions should be proceeded with under the statute, notwithstanding that he should bow to that decision when duly recorded.

MR. MALINS said, he rose to express a hope that his hon. and gallant Friend would, after the statement of the hon. and learned Attorney General, postpone his Motion to a more fitting opportunity.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he could not understand what use there would be in proceeding with the Motion at all if the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, upon whose immovable nature it was not easy to produce an impression, might set the decision of the House at defiance.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he would not object to the adjournment of the debate if the Attorney General would pledge himself to stay proceedings in the meantime.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: I will not stay proceedings for a single moment.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

House adjourned at a Quarter after Three o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, June 8, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—2^d Malicious Injuries to Property Act Amendment.
3^d Sale of Gas Act Amendment.

SICILY—BOMBARDMENT OF PALERMO. QUESTION.

LORD BROUGHAM said, he had a question to ask of his noble Friend the President of the Council, which he trusted his noble Friend would be able to answer in the negative. It was, Whether there was any foundation—he hoped there was none—for the accounts that had been spread in this and neighbouring countries of the bombardment of the town of Palermo? For the honour of human nature he hoped there was no foundation for the report of such an unexampled atrocity. He said unexampled, for even the most execrable tyrant of ancient times, whose name had become proverbial for tyranny—even Nero was only charged with standing by in levity while Rome was burning; but he was never charged with the far more atrocious offence of having set fire to the city for the purpose of destroying among its hundreds of thousands of inhabitants those who were his enemies. He hoped and trusted that there was no ground for these rumours; because although the sacred principle of non-intervention ought to be scrupulously observed, whatever might happen in foreign countries between the different portions of their people—no interference was lawful, however gross the crimes committed on or by any portion of its people, still that sacred principle, if it should unhappily be proved that those accounts were true, would, he should say, in such an event, be tried to the uttermost. He hoped and trusted that it would survive the trial, and that the principle of non-intervention would still be held sacred—no interference by the Government of other countries being permitted, no interference by their diplomatic representatives, no interference by their fleets and armies. No, the principle was sacred and inviolable; but that principle did not, and could not extinguish in our bosoms the natural feelings of humanity, could not prevent us from hearing with indignation and with horror—if the question asked were not answered in the negative—of those crimes that had been committed at Palermo, and still less could it prevent us from wishing heartily for the speedy and entire liberation of the people of Sicily, even though it should be attended by the fall of all their tyrants.

EARL GRANVILLE regretted to say that official accounts had been received of the bombardment of Palermo. In giving that answer to the noble and learned Lord he must observe that it was not usual nor convenient for the Government to reply to questions upon foreign policy without previous notice.

LORD BROUGHAM admitted that, according to the usual practice, he ought to have given notice of the question, but he had purposely abstained from doing so in order not by any possibility to commit his noble Friend (Earl Granville) and his Colleagues upon this subject.

COURT OF ROME.—DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS.

MOTION FOR PAPER.

EARL STANHOPE, in moving for a copy or extract of the Despatch from the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to regulate the diplomatic relations with the Court of Rome since the cessation of the legation at Florence, said that at a time when Central Italy was in a state of extreme agitation, and when alarm—and perhaps something more than alarm—existed there their Lordships could not expect to be called upon to give any opinion upon the political aspect of the matter to which he called their attention, and he did not wish to invite them to do so. His object was to call attention to the great inconvenience and disadvantages which had attended our recent system of diplomatic intercourse with Rome. Those inconveniences would be acknowledged by Her Majesty's Government and by any one conversant with the subject. Whether this was the exact time at which some better system should be adopted Her Majesty's Government would be the best judge; all that he intended to do was to move for the Return of which he had given notice, and to which he believed there would be no objection on the part of the Government; and any Peer would have the opportunity of expressing his views upon the subject. In the first place he felt it right to say that he had not the smallest complaint to make against the gentleman who now carried on our diplomatic business at Rome. The appointment of Mr. Odo Russell was, he believed, a very good one, which that gentleman had fully justified by the ability he had shown in the performance of his duties. In former times it was held that any diplomatic intercourse with Rome was to be avoided, that penal consequences would attach to any attempt to establish it, and that any Minister entering upon such intercourse would be liable to the penalties of a premunire. At the Peace of Paris the Ministers of the day had not the smallest desire of exposing themselves to the penalties of a premunire, but at the same time they perceived the necessity for the due protection of British subjects, of establishing some kind of diplomatic intercourse with the ruler of a state which comprises the seaports of Civita Vecchia and Ancona, and they resolved to do that indirectly which they dared not do directly. It was determined to send to Rome an Attaché of the Legation at Florence, with the rank only of an Attaché, to carry on our diplomatic business in that city. Great inconvenience was found to result from that arrangement, and about twelve years since the Government and Parliament decided upon applying a remedy. In 1848 the Act the 11 & 12 Vict., cap. 108, was passed, enabling Her Majesty to establish and maintain diplomatic relations with the Sovereign of the Roman States. In the Bill originally there were only two clauses; but a third clause was introduced in that House upon the Motion of the Earl of Eglington, to the effect that it shall not be lawful for Her Majesty to receive “Any person who shall be in holy orders of the Church of Rome, or a Jesuit, or member of any other religious order of the Church of Rome.”
Lord Brougham

He thought that restriction was a reasonable one, and he did not seek to disturb it; because it did seem to him that in the present religious condition of Ireland it would be most undesirable to receive any person bearing the rank of Nuncio, or Legate, as Ambassador from Rome. He was not, therefore, in any way seeking to disturb that provision; he only wished to show how consistently with it we might establish a more direct diplomatic intercourse with the Court of Rome. At that time the Ministers of the Court of Rome took offence at this clause. They probably overlooked the precedents established in the cases of the Courts of Berlin and St. Petersburg, and declared that since an attempt was made to shackle their free discretion in the choice of their agents they would receive no Minister on the part of England. Up to this moment, therefore, the Act had remained a dead letter. He could not but think, however, that a favourable moment had now arrived for reviewing this question. Hitherto we had carried on diplomatic intercourse with Rome by means of an Attaché to the Legation at Florence. As their Lordships were aware, however, in consequence of recent and well-known events, that Legation had just ceased to exist, so that in any case there must be some modification of our mode of conducting our relations with the Roman Court. The analogous course would be to send to Rome an Attaché connected with the Legation at Turin or Naples. But there were plain objections to either of those courses. An Attaché sent from Turin to Rome would be at a very considerable distance from his proper post; and it must be remembered that between the Court of Turin and the Court of Rome at present no very cordial relations existed. If, on the other hand, our agent in Rome were attached to the Legation at Naples, he would be placed in this very inconvenient position, that he would either have to communicate direct with the Secretary in England without receiving communications from the head-quarters of his mission; or that he would have to receive or send his communications through a city which was further removed from England by a twenty-six hours' journey than the distance which separated us from Rome, either of which courses would be productive of inconvenience. Under these circumstances, though the Government might be able to adduce valid reasons to the contrary, he could not but think that on general grounds it was desirable to establish direct diplomatic intercourse with Rome. Another reason why present circumstances afforded a favourable opportunity for reviewing the subject was, that no difficulty need now be raised about the question of expense. The Legation at Florence had just ceased to exist, and the sum which it had cost would be exactly sufficient to meet the expenses of a Mission at Rome. It would also perhaps be found a fortunate circumstance that the present Ministers of the Pope were not the men who had dissuaded the Pope from availing himself of the Act of 1848. We were not asking the Court of Rome to do us an act of favour; from whichever side it was made the overture was one which both parties might accept without loss of dignity. He believed he could appeal to very authoritative testimony for the purpose of showing the inconveniences and the disadvantages which had followed from the mode in which our relations with the Court of Rome had hitherto been conducted. He might appeal upon that point to a gentleman who had for many years been at the head of our Legation at Florence, and who had filled with great distinction other diplomatic posts—he meant Sir Hamilton Seymour; and he might further appeal to the noble Marquess near him (the Marquess of Normanby), who had also held the office of our Minister at Florence, and whose courtesy and hospitality in that post would not easily be forgotten by any person who had ever been brought within their influence. But what were the special disadvantages of our present position? In the first place, it deprived our representative at Rome of his due weight and dignity. It was impossible that a young man, who held no higher office than that of an Attaché, and who perhaps lived, as Attachés usually did, up some three or four flights of stairs, could compete upon equal terms with the accredited Ministers of France and Austria and of other Powers. And if any noble Lord denied the proposition his argument might perhaps carry him further than he desired, for, if an Attaché with a slender salary was all that was required at Rome, it would be difficult to say why a more expensive diplomatic establishment was maintained at Paris or Vienna. Notwithstanding, therefore, the personal merits of the gentleman who now filled the post, there was a want of weight and dignity in our communications with the Court of Rome. The whole system, as it now existed, was neither more nor less than a system of make-believe. In law we pretended not to send a Minister to Rome; but in fact, we did send one. Now, in public as well as in private life, a system of make-believes was never so effectual as an open and a manly policy. This further disadvantage attended our present diplomatic relations with Rome. It was perfectly optional with the Pope or his Foreign Minister whether he would or would not receive our Attaché. An Ambassador had a right to demand an audience with the Sovereign of the country to which he was accredited. A Minister Plenipotentiary might ask for an interview with the Foreign Minister, but neither of those privileges pertained to an Attaché belonging to a different Mission. There had been times when the gentlemen so employed at Rome had experienced great difficulty in obtaining any interview either with the Pope or the Foreign Minister. He believed that Mr. Russell had perfect facilities in this way; but this was owing solely to the alarms of the times in Italy, and to the anxious feelings of the Ministers of the Holy See, and it was just the evil of the system that this privilege fluctuated according to times and circumstances. Admitting the ability both of Mr. Russell and his predecessor in office, and that they had discharged their duties in a most unexceptionable manner, still he said the Government had no right to expect, as a general rule, that they could attract the highest ability to such a post if it continued to be placed in the lowest diplomatic rank, and the smallest diplomatic stipend. It was manifest that questions might at any time arise between the two courts, such as the enlistments in Ireland for the service of the Pope which required to be dealt with by a very firm and prudent man; and it was important that we should have in Rome not an able man by accident, but an able man as a natural consequence of our diplomatic system. Look at what occurred with the Courts of Berlin and St. Petersburg. The Courts of Berlin and St. Petersburg were neither in communion with Rome, but each maintained a Minister there. An intimation proceeded some time back from St. Petersburg, and likewise from Berlin, to the effect that it would not be agreeable to receive an ecclesiastic as Envoy in those cities; but, as the Court of Rome desired to employ none but ecclesiastical agents, the result was that no Minister from Rome ever permanently resided at St. Petersburg or Berlin. The course adopted in the case of those two countries might also be adopted in the case of this country; and if it were not agreeable for the Court of Rome to employ any but ecclesiastical agents, then, as this country was by law prevented from receiving them, the natural course of proceeding seemed to be that this country, though it might not receive an ecclesiastical Minister from Rome in London, might entrust its diplomatic business in Rome to a regularly accredited Minister. Their Lordships would recollect that one of the Ministers of Prussia who had resided at Rome was that distinguished man the Chevalier Bunsen, and their Lordships all knew the great advantages of which his residence at Rome had been productive in the cause of literature and art. The mention of art reminded him that there was another point which he wished to impress on their Lordships' attention, and that was that the presence of an English mission at Rome would tend greatly to promote the interests of art in this country. Their Lordships were all aware of the very large number of students in painting, sculpture, and architecture, who resided at Rome. It was within his own recollection that the English students there were more numerous than the students from any other country, except France. It must be borne in mind that a period of one or two years passed in Rome was almost indispensable for the full development of artistic genius. A remarkable testimony on this point had been furnished by Sir Joshua Reynolds, who in one of his lectures stated that though many of his friends had assured him even before his journey to Rome that he had obtained a full knowledge of his profession, yet that—as Newton declared he felt before the endless ocean of science—he felt but as “a little child” in art when he stood in the presence of master-pieces of the great painters of Italy. He believed no person would deny the advantage to artists of a period of study at Rome; and an English mission there would supply a central point of union for English students. Their Lordships would, perhaps, be surprised when he stated that England was almost the only nation in the world that did nothing for its students at Rome. The Royal Academy did, indeed, send on the average one student in the year; but the English Government did nothing at all in this respect, and contrasted unfavourably with other Governments in this matter. Mr. John Gibson, that eminent English sculptor resident at Rome, whose genius in art did so much honour to his native country, and one of whose noblest works, a colossal statue of the Queen, adorned the apartment immediately adjoining to that House, had the goodness some time since, at his request, to draw up a paper upon this subject, in which he stated—

Earl Stanhope

“Here is a list of the nations whose Governments send pensioned students to Rome to study painting, sculpture, and architecture. France has an academy, Austria, Prussia, Saxony, Tuscany, Naples has an academy; Russia, Spain, Mexico, Denmark, Sweden, Belgium, France has at Rome five architects, five painters, five sculptors, two landscape painters, two engravers, two medal or die engravers. Each student is sent here for five years. As to Russia, each student is sent here for six years, with a pension of £160 a year each; for his journey £40, and for his return £40. The French academy and the Naples academy have professors to overlook the students. All other students are watched by their Ministers. In the year 1844 I visited England, after an absence of twenty-seven years. The late Sir Robert Peel sent for me. I waited upon him, and he said that the Government had some idea of sending students to Rome, and he wished me to give him what information I could upon such a subject from my long experience of the practice of foreign nations. With reference to his question as to the propriety of sending English students to Rome, I said that I was entirely ignorant of the state of sculpture in England, but since my arrival I had been examining the public monuments, and that I could see the defects of style which prevailed in them, likewise the absence of the grand principles of severe simplicity with that perfect execution imbibed at Rome. The English Government spend large sums to erect public monuments, but contribute nothing towards the training of their students. I had seen some who had natural powers, but wanted the advantages given to young sculptors of the Continent—that is, a Roman education for six years. I have visited England a few times since, and the above are still my sentiments. If the English Government were to follow the example of other nations, they would in the course of time have public monuments that would be an honour to the nation.”

He would not weaken the force of that testimony, by adding one word of his own by way of comment; but he might mention that the Prince Consort, whose enlightened zeal in the cause of art was so well known, addressed a public letter to the late Earl of Ellesmere on the subject of the intended Art Exhibition at Manchester. In that letter, which bore date, July 3, 1856, were these words:—

“No country invests a larger amount of capital in works of art of all kinds than England, and in none almost is so little done for art education.”

It might be objected, as it had been objected on similar subjects in another place, that, after all, questions of art were not matters of national importance. He did not anticipate that such an objection would proceed from the noble Earl the President of the Council, who, on all occasions, had shown himself not only conversant with but zealous for the interests of Art, or from the noble Earl near him (the Earl of Derby), whose attachment to art was well known, and who had not many weeks since presented two pictures of considerable value to the National Portrait Gallery. But if any such objection should be raised in any quarter, he believed he could meet the objection by showing that the cultivation of art by study might give to our manufacturers—the only thing wanted to them—that taste and elegance in design in which alone they were surpassed by the manufacturers of some other nations. It might be said that his argument applied rather to the foundation of an Academy at Rome than to the establishment of a mission, and as to the former he had sometimes thought of submitting to the House a Motion which should merely go the length of calling upon the Government through their diplomatic agents to collect some preliminary information on the subject. Both a Mission and an Academy were much needed; but, if England was so much poorer than Denmark or Mexico, or so much more unwilling to assist the arts, that she could not, or would not, provide for any paid studentships at Rome, than he said a Mission would be a most valuable substitute as far as it went. It would supply a central point, and be accepted as a very considerable boon by the English artists resident in Rome—a numerous, devoted, and able body of men, men to whom in future years they would have to look for their fame in sculpture, architecture, and painting. He could conceive that in former years, under a different state of things, there might have been a prejudice against such a mission founded upon religious considerations; but he submitted that the Act of 1848 had settled that question, deciding as it did that upon certain conditions we were willing to enter into diplomatic intercourse with Rome. The desirableness of such an intercourse was no longer open to question. Such, then, were the considerations which had led him to mention this subject to their Lordships. He hoped he might receive an assurance that the Government were favourable to the ultimate object. The question was one of time and opportunity, and upon that point there might fairly be some difference of opinion. He was sure, at least, that he had not brought forward this subject in any party spirit, and that he had endeavoured to urge it in such a manner as should not give any ground of offence on party or on religious grounds to any of their Lordships. Glad indeed should he be if the Government, either now or hereafter, should find themselves enabled by one and the same Act to place our diplomatic relations with Rome on a sounder and better footing, and to confer a boon—a boon which would be warmly felt and acknowledged—on the cause of British art. The noble Earl concluded by moving—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for Copy or Extract of the Despatch from the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to regulate the Diplomatic Relations with the Court of Rome since the Cessation of Her Majesty's Legation at Florence.”

LORD WODEHOUSE hoped his noble Friend would not think him indifferent to the cause of art, either here or abroad, if in replying to his observations he confined himself entirely to the diplomatic view of the subject. His noble Friend had correctly stated that the question was entirely one of time and opportunity, and he thought he could show their Lordships that the present was not a convenient time or opportunity for taking any step to produce the change which his noble Friend desired. He wished, however, at the outset to explain very shortly what was the exact condition of our relations at the present moment with the Court of Rome; for, although his noble Friend had correctly described our position in that respect, he had made one or two statements to which he (Lord Wodehouse) must take exception. His noble Friend had accurately stated the circumstances which led to the passing of the Act of 1848 and the nature of that Act, including the most important clause of all, generally known as the Eglinton clause. After the Act of 1848 was passed communications were at different times exchanged with the Court of Rome on the subject of diplomatic relations between this country and the Pope; but he begged to inform his noble Friend that, so far from the Court of Rome regarding the position taken up by this country as the same as that which had been assumed by Prussia and Russia, they considered that there was an important distinction. The Court of Rome thought that the intimation which he believed had been given by the Prussian and Russian Governments that they should not wish to receive an ecclesiastic as Minister from Rome was very different from an intimation contained in an Act of Parliament, by which the prerogative of the Sovereign was limited as regarded diplomatic relations with one country in the world, and only one. They considered that it would not be consistent with the dignity of the Pope to receive a minister from this country while that limitation upon the prerogative of the Sovereign existed. He was not, of course, going to discuss the policy of the Eglinton clause, which nobody proposed at present to repeal; but, the circumstances being as he had stated, our relations had been carried on with Rome in the same manner as for a considerable time prior to the passing of the Act of 1848. His noble Friend had paid a just tribute to the ability of Mr. Odo Russell, who now occupied the position of Attaché at Rome, carrying on the diplomatic business of his Government there. Undoubtedly his noble Friend had some grounds for stating that the position of an Attaché never could be the same as that of a Minister or an Ambassador; but it was equally true that Mr. Russell, like his predecessors—for the Government had obtained the services of very able men in that capacity—had conducted our business in Rome very much to the satisfaction of the Government, and had placed our relations with that Court upon a satisfactory footing. Under these circumstances the Government had to consider whether the present would be a convenient opportunity for making some representation to the Court of Rome—for that was what his noble

Earl Stanhope

Friend desired—with the view of inducing it to receive a Minister from this country without one being sent from Rome to England. He ought to mention here that the Court of Rome had expressed its willingness to receive, whenever necessary, a special mission; but he was afraid that if we were to express our desire to send a permanent representative to Rome, we should expose ourselves to a refusal and put the Court of Rome in an inconvenient and disagreeable position. It seemed to his noble Friend at the head of the Foreign Office that the present was by no means a convenient moment for taking such a step. Their Lordships knew the distracted condition of Italy, and the peculiar position in which the Papal States at present stood. It had been very erroneously supposed, both in this country and on the Continent, that Her Majesty's Government had taken a forward part in pressing upon the Sovereign of Rome changes in his Government. Upon that matter it was important that there should be no misunderstanding. It was, of course, perfectly true that Her Majesty's Government, in common with all the Governments in this country of late years, earnestly desired that the Sovereign of Rome should make changes in the administration of his dominions, which would make that administration more consistent with justice and with the well-being of those who were placed under his rule. They desired this both in the interest of humanity and in the interest of the peace of Europe, because it was palpable that the great difficulty in Italy had been for years the condition of the Papal States; but, at the same time, while desiring this it had always been properly thought that this country, being pre-eminently a Protestant State, should not take so forward a part in urging such reforms as the Catholic States of the Continent, which had naturally greater influence at Rome. Her Majesty's Government, therefore, had confined themselves to seconding the advice which had been at various times given by those Catholic States, especially by France, to the Pope to make reforms in the administration of his dominions. These representations had been received in a friendly manner by the Roman Government, although, he regretted to say, they had not produced any practical effect. Now, being in this position, strongly disapproving as they did of the present administration of the Papal States, and the relations of the Pope with the other Powers of Italy being in a very unsatisfactory condition, and his position being so uncertain, as regarded parts of his own dominions, it was manifestly undesirable that Her Majesty's Government should at so inopportune a moment take the step of pressing the Pope to receive an English Minister at his Court. It would give to this country the air of interfering more closely and powerfully in his affairs than it had hitherto done; it would very probably be met with a refusal by the Pope, and would certainly not tend to improve our relations with the Court of Rome. He was not aware that his noble Friend had touched upon any other point. The matter was entirely one of time and opportunity. If at any time the Sovereign of Rome should express a wish that a Minister should be sent there, undoubtedly Her Majesty's Government would make no objection. Powers were given by the Act of 1848 to send a Minister, and there was no reason why we should not take advantage of such an intimation on the part of the Pope. But looking to all the circumstances Her Majesty's Government did not think that the present would be a convenient opportunity for making any change in the system which now existed. Before sitting down he must say that no inconvenience arose from Mr. Odo Russell being placed under the Legation at Naples, because, although he sent copies of his Despatches to that Mission, he corresponded directly with Her Majesty's Government in the same way that he did when he was connected with the Legation at Florence. There was no objection to the production of the document for which the noble Earl had moved.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY thought their Lordships were much obliged to the noble Earl (Earl Stanhope) for bringing this subject before the House. He entirely agreed with the noble Earl upon the diplomatic part of the subject on which he had addressed them, and he did not distinctly see the force of saying that this was not the right time and opportunity for sending a Minister to Rome, because he thought the more serious the affairs of Italy and the Papal States the more this country required the whole weight which it could give to its diplomacy in that country. He should, however, be the very first man to declare that, whomsoever Her Majesty's Government should think proper to send, it would be impossible for him to act with greater zeal, judgment, and discretion than Mr. Odo Russell had done since he had held this appointment. He (the Earl of Malmesbury) would say, from his own opportunities of judging, that Mr. Russell had been most successful in his intercourse not only with the Ministers of the Pope, but with the Pope himself, and this under the great disadvantage of not holding a high rank. This disadvantage was chiefly felt in contending with the Ministers of other nations. Nothing was more disadvantageous or more impolitic than for a gentleman in this position to be compelled to sit down in conference with Ministers who had much greater authority for urging their claims and advocating their cause than he had. A point of detail had been referred to with which he was not before acquainted, namely, that Mr. Odo Russell had been attached to the Court of Naples. This, of course, was a question for the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, but for his own part he was inclined to ask why this gentleman had not been attached to the Embassy at Turin? because it appeared to him that Mr. Russell's correspondence would be much more conveniently, rapidly, and safely sent from that part of Italy than from Naples, considering the great distance of the latter from London. This, however, was a point for the judgment of the noble Lord, and he only ventured to state his opinion. The noble Lord the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs had said that in the event of our sending a Minister to Rome, the Pope might not consent to his reception at this moment. But he (the Earl of Malmesbury) could not understand the inconvenience of the position, because, before we sent a Minister to Rome, we should be able to ascertain whether he would be received or not. And with regard to the compliment not being returned, instances had occurred in which that had not taken place; for until very lately Switzerland had sent no Minister to this country—very much, as he thought, to her own detriment,—for, if she had, very much of what had happened might have been prevented. The noble Lord (Lord Wodehouse) also said that the sending of a Minister to Rome at the present moment might be understood as indicating an intention on our part to interfere more actively with the internal affairs of Italy. He was glad to hear that the noble Lord was influenced by a desire to avoid such an appearance, and hoped that the whole policy of the Government with regard to the Italian States would be characterized by similar caution. He could not too earnestly impress both upon the noble and learned Lord (Lord Brougham) who had called attention to the tragical events now occurring at Palermo, and other Members of their Lordships' House, how careful they ought to be as to the public expression of judgments upon Italian subjects and Italian sovereigns. When Her Majesty's Government blamed, and very naturally blamed, the slaughter and loss of life arising from the bombardment of Palermo by the Neapolitan ships, were they not precluded from any severity of comparison by history itself, and that very recent history? Those who now condemned the Neapolitan Government for bombarding Palermo should recollect that only in 1849, the King of Sardinia, Victor Emmanuel himself, bombarded Genoa, then invaded in the same manner and by the party of the self-same man, Garibaldi. God forbid that he (the Earl of Malmesbury) should justify either act. He only wished to impress upon their Lordships that when, either by our diplomacy or by rash condemnations made in that House, we interfered in the affairs of Italy, we exposed ourselves to very severe observations, and to difficulties of still greater importance than those observations.

The Earl of Malmesbury

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, he had himself had practical experience for three years and a half of the inconvenient character of the present diplomatic arrangements in respect of the Court of Rome, and he was bound to say that he had received every possible assistance from the very eminent man who then filled the position of Attaché at Rome, and afterwards, on the appointment by Lord Clarendon, to the Secretary of Legation to the Tuscan Mission still continuing to reside unofficially at Rome. Lord Lyons was at that time in daily correspondence with him, consulting him on every point connected with the affairs of the Roman States and other matters. Lord Lyons had often expressed to him not only the inconvenience he felt in his personal communications with the Court of Rome and its Ministers, but had referred to the extremely disagreeable position in which an English agent without any recognized character was placed in treating not only with the Court of Rome, but with other diplomatic agents. Considering the great interests that were involved in our communications with Rome and the Italian States, he thought it was very desirable that our relations with the Court of Rome should be placed on a more satisfactory footing. He approved the object of the clause in the Act of 1848 which had been referred to, but he thought it was unfortunate that the attainment of that object had not been sought by means of an intimation from the Executive Government that it would not be agreeable to them that an ecclesiastic should be appointed Ambassador at this Court, instead of it being made the subject of a legislative enactment. He fully recognized the advantage which would be experienced by British artists from the presence of an English Embassy in Rome, but at the same time he felt that there was some reason for the doubt which had been expressed by the noble Lord the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, as to whether this was precisely the moment at which any change should be made in our relations with the Papacy — whether indeed all that had passed within the last year will not just now indispose the Court of Rome to make what would be a concession on their part if they were expected to receive a British Minister whilst the clause in the Act of Parliament regulating Diplomatic Intercourse to which they had objected remained unrepealed. In all that had been said in praise of the personal qualifications of Mr. Odo Russell he entirely concurred.

Motion agreed to.

ENGLISH SHIPWRIGHTS IN FRENCH DOCKYARDS.—QUESTION.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the Report that from Four Hundred to Five Hundred Workmen had been discharged from the Dockyard at Portsmouth, there being no Employment for them, and were now engaged as shipbuilders at Cherbourg and other ports of France, was correct? He anxiously hoped the answer of the noble Duke would be satisfactory, not only to himself, but to the country at large. It would seem that various persons had gone to the police magistrates, both in the Metropolis and in other parts of the country, with the view of obtaining passports to ports of France, and stating themselves to be among the number of about 400 or 500 shipwrights who had been discharged from Portsmouth dockyard, where there was no employment for them, and adding that they were anxious to follow their fellow-workmen who had obtained employment in France. It was well known that there was great activity in building ships of war at this moment in France; but whether the object was merely to put the country in a necessary state of defence, or whether there was some aggressive intention meditated, he did not presume to determine; but he could not help expressing his regret that the skill and labour of a class of workmen whose exertions might at this crisis be so usefully employed at home, should be actually devoted to the service of a Foreign Power. If, therefore, the noble Duke's answer should be that the report to which he had referred was wholly unfounded, that answer would doubtless be received by their Lordships with unfeigned satisfaction. On the other hand, if the rumour was correct, he could only hope the noble Duke would be able to hold out the assurance that every department of our navy was at present in such a state as to be capable of repelling any attempt to invade or land foreign troops on our shores. From the critical position of affairs from one end of the Continent to the other, it was impossible to predict what a few months or even weeks might bring forth. They had heard much of rendering effective the defences of the country, and they had heard much of Volunteer corps being raised in every part of the kingdom. Without throwing any disparagement upon the Volunteer movement, or the adoption of other measures of defence, he thought that unless we took care to maintain our wooden walls in a thoroughly efficient condition, all our other preparations must be comparatively futile. It was to those wooden walls that we were indebted for our safety in the most perilous period of our previous history; and if we should again have occasion to look for their protection, he trusted we might be justified in relying upon them with undiminished confidence.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET: My Lords, in order to answer clearly the inquiry put to me by the noble Viscount, it is desirable that I should divide it into two parts. The first question is, whether 400 or 500 workmen have been discharged from the dockyard at Portsmouth; and the next whether those workmen have since been engaged as shipwrights at Cherbourg and other ports in France. To the first question my answer is that a good many men have been discharged since the commencement of the financial year, and I will state the reason. Indeed, I mentioned it in this House on a previous occasion. When I acceded to my present office last year there was a programme of very extensive works before the Department, and when I came to examine how far we should be able to perform it I came to the opinion myself, and was also advised by those who were competent to judge of the matter, that we had not money enough or workmen enough to complete that programme within the year. We, therefore, took a Vote of another £100,000, and added largely to the number of men in the dockyards. We could not obtain the men we wanted immediately in the summer, and consequently during the few closing months of the financial year we had in the dockyards a larger force than was ever employed in them at any other period during the present century. When the works had gone on some time, I was advised that if I continued operations at the same rate, the timber would be exhausted, and that it would be impossible that the other trades could keep up with the shipwrights. It was therefore necessary that the work of the shipwrights should proceed somewhat more slowly. I determined to make no alteration till the financial year had concluded, and not to dismiss any of the men in a hurry, but to pay off only a few every week of the inferior class, and retain the better workmen. By that means the number of hands in the dockyards had been reduced from 20,000 to 17,000 some odd hundreds, a number quite sufficient for the work to be performed during the year. With regard to the next part of the question—whether the men who had been dismissed from our dockyards had found employment in France—I can only say that, to the best of my belief, there is no foundation whatever for that report. I saw the report some weeks ago in the papers, when I made inquiry, and was informed that at Cherbourg they had more than a sufficient number of French shipwrights for the works going on there, the highest rate of wages being only 4 francs, while in our dockyards 6s. per day are the wages earned on task and job. It is not likely therefore that men would go there for the sake of such reduced wages. But I was also informed that so far from taking on our shipwrights, that 400 shipwrights have been dismissed from the dockyard at Cherbourg from motives of economy in the last six weeks. In the first place, then, we have not largely reduced the number of labourers, artificers, and shipwrights in our dockyard; and, although they have been reduced to 17,000, that is a greater number than we had ever before working in the dockyards of the country—even in 1815—and far beyond any ordinary requirements. I therefore trust that, on the question of the number of men, the answer I have given to the question of the noble Lord will be satisfactory; and as to the men who have been dismissed from our yards being employed in the French dockyards, if at Cherbourg they have discharged some of their own workmen, and the rate of wages there is so much lower than in our dockyards, it appears very improbable that our artificers, who, I imagine, are quite able to look to their own interests, would resort to France in order to improve their condition. With regard to another point, the noble Lord has asked me whether I am satisfied with the position of the navy of this country. Of course, if I had complete satisfaction, the Government would not have proposed such large Estimates as they have done this year. It is because I wish to raise the navy to a more efficient state that we take such large Estimates, and on that ground I am actually employing the large number of men which I have stated in our dockyards.

The Duke of Somerset

THE EARL OF SHREWSBURY AND TALBOT wished to corroborate the statements which had been made by the noble Duke. From private information, on which he could rely, he had learned that only two English mechanics had been over at Cherbourg, and that in a very short time, being pretty nearly in a state of starvation, they applied to be sent home to this country. Five francs per day was the highest wages given to shipwrights there, not four francs, as stated by the noble Duke, and he thought it well this should be publicly stated lest any ship carpenters who happened to be discharged here should go to France endeavouring to procure employment in a country where they would find none so remunerative as at home, and thus expose themselves to great hardships and privations. He was glad the apprehensions of his noble Friend had been set at rest on the subject of these reports, and he hoped no such absurd reports would be allowed to prevail again.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON said, he was perfectly satisfied with the information he had received, and he was sure what had fallen from the noble Duke, corroborated by the noble Earl, would afford very considerable satisfaction to the country.

REFRESHMENT HOUSES AND WINE
LICENCES BILL.—COMMITTEE.

EARL GRANVILLE, in moving the Order of the Day for going into Committee on the Bill, observed that it had been opposed on very contradictory grounds, and he should reserve himself for any objections that might be urged against it. The Bill was a Supply Bill.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY: Before going into Committee, I wish to make a few preliminary observations; though it seems from what we have just heard that no opposition we can offer is to be of any avail at all; it appears this is to be considered as a Supply Bill; and that we are altogether to be precluded from making any Amendment in it whatsoever. In reading over the Bill, however, it struck me to be quite as much a Police Bill, and for interfering with the domestic arrangements of the people, as a Bill of Supply for Her Majesty. There are a great many police regulations and clauses of importance affecting magistrates, and much that interferes with the management and conduct of the existing refreshment houses. I do not speak of the Bill in any unfriendly spirit. Comparing it with what it was at first, it has been very considerably improved indeed; but, nevertheless, there are two or three things to which I should wish to call attention, although it appears we shall be precluded from altering them. There are three points to which I should have adverted at greater length, had we been allowed to touch this very sacred measure. In the first place, I think you are pressing the principle of your licences much too far in exacting a 10s. 6d. licence from many of the smallest and poorest shopkeepers in the Metropolis. I do not know whether any of your Lordships have ever walked late at night through some of the bye-streets and deep recesses of London, where you might have seen sheep's-heads and fried fish exposed for sale; the whole contents of the shop, furniture included, would not, in many cases, be worth 10s. 6d.; yet these are refreshment houses for working men, who have there a bit of sheep's-head or cooked fish for 1d. or 2d. The imposition of a tax of 10s. 6d. on such shops will be felt as a grievous burden indeed. With respect to Clause 13, I should be very glad to ascertain to what extent the provisions of this clause are applicable. Perhaps your Lordships are not aware that a very large proportion of the houses in this town are held under covenants in their leases not to take any licence whatever for the sale of refreshments, and many houses in which refreshments are already sold are held under covenants not to take licences as a public-house or for the sale of wine. I verily believe when this Act comes into operation some thousands of houses will be found, by the terms of their covenants, unable to avail themselves of its provisions. The leases under several of the largest estates, the Hope estate, the Ward estate, the Portland estate, the Portman estate, and others, have covenants of the nature to which I have referred. Almost every house under these vast estates, with the exception of public-houses themselves, is under a condition not to accept any licence for the sale of wines, &c. The third point to which I would advert is the very extreme power given by the 18th clause to the police. I was anxious to introduce words to the effect that the police should have the power to visit even during the day such houses as are licensed to sell wine. The clause, as it now stands, makes it lawful for any constable when and so often as he may think proper, to enter all houses licensed as refreshment-houses under the authority of this Act, entering every room, from the cellar to the garret. This may be done without any notice. Many of these refreshment-houses, confectioners'-shops, and coffee-houses, are exceedingly respectable, and visited by the most respectable people; yet there is not a confectioner's shop in the whole of London which, under this clause, may not be visited at any hour by any policeman. This is a state of things which I am sure will occasion the very greatest inconvenience, arising from an extension of police power far beyond the necessity of the case. So far as regards the houses selling wine, it may be desirable perhaps that the police should have full powers; but if wine and spirits are not sold, I cannot see what advantage can be gained from giving policemen power to enter all refreshment-houses. I wish to speak very highly of the Metropolitan police. I know well how they execute their duty; but the framers of this Bill do not entertain the same opinion of the Metropolitan police that I do, for the 39th clause contains a provision which I do not believe exists in any Act of Parliament whatever, imposing a heavy penalty on any person selling wine who shall harbour or entertain a policeman during the time he is on duty. A suspicion seems to have existed that many of the police constables, under the influence of vintners or the keepers of public-houses, may be enticed into these houses and made drunk. Such is the estimate of the character of policemen formed by the framers of this Bill. But the circumstance that a police-constable may enter at pleasure into any coffee-shop or confectioner's shop has, I have reason to know, given rise to a great deal of apprehension. I hope some alteration will be made in this respect. I know that this measure has given rise to a great deal of apprehension and alarm as to its effects upon the morals of the people. I am not going to propose any alteration myself, as I understand the Bill is to be regarded as a Supply Bill. I must say, however, that I am not prepared to surrender what I consider to be the just rights and privileges of this House. I will abstain from making any Motion, reserving, so far as I am individually concerned, the right and privilege of the House, and yielding only to the circumstances of the moment, but declaring that I believe the abandonment of our rights and privileges would be a great detriment to the interests of the public.

THE EARL OF WICKLOW said, that he understood the principle of the Bill to be that it was to induce the people of this country to substitute a more wholesome beverage for those fiery spirituous beverages to which they were now accustomed. If so he was at a loss to understand why Ireland and Scotland were not included in the Bill; for if there were any portion of the empire to which this principle was most applicable it was to those two countries, where the manufacture of ardent spirits was principally carried on, and where, consequently, there was comparatively the greatest consumption. If they were to substitute wine for spirituous liquors, surely there was no portion of the empire that stood more in need of the benefits of this Bill. These two portions of the empire were, it seemed, to be deprived of the blessings of Parliamentary Reform, but he could not understand why they were also to be deprived of the benefits of beverage Reform.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, he understood that this was to be treated as a Supply Bill, and he was very sorry to hear it, because the greater part of the Bill related to matters with regard to which that

The Earl of Shaftesbury

House was in the habit of legislating. He agreed with the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) that this was not a proper time to enter into a discussion of the privileges of the House of Lords, and, therefore, he should be very unwilling to introduce any Amendment; but there were certain clauses in the Bill to which he entertained a strong objection, and he would ask the noble Earl whether any Amendment of them would be an infringement of the privileges of the House of Commons? The whole of the licensing system under this Bill differed essentially from that under which the licensing victuallers now obtained their licences. The Bill proposed to introduce a number of other persons into the trade. Now he did not ask for the licensed victuallers any monopoly; he did not think the House would support any such monopoly; but at least they had a right to demand that the conditions under which they were placed should be the same as those under which other persons were placed who had the same privileges. Now, a licensed victualler had to apply to a magistrate, who had complete discretion as to whether he would or would not grant him a licence. He had to go to the magistrates to obtain a certificate for a licence, and then he went to the Excise, and upon that certificate the Excise granted the licence. But what was the course to be pursued under this Bill? The person who wished to obtain a licence did not go to the magistrates at all, but went at once to the Excise, and the Excise served a notice on the magistrates, and if the magistrates did not in a certain number of days enter a caveat the licence would be granted as a matter of course; and the magistrates, moreover, could not enter that caveat without stating the specific grounds on which they did so. Now, the licensed victuallers complained that this operated partially in favour of a class who would compete with them in their business. Their Lordships, at the same time that they would refuse to support the licensed victuallers' monopoly, would see the propriety of these wine-sellers being placed on the same footing with the publicans in the matter of licences; and for that purpose he would, if it were competent for him to do so, move to insert words in the 10th clause to the effect that no licence should be granted except on the production of the certificate of magistrates, in the same way as they granted licences to licensed victuallers. He should also move to insert words in the 13th clause. The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Wicklow) asked the reason why Ireland and Scotland were not included in this Bill. He thought he could tell him. He believed that when the Bill was first introduced it was intended to include those two countries, but it met with such opposition from Members representing Ireland and Scotland that if it had not been restricted to England it would not have been carried. He thought the Bill would be a failure, and he was not sorry to see that the experimentum in corpore vili, instead of being on Ireland, would for the first time be tried on England.

THE EARL OF HARRINGTON said, that this was a mixed question, partly fiscal and partly otherwise. He did not object to the free-trade part of the Bill, but to the new licensing system that it proposed to enact. The sale of spirituous liquors under the existing system was one of the great causes of drunkenness, immorality, irreligion, and many other evils with which society was cursed; and he feared that one effect of this Bill would be to increase those crimes by placing wine more within the reach of the people of this country. He denied that the light wines of France were so innocent a beverage as they had been represented. According to the Bill itself, wines would be admitted into the country containing from 10 to 40 per cent of alcohol. Now, beer contained not more than 8 per cent of alcohol. Yet the operation of the Beer Act had been severely denounced and condemned by the House of Commons and by their Lordships. When that Act was introduced it was supported on grounds similar to those urged by the advocates of this measure. But successive inquiries by Committees of both Houses of Parliament had conclusively proved that intemperance and crime had largely increased in this country. If such had been the case when the liquor sold contained so small a per-centage of alcohol, what might they not expect from the operation of this Bill when it came into full operation? In 1854 Mr. Gladstone himself deprecated the idea that any financial considerations should be allowed to stand in the way of any plan for the suppression of intemperance. The very name of the "Maine Liquor Law" was unpopular, and that was not what he desired to introduce; but instead of the present system of licensing he should have preferred what was called "the permissive system," by which the option of granting a licence would be left to the decision of a majority of ratepayers. The public meetings that had been held all over the country, and the numerous petitions that had been presented to Parliament on the subject, showed that the plan was not unpopular. Complaints were now made against the number of beerhouses, and now Parliament was asked to double the number of drinking houses by licensing shops for the sale of stronger alcoholic drinks. He deeply deplored the evils which the people of this country inflicted upon themselves by their consumption of intoxicating drinks, and he deprecated and protested against any legislation which had in any way a tendency to encourage it. According to the Edinburgh Review, £50,000,000 might be annually saved to the people of this country if they were to give up the consumption of intoxicating drinks and tobacco, while Mr. Porter, of the Board of Trade, estimated the expenditure much higher; and if his estimate were right it followed that the working classes earning from 20s. to 30s. a week spent one-third or one-half of their wages in those drinking-houses, and left their families with scarcely enough to keep them from starvation. Two thousand medical men denounced this system in the strongest language, amongst whom it appeared that Mr. Gladstone was surprised to find the name of Dr. Ferguson. The Bill, which he considered to be injurious to public morals, could not have been carried without the eloquence of Mr. Gladstone; but what use was genius if it was not exerted for the promotion of public good and the improvement of public morals? No doubt the intention of the Bill was good; but that was a common excuse for anything that was wrong. Mr. Gladstone was a good and a religious man; but it did seem strange that such a man should invite Parliament to double the 42,000 drinking-houses now in existence. He (the Earl of Harrington) would not dwell longer upon the subject; but he had felt it his duty to express the views which he held, in common with a vast number of persons in this country.

EARL GRANVILLE: I congratulate the noble Earl upon his earnest advocacy of the temperance movement, but I think it would have been better if he had abstained from making these personal observations upon Mr. Gladstone. The question now is, not whether wine is a good or a bad thing, but whether this Bill will, upon the whole, tend to limit or encourage drunkenness. I believe it will have the former effect, and therefore I think it will confer much advantage upon the working classes generally. The noble Earl takes an extreme view, and wishes for a legislative enactment permitting ratepayers to declare that in their districts the minority shall not drink even one glass of beer.

THE EARL OF HARRINGTON: No—not in public-houses.

EARL GRANVILLE: That is not a power which your Lordships might be inclined to confer; but I admit that in the case of those who have no power over themselves to make a proper use of wine or beer, or even spirits, and who cannot indulge without excess, it is an act of kindness to persuade them, if you can, to abstain altogether. But the object here has been to provide persons who make a moderate use of stimulants with reasonable facilities for obtaining the light wines of the Continent instead of any stronger liquors. It was with that intention that the right hon. Gentleman proposed his Bill, and that was the object which gained for it such general support in the other House. With regard to some of the objections which have been raised, they vanish altogether on a closer examination. The opinions of the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) who spoke so indignantly about certain clauses of the Bill were evidently founded on no research of his own. He declared that the 39th clause of the Bill contained an extraordinary provision with regard to the police—one never heard of in any legislative enactment before. It is clear that he himself has not read the clause at all, because had he done so he would at once have seen from the margin that the clause was taken from the 10 & 11 Vict., chap. 89, sec. 34. I think, therefore, that the noble Earl has good ground to complain of those who gave him information of so unfounded a character. As to the licences, I do not think that in the instances in which it will apply the charge of 10s. 6d. will be any hardship. The noble Earl complained of the extreme injustice of imposing such a licence in the case of houses, for example, where a condition in the lease forbids them to sell intoxicating liquors. I think, however, that when a Bill like this has been so long debated by the other House of Parliament we should certainly have heard complaints made as to the imposition of those licences if any good ground of complaint existed. The third objection taken by the noble Earl referred to the powers given to the police of entering these houses. But here he labours under some mistake. He seemed to consider that every refreshment house would be subjected to these regulations. But the only persons to whom they apply are the keepers of what are called "night houses,"—those houses which are kept open from 9 p.m. to 5 in the morning. Now, I think your Lordships will feel that it is most necessary for the purpose of preserving order and tranquillity that the police should exercise some superintendence over houses of this character. It is quite true that the clause as it is now worded will empower the police to enter these houses in the daytime as well as at night, and it may be a question for the Government to consider whether this power is one which should be retained. As to the right of this House to alter any provisions of the Bill, I am not about to raise the constitutional question again. No doubt, the measure is partly of a fiscal character, and also raises questions of general policy with which your Lordships have always been in the habit of dealing. At the same time they could only deal with the Bill by altering the clauses, and he thought their Lordships would hardly do so in this instance, seeing that upon the alteration of any clauses in a Bill of this kind by your Lordships' House, the House of Commons invariably reject the Bill. No doubt the House of Commons would immediately introduce a new measure; but I submit to your Lordships that it would be hardly worth while to take any steps here which would necessitate such a course except for some very important reasons of general policy. If the objection of the noble Earl is found to be a sound one, it may probably be met in another way. The noble Lord opposite (the Earl of Donoughmore), wishes to give the magistrates the power of vetoing a licence without stating any reasons for doing so; in short, he would allow them the same powers as they now have in the case of public-houses. Now, one of the great objects of the Bill is to effect the very change to which the noble Earl objects. Under the existing system the magistrates have taken upon themselves to consider what number of houses is necessary in a district, and the result is a monopoly most injurious to the consumer, and not in the slightest degree favourable to the morality of the community. One main object of the Bill is to avoid creating such monopolies in the case of refreshment houses, and the change desired by the noble Earl, therefore, would, if effected, destroy one of the most beneficial provisions in the Bill. In the other House any alteration of this kind would be as much objected to as it would be by Her Majesty's Government, and therefore I hope the noble Earl will not move any such Amendment. A complaint has been made by a noble Earl (the Earl of Wicklow) that Scotland and Ireland are excluded from this Bill, and it is urged that it is hard, if the measure be calculated to confer benefit on England, that Scotland and the sister country should not share it. My noble Friend (the Earl of Donoughmore) thereupon, in the most kind manner, volunteered to give an answer, and I might have been very glad to accept the answer if it had only possessed the slight recommendation of being founded in fact. My noble Friend said that Scotland and Ireland had been included in the Bill as first introduced, but that the opposition to it from the Members from those countries was so strong that the Government were obliged to withdraw it; and he added that he was very glad of this, because there would now be plenty of time to see how the experiment worked in England before they were called upon to consider the advisability of extending the measure to the whole of the United Kingdom. In all these points my noble Friend was entirely in error. Ireland and Scotland were not originally introduced in the Bill. In Ireland, I believe, a double feeling existed with regard to the measure, some being in its favour, and others opposed to its provisions; in Scotland, however, the Report of the Forbes Mackenzie Commission is strongly in favour of the provisions of the Bill. As respects the time which the noble Earl expects to have for watching the operation of the measure in England, and observing its advantages or disadvantages, he is mistaken here also, because as soon as this Bill has passed it is the intention of the Government to introduce a similar measure for Scotland and Ireland, with those modifications which the police regulations and other circumstances in those countries will render it necessary to adopt. I hope therefore, that that assurance will be satisfactory to the noble Earl.

Earl Granville

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE: Will those Bills be introduced in the present Session?

EARL GRANVILLE: That will depend upon circumstances.

House in Committee.

THE EARL OF HARRINGTON drew attention to the 13th clause, defining the new powers of the magistrates. He proposed to strike out from line 28 to line 41, the effect of which would be to give the magistrates the same power with regard to these wine licences that they now possessed with regard to other licences, by the Act of the 9th Geo. IV., cap. 61, sec. 1.

EARL GRANVILLE remarked that he had already stated the reasons why he could not agree to this Amendment.

LORD DENMAN would not vote for the Amendment of the noble Earl, because if he did so and if it were carried it might lead to a conference or disagreement between the two Houses, but as the noble Lord not then in the House (Lord Brougham) had about two years ago in his place stated that for every 33rd man in the country there was a house of some sort for drink, and that every 33rd house was a house in some way licensed for the sale of liquor, he thought that existing accommodation was more than sufficient. In 1832 complaint had been made of the effect of beerhouse in Hampshire, by the father of the noble Earl Malmesbury, and Lord Brougham, then Chancellor, thought that the magistrates clung to power in retaining their only privilege of granting licences, and stated that beerhouses had done no harm in the North of England. He (Lord Denman) considered that in the county of Derby, in which he had the honour to reside, great evil had been done by them, and for himself he would sooner have half the rent for a private house than double rent for the same house as a place of resort for drinking. He thought that every right-minded man in the country would thank any noble Lord who would move that this Bill be read a third time that day six months.

Amendment, by leave of the Committee, withdrawn.

Bill reported, without Amendment, and to be read 3^d on Monday next.

House adjourned at a Quarter before
Eight o'clock, to Monday next,
Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, June 8, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Selling and Hawking Goods on Sunday.

CLARE COUNTY ELECTION.—REPORT.

House informed, that the Committee had determined,—

"That Francis Maonamara Calloutt, esquire, is duly elected a Knight of the Shire to serve in this present Parliament for the County of Clare."

And the said Determination was ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

LONDONDERRY CITY ELECTION.

REPORT.

House informed, that the Committee had determined,—

"That William McCormick, esquire, is duly elected to serve in this present Parliament for the City of Londonderry."

And the said Determination was ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

CORRUPT PRACTICES PREVENTION ACT.—QUESTION.

MR. HUNT said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is his intention to introduce a Bill this Session based upon the Report of the Committee upon the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that as the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act expired on the 10th of August next it would be necessary that some legislation should take place on the subject during the present Session. The Report of the Committee having been issued only yesterday the Government had not had time to examine the recommendations which it contained. No time, however, would be lost in considering the subject, and, as far as he was concerned, he would be ready to propose to the House some measure founded on that Report if there were any chance of there being time during the present Session for its consideration.

MR. LAING moved, That the House at its rising do adjourn till Monday next.

EXPORTATION OF SPANISH CORKS.

QUESTION.

MR. T. S. DUNCOMBE said, he wished to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, if in consequence of the reduction in duty on the importation of Foreign Wines, he has any reason to believe that his anticipations that the free exportation of unmanu-factured Cork from all parts of Spain might take place would be fulfilled? He put this question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with the view of affording him the opportunity of doing justice to a very industrious and worthy trade—that of the corkcutters. In the course of the discussions on the Customs Act the right hon. Gentleman said that, in consequence of the large reduction which was to be made in the duty on foreign wines, he hoped that no duty would be charged on the export of unmanufactured cork. The right hon. Gentlemen also took occasion to criticise very unfavourably the conduct of the journeymen corkcutters, asserting that they were in the habit of going out on strike, and that the masters had been obliged to employ boys and even foreign workmen. He had since ascertained that there were six Catalonians over here at that time, who were employed by a man at Greenwich; but they were all such bad characters that their employer was soon glad to get rid of them. With some difficulty they procured another engagement in the City, but had again to be discharged. They then took to working "on their own bottom," as the phrase was, and he believed it was from them that the right hon. Gentleman obtained the cork which he exhibited to the House in order to prove the superior excellence of foreign workmanship. He had intended to revive this question when the Customs Act was again brought before them; but, as the business of the House was in such a state that it was impossible to say when any question would come on, he had resolved to put this question to the right hon. Gentleman. He had received from the master corkcutters of different towns,—Plymouth, Liverpool, York, Birmingham, Aberdeen, Dublin, Belfast, &c.—letters bearing testimony to the good character of the men in the trade. The hon. Member read the letter which he had received from the Liverpool manufacturers, stating that they were able, from the experience of many years, to contradict the statement made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the House of Commons, that a tyrannical and arbitrary system of restriction prevailed among the journeymen, and that the masters had been obliged to employ foreign workmen on account of their superior skill. The letter was signed by men who had been sixteen and seventeen years and some fifty years in the trade. He had also a letter from Aberdeen to the same effect, in which the master manufacturers did full justice to their men. He had also one from Dublin, signed by many who had been more than thirty years in the trade, and who gave the most emphatic contradiction to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. He thought the right hon. Gentleman could have no difficulty now in saying that he had been misled upon that point: and as to foreigners being better workmen than English corkcutters he was told that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer liked to put up a prize with open competition, the English workmen were quite confident they would gain it. He wished to ask whether Catalonia was about to make any reduction in the duty on unmanufactured cork in consequence of the reduction which England had made in the duty on Spanish wine.

THE TELEGRAPH TO GIBALTAR. QUESTION.

COLONEL PERCY HERBERT said, he wished to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer with regard to the Submarine Telegraphic Cable to Gibraltar, for which a sum of £30,000 was granted last year. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer then stated that the actual cost of the cable, when constructed, would be £115,000, and he believed, although he could not find it in Hansard, that it was stated by the Government that, although the season was too advanced to enable them to proceed with it last year, it would be proceeded with early in the spring. The spring had passed, and they were well into the summer, but they had heard nothing of it, except a rumour that the cable, after having been purchased by the Government, had been taken by the Indian Government, to be laid down between Singapore and Rangoon. It was of great importance to have rapid communication with the fleet at Gibraltar, in the event of any disturbance in Europe, and no delay in laying the cable ought to take place. He should be glad if the Chancellor of the Exchequer would give some explanation on the subject.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked Whether there would be any objection to lay on the table copies of the correspondence which had taken place on the subject. The late Government, looking upon the laying of this cable as a matter of urgency, undertook it in a peculiar way, in the hope of carrying it into operation in the summer of 1859. Owing to the change of Government and other circumstances, it was not carried out then; and if they were to wait to discuss the subject until Vote 7 of the Civil Service Estimates, in which the Vote for the cable was contained, came on there was a great chance that nothing would be done this year.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, the papers should be examined, and if any of them were calculated to give information they should be laid on the table.

COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE. QUESTION.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he had not given notice of this Question, and if it were the desire of the Government he would repeat it on Monday. He wished to know what progress has been made by the Commissioners sitting in Paris to convert the ad valorem Duties on British Produce into Specific Duties? The time was rapidly approaching at which, if those ad valorem duties were not converted, the maximum duties of 30 per cent would attach. He should also be glad to know whether if the ad valorem duties were not converted into specific duties by the end of the month, the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary intended to make any communication to the Government of France with a view to extending the time for that purpose?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the question put by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Horsham (Mr. S. FitzGerald), would perhaps be answered with greater advantage by his noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs. He believed, however, that for the present the answer must be in the negative, that was to say, he had not understood that any point had been reached in the labours which were now being performed at Paris, which would enable those who were concerned in them to make a definite communication to the Government—those labours being, in point of fact, an adjustment of details. He had not the terms of the Treaty sufficiently in his mind to speak with very great confidence, but he apprehended that the hon. Member was not correct in supposing that the necessary consequence of failing to agree upon any particular terms with regard to the conversion of any particular duties would be that the ad valorem duties would be levied at the maximum rate. [Mr. S. FITZGERALD: There is the right to do so.] There was a right to fix the specific duties at the maximum; but he was not aware that the maximum was at all affected by the duties being either ad valorem or specific. As he had said, however, he was not aware that there was any official information that could be laid before the House. If he remembered right, there was a stipulation in the Treaty that the stipulation of the Supplemental Convention should be framed before the 1st of July; but he presumed, if these examinations should be greatly prolonged, which he conceived was very probable, it would be the object of both Governments to give facilities for extending the time necessary to conduct the investigation.

With respect to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. T. Duncombe) he could venture to assure him that he should be very glad to do justice to any class, and particularly to those whom the hon. Gentleman represented, where it was shown to him (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) that he had done injustice; but his hon. Friend had pursued an inconvenient course in relation to this matter, inasmuch as he had taken three months to produce this vindication, which it appeared was in his possession a great part of the time. If the hon. Gentleman had kindly favoured him with the documents he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) should have been in a condition to examine the case, and to have reverted again to the sources from which he received information, and to have given to the hon. Gentleman a reply, either abiding by, retracting, or modifying what he had stated. As the hon. Gentleman had not taken that course, and the statements now made were new to him, he thought it necessary to investigate those statements before he could be bound by them. The hon. Gentleman had met but a very small portion of the allegations which had fallen from him, and those with whom the hon. Gentleman had communicated had entirely misapprehended him on the principal point of that statement to which the hon. Gentleman had referred. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had never said that masters had been driven to the employment of boys, but he did say that the regulations of the trades' unions very greatly limited and fettered trade, and some of them tended to restrain the employment of boys. Some masters, however, did not submit to those restrictions, and were placed under ban by the trades' societies for having used their own discretion in the employment of boys. With regard to the six Catalonians, he had received no particular information on the subject, and whether they were men of good or bad character he was not prepared to say; but he had stated that he was informed that the six Catalonians who came over from Spain to this country, for the purpose of working at the trade of cork-cutting, under all the disadvantages of foreigners in a strange country succeeded in earning more at corkcutting in England than the English corkcutters. Whether that statement was correct or not, it at all events stood unshaken by anything which had fallen from the hon. Gentleman. With regard to any change in the law of Spain with respect to the exportation of the raw material of cork, the hon. Gentleman must be very sanguine indeed if he thought by this time the Government would have been able to announce that any change had been effected. The change in our own law had not yet taken place. In Spain the state of the law was peculiar. The general law of Spain did not prohibit the exportation of corks; it was only the local regulations in Catalonia which prohibited that exportation; and those regulations, he believed, were mainly founded upon what his hon. Friend ought to have great respect for, namely, the operation of a principle in Catalonia very like to the principle of trades unions in this country. The people of Catalonia combined against the exportation of cork, and the authorities were unwilling to place themselves in conflict with the people, just as the authorities here were unwilling to place themselves in conflict with the workmen who belonged to trades unions. He believed that his noble Friend the Foreign Secretary intended to make an application to the Spanish Government with respect to these commercial arrangements; but possibly it might be judged premature to make such application until the subsidiary arrangements connected with the French Treaty should have been fully determined upon and carried into effect.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

With respect to the question which had been put to him by the hon. and gallant Gentleman, the Member for Ludlow (Colonel P. Herbert), that naturally was a subject which deserved the attention of the House; but he must be excused if he did not enter fully into it at the present moment, inasmuch as a Vote would be proposed to Parliament in the Estimates, for the purpose of completing the manufacture of the cable, and when that Vote came before the House, hon. Gentlemen would have a full opportunity of discussing the matter. He could assure the hon. and gallant Gentleman, however, that nothing had been done by her Majesty's Government upon their own responsibility:—it would, in point of fact, have been an act of presumption on their part to anticipate the judgment of the House upon the final application of the money which was taken last year. It was true that, when the Government came into office, they found that a contract had been entered into for the manufacture of certain submarine cables; it was also true that there was not time to carry the operations into effect last year; but he looked for the accomplishment of it during the present year. A variety of circumstances had led the Government to think that, upon the whole, they would not be justified in asking the House to vote money for the purpose of undertaking that operation at the expense of the public, in the present state of that description of enterprise, and of the knowledge which bore upon it. It might be within the recollection of the House that when this project was originally entertained by the late Government, there was a very great difference of opinion among the authorities with regard to the practicability of laying down deep-sea cables with a fair prospect of their working, and unfortunately the whole experience which they had had during the last twelve months had tended very greatly to confirm that view. The instances of failure in the working of deep-sea cables had been unfortunately so numerous as almost to be universal. He believed that at this moment there was only one deep-sea cable—a cable 1,000 or 1,200 fathoms deep—in efficient operation. The operation of laying had failed in many instances, and in several conspicuous instances during the last twelve months, including that from Malta to Corfu. The knowledge of those facts had made the Government very cautious in the expenditure of the public money on these projects. The Vote of £30,000 to which the hon. and gallant Member had referred, was, in fact, a Vote of £135,000, and it would be necessary to take a further Vote this year on account of it, even if it were taken to Singapore. India, being interested in the laying down of the cable between Rangoon and Singapore, would bear a portion of the expense attending that work. He begged to assure the hon. and gallant Colonel that nothing which had been done would preclude the House from taking any course which they might think fit with regard to this important undertaking.

CHINESE WAR.—NAVAL PAY.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE PECHELL said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is intended to give to the Navy serving in China the same extra pay and allowances enjoyed by the Army in India, and which are said to be now granted to the Military Forces to be employed with the Navy in the same quarter?

INDIAN CIVILIANS KILLED DURING THE MUTINY.—QUESTION.

MR. VANSITTART said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether the names of those Civilians on the Bengal Establishment who were killed in action, murdered, or died from wounds and exposure during the late Mutiny, between the 11th day of May and the 19th day of November, 1857, have at any time been brought under the notice of the Government, and whether he intends to do honour to their memory by the erection of a Monument. As Her Majesty had been graciously pleased at the recommendation of her responsible Ministers to confer from time to time high honours upon members of the Indian Civil Service, and in speaking of that service to couple the deeds performed by them with those of their military brethren, it would ill become him to add a word in their behalf. He held, however, in his hand a list which contained the names of no less than thirty-six civilians, who either fell nobly in upholding the honour and dignity of their Sovereign and their country, or were brutally murdered at their posts, in reference to whom no allusion had been made, except on one occasion, namely, on the 14th of December, 1857, on the final closing of the East India College at Haileybury by Mr. Mangles, the Chairman of the East India Company, whose name was familiar to most hon. Members in that House. Mr. Mangles, in touching upon this subject, said:—

“Let me also say that I intend to propose to my colleagues to erect a tablet in your chapel to the memory of those of the civil servants in India, educated at Haileybury, who have fallen in this atrocious mutiny; and I trust it will go down to the latest posterity as a memorial of their deeds, and of the gratitude, not only of the East India Company, but of the country, for their services.”

Shortly afterwards, and before this praiseworthy object could be carried out, Parliament in its wisdom deemed it expedient to abolish the East India Company; and this fact, in the absence of any other explanation, no doubt, would account for its having hitherto escaped the attention of Her Majesty's Government. Under these circumstances he ventured to bring the subject under the notice of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for India, in the hope that he would take it into his early consideration, assuring him that by so doing he would earn, not only the deep gratitude of the relatives and friends of those civilians, but the appreciation of the country generally. With the permission of the House he would read out the names of the civilians on the Bengal establishment who had been killed in action, murdered, or died from wounds and exposure during the late mutiny between the 11th May and the 19th November, 1857, and the places at which they died:—Messrs. J. R. Colvin (Lieutenant-Governor of the North-Western Provinces) and W. C. Watson died at Agra; Mr. H. E. Cockerell, at Banda; Messrs. D. Robertson and G. D. Raikes, at Bareilly; Messrs. R. B. Thornhill, C. G. Hillersdon, T. R. Mackillop, and R. N. Lewis, at Cawnpore; Messrs. S. Fraser, J. R. Hutchinson, H. H. Greathed, and A. Galloway, at Delhi; Mr. R. T. Tucker, at Futtehpore; Mr. R. H. Pomeroy, at Ghazee-pore; Mr. W. Clifford, at Goorgaon; Mr. W. R. Moore, at Gopeegunge; Mr. J. Wedderburn, at Hissar; Messrs. T. K. Loyd and D. Grant, at Humeerpore; Mr. B. R. Cuppage, at Juanpore; Mr. A. Johnston, at Meerut; Messrs. G. F. Christian, M. C. Ommaney, A. H. G. Block, C. W. Cunliffe, A. Jenkins, H. B. Thornhill, J. B. Thornhill, J. G. Thomason, G. S. Benson, H. Gonne, and Sir Mountstuart Jackson, at Oude and, most of them, at Lucknow; and Messrs. M. Ricketts, C. J. Jenkins, and A. C. Smith, at Shahjehanpore.

ORGANIZATION OF THE INDIAN ARMY. QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES expressed his entire concurrence in the object which had been stated to the House by his hon. Friend, and trusted the Government would see the propriety of carrying it into effect. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman, Whether he has received any Despatch by the last Mail from the Governor General of India with respect to the organization of the Indian Army; and whether he will lay the same upon the Table of the House?

Mr. Fanshott

CONVEYANCE OF STORES FROM INDIA TO CHINA.

Mr. SOMES said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether an American ship has been taken up by the Government for the conveyance of stores from Calcutta to China; whether eligible British ships were tendered for the same service; and, if so, whether he will state the reasons which induced the Government to make such selection? It appeared that in Madras, on the 13th of March last, the Government chartered the Bremen ship Lerius, and the American ship Frank Flint, to convey troops and stores to China. Some years ago, in consequence of a similar occurrence, the following correspondence took place between the General Shipowners' Society and the East India Company:—

"General Shipowners' Society, 12, St. Michael's-alley, Cornhill, London, Dec. 2, 1851.

"Sir—The attention of the Committee of the General Shipowners' Society having been called to the fact that foreign vessels have been tendered to the Honourable East India Company for the conveyance of stores to India, I am directed respectfully to request that you will be so good as to call the attention of the Honourable Court of Directors to the circumstance that no English ship could be taken up by them unless the master and officers have passed a searching examination into their capabilities of conducting the ship safely to the port of destination; and if foreign masters and officers are not required to undergo a similar examination, it is evidently unjust to the British shipowner, captains, and officers, that foreign ships should be engaged on a public service. Moreover, in addition to the officers' certificate of competency, it is required that the British ship must be subjected to the strictest examination by Lloyd's surveyors, and classed in the books of that association, while from this also the foreign ship is exempt.

"Although it may appear not to be in the province of this Committee to refer to the risk which, in the event of war, damage to the ship, and consequent sale of cargo to pay for such damage in a foreign port which the Honourable Company incur by the employment of foreign vessels, yet in justice to the British shipowner they feel warranted in calling attention to the additional security he offers, as a justification of any preference you may give him.

"I have the honour to be, Sir,

"Your obedient servant,

(Signed) "WM. BONAR, Secretary.

"James C. Melvill, Esq., Secretary East India Company."

"East India House, Dec. 18, 1851.

"Sir—In acknowledging the receipt of the letter you addressed to me under date the 2nd instant, consequent on the attention of the Committee of the General Shipowners' Society having been called to the fact that foreign vessels had been tendered to the East India Company for the conveyance of stores to India, I am commanded to state that the said letter has been duly laid before the Court of Directors.

"I am, Sir,

"Your most obedient humble servant, (Signed) "JAMES C. MELVILL.

"Wm. Bonar, Esq.

"The above letter from the General Shipowners' Society was written in consequence of a Danish ship, the Hindoo, being taken up by the East India Company."

Although no distinct Resolution was adopted in consequence of this correspondence, the practice of employing foreign ships in the Company's service had been discontinued up to the date he referred to—the 13th March last. Other nations were particularly careful to encourage their own shipping. The Americans, when they purchased in the West Indies, invariably kept their purchases till their agents could ship them in American vessels, although eligible British vessels might be lying in the port. The consequences of employing foreign vessels might be serious in the event of war breaking out. He had no wish to dissuade the Government from taking advantage of the services of foreign ships; but he thought that when British ships were offered they ought to receive the preference. He could only anticipate one answer—namely, that economy was the motive which had induced the authorities to employ an American ship in the case to which his question referred; but as the whole of the money paid for a foreign ship went out of the country, he could not but think that the economy was in this instance false.

THE BENGAL ARMY.—REWARDS TO OFFICERS.—QUESTION.

Mr. KENNARD said, he had read in The Times of the 30th of May the announcement that,— "It is intended that the officers of those Native regiments which mutinied shall be allowed to retain those staff appointments by means of which nearly the whole of them have been provided for. It must be conceded that this, if just, is a very liberal justice."

On reading that statement it occurred to him to inquire, if those officers who had lost their corps were to be thus rewarded, what was to be the reward of those officers who had retained their troops. It was manifest that if the soldiers belonging to the 74 regiments of the Bengal army had remained faithful there would have been no mutiny, and, therefore, those officers who had managed to retain the obedience of their regiments had accomplished a public service for which the country could hardly show sufficient gratitude. The only four regiments which remained faithful were the 21st, 31st, 66th, and 73rd. The 66th was a Ghoorka regiment, composed for the most part of Nepaulese, with hardly any admixture of Hindostanees, and was, therefore, drawn from the class which was least likely to mutiny. The 21st and 73rd had never been disarmed, but he believed had not been employed on any active duty. The Ghoorka regiment and the 31st, on the contrary, had rendered important military services, which were referred to in the General Orders, under date 8th September, by the Governor General in Council. The manner in which the mutineers were encountered was there detailed, and the Governor General went on to say, "The 31st Native Infantry prominently distinguished itself by its loyalty under severe trials." Compliments had been paid to other regiments; but when the Indian army was thanked no reference was made to this distinguished corps. The only reward of which he had heard was, that the distinction of making it a light infantry regiment had been conferred. Being convinced that neither the House nor the country would be niggardly in rewarding the services of those Gentlemen who had so highly distinguished themselves, he begged to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to reward the services of those Officers of the Bengal Native Army whose regiments remained faithful to the British Government during the late Mutiny?

LOCAL ARMY IN INDIA.

QUESTION.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether the Bill respecting the Local Army in India had not better be introduced on some other than a Motion day, Tuesday, the 12th June? The hon. and gallant Member said that perhaps the despatch received last night from Lord Canning might have changed the mind of the right hon. Gentleman and the intention of the Government upon this subject of the local army in India. But if it had not, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would select some other day for the discussion of the question instead of Tuesday next. As to the despatch itself, he should like to have the whole document laid upon the table, rather than extracts from it. He had also to ask whether the Council of India had been consulted by the right hon. Gentleman upon the subject, and, if so, whether they had acquiesced in or dissented from the policy proposed to be adopted. He believed it was very questionable whether the law would admit of the proposed alterations being made without first having the opinion of the Council in India in favour of the propositions.

MR. W. EWART said, he desired to express a hope that the services of the civilians on the Bengal establishment would be remembered by the Government, and that the services of the non-civilians, or those not in the pay of the Government, would not be forgotten.

MR. ADAM thought every opportunity should be taken to point out to the Government the duty of honouring, not only the living, but the dead. He had no wish to decri the Civil Service of Bengal, but in the distribution of honours he thought sufficient consideration had not been shown to the minor Presidencies of Bombay and Madras. It was the lax discipline of the Native army of Bengal that did much to produce the mutiny, and make it formidable; yet it was Bengal that had reaped most of the rewards. The cause of this injustice to Bombay and Madras was, he believed, the system of centralization that had been the curse of India.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he would answer the several Questions, on the affairs of India, in the order in which they had been asked.

In answer to the Question of the hon. Member for Windsor (Mr. Vansittart), the right hon. Gentleman stated that the then Chairman of the Court of Directors had announced an intention of erecting a tablet in the chapel of Haileybury to the memory of the civil servants of the Company who were killed during the mutiny. Nothing could be more appropriate than such a monument in the chapel of the seminary of the Civil Service; but, as Haileybury had ceased to be kept up, a doubt occurred as to the intention being carried out, and when other sites were under consideration, it seemed difficult to confine the memorial to Civil servants only. The question had thus assumed much larger dimensions than when the original announcement was made, and nothing had been done. This occurred, however, before the change to the present form of Government, and he himself had never heard the subject spoken of till it was mentioned to him by his hon. Friend.

To the second Question, put by the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster (Sir De L. Evans), his reply was that an extract from the despatch referred to would be given, but not the whole of it, as the other parts only related to military arrangements not relevant to the subject.

As to the Question of the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Somes), he was not aware that any American ship had been employed by the Government in India, and could not give any reasons for what he was not aware had been done.

To the fourth Question, put by the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Kennard), he had to answer that whether the officers had belonged to Native regiments or not, they were not placed on the Staff as a reward for their services; the Government had rewarded those who were recommended in the best way it could, whether they belong to the regiments that had mutinied or not.

To the fifth Question, asked by the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster (Sir De L. Evans), the answer was, that he wished to make the statement on the Bill referring to the local army of India as soon as possible; but it was very difficult, in the present state of public business, to obtain a day for it. He had named Tuesday because he thought that he should on that evening have a chance of bringing it on at an early hour. The opinion of the Council of India had been taken on the subject of the amalgamation of the Indian army; that opinion was adverse to the plan; but it would defer to the opinion of the Government if confirmed by Parliament, and what they resolved on, the Council of India would do its best to carry out.

SALE AND RE-PURCHASE OF GOVERNMENT LAND.

QUESTION.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether the land sold at Portsmouth for £8,000, and re-purchased for £28,000, was originally purchased under an Act of the 8th of Queen Anne, which recited that the land was specially to be bought for the use and purposes of the defence of Portsmouth; and further declared, "that all and singular the premises shall be and are enacted and declared to be unalienable from the Crown?" One would think that if there were any value in words, such land could not have been sold. The money had been granted by the House of Commons for a special purpose, in a special Act of Parliament. He was aware that in the 1st and 2nd George IV., an Act was passed, transferring this and other land to the Ordnance Department, and that this Act had been confirmed by an Act of William IV. He had, however, been informed that these Acts, being General Acts, could not override the Act of Anne, which was worded in a special manner. Under these circumstances, he thought they ought to have the legal opinions of the law officers of the Crown whether such sale was legal; and if not, the House ought to mark the transaction with their reprobation, for this was a most remarkable instance of that penny-wise and pound-foolish economy, which so often actuated the Government of this country. Nor was this the only instance of the kind. Land had been sold at Harwich, at Chatham, at Milford Haven and other places, which, if required again by Government, will have to be repurchased at an exorbitant price. He would now put the Question of which he had given notice:—"Whether the land sold at Portsmouth for £8,000, and repurchased for £28,000, was originally purchased under an Act passed in the 8th year of Queen Anne, which Act recited that the land was specially to be bought for the use and purposes of the Defence of Portsmouth; and further declared, 'that all and singular the premises shall be, and are enacted and declared to be, unalienable from the Crown;' and, if so, what legal power was vested in the Master General of the Ordnance to authorize the sale of such lands; and whether he will lay upon the Table of the House any Papers, or Correspondence, or Legal Opinion which may exist in the Ordnance Department with reference to such sale?"

Sir De Lacy Evans

THE NATIONAL DEFENCES.

QUESTION.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for War when he intends to lay upon the Table of the House the Report of the Commissioners on the National Defences; and whether it is the intention of the Government to present to Parliament in the present Session an Estimate for carrying into effect any of the recommendations of the Commissioners? The hon. and gallant General said it would be in the recollection of the House that a Royal Commission had, in the month of August last, been appointed for the purpose of inquiring into the condition of our national defences. The Report of that Commission had, he believed, been in the hands of the Government for some time, and he, under those circumstances, wished to ascertain what its nature was, and whether any steps had been taken by the Government to carry into effect the recommendations which it contained.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE stated that the position of the Government property at Portsmouth was most unsatisfactory. Some twenty-five or thirty years ago it was the fashion to sell everything that came under that head; and not only was timber sold out of the dockyard, but a large portion of land was sold at the foot of the glacis at Portsmouth, the consequence of which was that at the present time the sentries could be picked off the fortifications by a revolver fired from the houses built upon the property so sold. Now the tide was turned the other way, and the authorities would not part with an inch of land which the inhabitants of Portsmouth might require for their convenience, be it ever so worthless. Last year a Bill was introduced into Parliament to carry the line of railway from the terminus at Landport, between the works of Portsea and through the Mill-dam, to a convenient landing-place in the harbour, for the purpose of accommodating passengers to the Isle of Wight. The War Office was understood to be willing to comply with the request, but the Admiralty vetoed it. The Admiralty, however, pointed out a line which they would permit, and this the War Office vetoed. In this way the Departments played into each other's hands, and the consequence was that the passengers had to be carried twenty-five miles round, and the direct communication with London through Portsmouth was interrupted by the obstinacy of the Departments. The Government property lay in shreds and patches all over the place, while portions of ground fit for docks and other works of defensive description were not in possession of the Crown to the proper extent. The ground held by the Government, uselessly lying in waste, would purchase all that was wanted. Just now the War Department were doing, probably, the most absurd thing that could be done. They were building a line of fortifications at the bottom of Portadown Hill; so that any force in possession of the hill could fire down into the whole of the fortifications, and with guns carrying four miles could burn and destroy the whole of the dockyard at Portsmouth. If the Government would appoint an independent Commission who knew the value of property, not of officers who regarded a bastion as a holy thing, he thought they would be able to realize money enough at Portsmouth to excavate all the docks that were necessary there, and provide an adequate arsenal, which certainly did not exist at present.

RELATIVE RANK OF ARMY SURGEONS.

QUESTION.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Warrant of October 1st, 1858, giving to army surgeons the rank of majors, was meant to be retrospective? He admitted that the medical officers of the army were entitled to every consideration, but he thought it hard that non-combatant officers should have all the privileges of field officers. He thought that it would be sufficient to give surgeons the rank of junior major. According to the present understanding, a major who was acting commanding officer of his regiment might find the surgeon of the regiment senior in rank to himself.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Perhaps I may be allowed to answer a Question put by an hon. and gallant Member, who asked when the Report of the Commissioners on the National Defences would be laid upon the table. The Report is here, and my right hon. Friend will lay it on the table in the course of the evening. I wish at the same time to state that it will be my duty, at an early day, to submit to the House the course which Her Majesty's Government intend to recommend to Parliament with regard to the matters which are treated of in that Report.

CLERK OF THE COUNCIL.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I shall at the same time take advantage of being on my legs to answer a Question of which notice has been given by the hon. Member for Devizes, to whom I must apologize for not having been here five minutes sooner that he might put it. It stands upon the Notice Paper, and, therefore, he will allow me perhaps to answer it, and thus save him the trouble of putting it. The hon. Member wishes to know whether the salary of £2,500 a year which was received by the First Clerk of Council, who has now retired, has been abolished, and whether the Clerk of Council who is to succeed, and has, I believe, succeeded Mr. Bathurst, is to receive the higher rate of £2,500, or the rate of £1,200 which was received by Mr. Bathurst. The state of the case enables me to answer affirmatively the question of the hon. Gentleman. The salary of £2,500 was abolished at the time Mr. Greville retired. Mr. Bathurst, when he was Clerk of the Council, received the salary of £1,200, and that is the amount of salary which will be received by Mr. Hells, who was appointed in his place. With regard to the allowance to Mr. Bathurst, its amount has not, I believe, been fixed. It will be awarded in conformity with the Superannuation Act, under the provisions of which he is about to retire.

Sir James Elphinstone

ARMY PURCHASE.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN STACPOOLE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if a Captain of Cavalry who has purchased all his steps under the old Regulations wishes to exchange with a Captain of Infantry or to sell out of the Service, from what source he is to receive the difference between the price which he had paid and the present Regulation value of his Troop?

Mr. SIDNEY HERBERT in reply said, that the sum advanced by the officers was paid into the reserved fund, and they would receive any difference from that source.

The object of the warrant referred to by the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Dickson) was to place the medical officers of a regiment in a position to give weight and authority to their advice and professional opinion when it was tendered. Changes of this kind were carried out with some difficulty at the time, but it was felt to be desirable by giving the surgeons a higher army rank to mark the status which the surgeon held in a regiment. [Colonel Dickson: Will the warrant be retrospective?] Every officer now in the army dated back his seniority, and the same rule would apply in the present case.

In reply to the question of the noble Lord (Lord W. Graham), he had to state that he had made an inaccurate answer to the noble Lord on a former occasion, in regard to the repurchase of a portion of the land. There could be no doubt of the legality of the sale. The land was not sold under the statute of Queen Anne, but under an Act passed in October, 1784. It was subsequently vested in the Ordnance Board under the provisions of the same Act amended. The power of the Ordnance to sell was undoubted, but the policy of the sale was a very different question. There was a great deal of truth in the opinion that the sale of this land was made without proper consideration and forethought as to the future value of the property. With respect to the railway extension adverted to by the hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Elphinstone), no doubt the Company had offered that the works should be destroyed in case of war or other necessity, but such promises were easy to make and very difficult to exact. The hon. Gentleman had recommended the appointment of a Commission acquainted with the value of land to inquire into the subject of the Government land at Portsmouth which it might be advisable to sell. It would, however, be necessary that such a Commission should contain Members acquainted with Ordnance. [SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE: I would combine both; gentlemen acquainted with the value of land and gentlemen acquainted with the improved ordnance of the times.] That was, no doubt, an improvement in the hon. Gentleman's recommendation.

COLONEL SIR JUSTIN SHEIL.—ARRESTS IN DUNDALK.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he would take the opportunity of making a statement in reference to a charge brought a few nights ago by the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. H. D. Seymour) against a gentleman who had been twenty years in the service of the Crown, that he had conducted himself in Persia as "a bully," that his policy had been "a bullying policy," that he was without influence at the Persian Court to which he was accredited, and that he secluded himself from Persian society. Anything spoken by a Member of that House was read all over the country; and he would ask the House, after they had heard his explanation, whether the hon. Member was justifiable in applying such terms to Colonel Sir Justin Shiel. As he (Mr. Whiteside) had the good fortune to know Colonel Shiel, he might be allowed to state that he was trained for the service of the East India Company. In 1834 he went to Persia to discipline certain regiments, and in this way he became personally known to the present Shah of Persia, whom he assisted in placing on the throne. After a long residence in Persia and Turkey, Colonel Shiel was appointed by Lord Aberdeen in 1844 British Minister in Persia. It was said he was without influence, but the Treaty of Erzeroum was effected by him. In 1845 he succeeded in abolishing torture, in conjunction with a Russian ally, and he induced the Shah to lay aside the pastime in which he had formerly indulged, of having the heads cut off and the eyes of his subjects put out in his presence. Colonel Shiel also induced the Persian Government to empower British vessels to seize every ship belonging to a Persian subject which had slaves on board. When Persia annexed Herat, although Colonel Shiel was without an army, made no presents and offered no bribes, yet he succeeded in obtaining a renunciation of all claim to Herat on the part of Persia. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. H. D. Seymour) said that in his time he found it more convenient to travel as a Russian subject than as an Englishman, or rather that he had travelled as a Circassian chief. However that might be, he believed that the character of an Englishman, which was always respected abroad, had been more respected in the Persian dominions during the time Colonel Shiel was there than in any state in Europe. Taking all these circumstances into consideration, he thought the observations made by the hon. Gentleman could scarcely be justified. He (Mr. Whiteside) wished, however, to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland for an explanation respecting recent Arrests for Conspiracy in Dundalk, and in relation to the discharge of certain other parties charged with or convicted of the like offence in Ireland. He had lately read an account of an arrest in Dundalk of persons charged with belonging to a secret society and being engaged in a conspiracy. It was said that the parties arrested belonged to the same order as some who had been previously convicted; that eleven men were in custody, and that it was believed the authorities were on the track of others. He wished to know whether that statement was true, and whether the conspiracy alluded to was one with which he was himself acquainted—namely, the Ribbon conspiracy, having, when in office under the late Government, found it necessary to prosecute some members of that confederacy. There was a trial in Belfast; but one jurymen held out, and there was no verdict, and when he left office these men were in custody; but he understood that the present Government had released them. The police had ascertained that their ringleader was a sergeant in a militia regiment in the pay of the Crown, and he thought him, therefore, having been guilty of perfidy as well as conspiracy, a very proper subject for prosecution. He, however, understood that this man had slipped through the fingers of the police, or had been pardoned. He trusted that he had not been restored to his regiment; for he could assure the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) opposite, that although a regiment of Sepoys might not be regarded as a very loyal support to a Government, a regiment of Ribbonmen would be far less reliable as a force in the service of the Crown. But there was another case, namely, of a schoolmaster in the south of Ireland, who had also been prosecuted. This man had also been receiving the pay of the Crown, and was convicted of treason. From the manner, however, in which he had been since treated, it would seem that treason was but lightly thought of as an offence. Sheep-stealing was punished severely as a crime, but the person who attempted to dethrone the Queen was not looked upon as so great a criminal as the sheep-stealer. At least, this was the only inference that could be drawn from what he understood to be the fact—namely, that the schoolmaster in question had been pardoned. He wished, therefore, to know whether this was the case, and, if so, whether the pardon had proceeded upon the recommendation of the Judge who had tried him. He felt it only right to mention that the learned Judge, Baron Green, one of the kindest-hearted men that ever lived, said upon the trial of the schoolmaster, that such was the sense he entertained of the enormity of the crime that he felt it to be his duty to sentence the man to fifteen years' penal servitude. He (Mr. Whiteside) acquiesced in the propriety of pardoning misguided men who were evidently repentant, but he could not agree that treason should be treated so lightly. At the same time that these men were prosecuted a man at Mullingar was sentenced to seven years' penal servitude for Ribbonism. He wished to know whether that man had also been pardoned, and if so, whether his pardon had been recommended by the Judge who tried him. In order to show the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) the delicate ground on which he was treading, in thus dealing with Ribbonism, he would state a simple fact: A few years ago the Ribbonmen of Dundalk had determined to put to death several gentlemen residents in the county of Louth. One of them, Mr. Eastwood, was nearly murdered. The two men who were appointed to kill him did not know his person, and they applied to a railway labourer to point him out to them. It was through this circumstance they were taken. They were prosecuted, and were executed. One of the grand jurymen of the same county called upon him (Mr. Whiteside) and informed him that he actually knew the public-house in Dundalk at which Ribbonmen had met and come to the deadly resolution of taking away his life, which they had fortunately not succeeded in carrying into effect. Now, a few years after that occurrence, he read the account which had induced him to ask this question. Eleven men were said to have been arrested for the same offence of Ribbonism. He wished to know if this were the case, and if they were in truth members of the same confederacy as those who, it was said, had been pardoned by the same Administration. He was perfectly willing to agree in the propriety of extending the mercy of the Crown to those who deserved it, but he was sceptical about the policy of pardoning men belonging to such a confederacy—men who could revolutionise a kingdom as well as disturb a province. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) that he would find the Ribbon conspiracy much more dangerous in its character than he had yet discovered it to be.

Mr. Whiteside

DEFENCE OF PORTSMOUTH.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he expected to have heard some Member of the Government reply to the Question of the hon. and gallant Member for Portsmouth (Sir J. Elphinstone) relative to the defences of that Port; but as none had been given, he was desirous of adding the expression of his hope that Her Majesty's Government had employed some competent Engineer to superintend the fortifications at Portsmouth. An immense amount of money had been spent in this way some years ago; but it was perfectly unnecessary, for in consequence of the narrow passage of the harbour, its shallowness, and other circumstances, it could easily be made secure by sinking any old vessel at the entrance, which would effectually prevent any ship from coming in. Or it would be quite possible, by burning damp powder in some old hulk or two, to cause such a smoke to rise all over the harbour, that it would be perfectly impossible for an enemy's vessel to see its way to the entrance. There was not a waterman in the harbour of Portsmouth that was not able to make a suggestion of this kind, and to see the inutility of such expensive fortifications as those which had been adopted. The Russians had taught us the use of sunken vessels at Sebastopol. But with regard to land fortifications at Portsmouth, he really could not see the use of them. They were building great redoubts all round the dockyard at a great expense. These redoubts were commanded by Portsdown Hill. It would, therefore, be necessary to build some enormous castle there to protect the redoubts. If those were built it rendered the lower fortifications seaward quite useless. It was said that fortifications were to be carried on throughout England. He hoped they would not be of the same useless character as those at Portsmouth. He believed that with some Armstrong and Whitworth guns placed on the Isle of Wight it would be possible to shell the dockyard and fortifications of Portsmouth to atoms. It was perfectly absurd and ridiculous to spend millions in such a manner. If an enemy wanted to invade England he would choose one of the many parts of the eastern coast of England where no fortifications existed. Fortification in truth was of no use. The only real and substantial defence of the country was a large, well-manned and well-disciplined fleet. In the time of Napoleon Buonaparte, when all Europe was against her, and 3,000 vessels were assembled at Boulogne for her invasion, England was defended by her fleet alone, and she required no other protection.

DESTITUTION IN IRELAND.

QUESTION.

MR. HENNESSY said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the Government adhere to their determination not to take any special steps to remedy the destitution prevailing in Ennis and other parts of Ireland? The hon. Member said he addressed a question on the same subject to the Chief Secretary for Ireland on the 17th of April last, and he was then told that the Government would do nothing beyond the ordinary administration of the Poor Law. A very unfavourable impression had been created by the course the Government had adopted. A memorial had been presented from Belmullet to the Government, stating that, of a population of 20,000 people, one-half were in a destitute condition; that hundreds were deserting their homes, and fleeing to other shores to escape the horrors of impending famine; and that thousands could not emigrate, and were therefore compelled either to seek refuge in a workhouse or perish by famine. The prayer of that memorial was supported by clergymen of all denominations. The Government, however, had done nothing. The subject was noticed in the foreign journals and in America. A newspaper published at Turin contained an article, in which the writer said:—

"The British Government do not seem to trouble themselves about this Irish famine; they neither make efforts to check the emigration to America nor attempt to provide for the grievous necessities of the Irish people. They show great affection for our nationality, but wish that the Irish should be borne down in slavery, without being able to raise their heads."

Of course it was exaggerated language, but it was the language of a Sardinian journal, which had eulogized the noble Lord for his sympathy in the Italian cause. In a French journal the writer said:—

"Let France send forth an offering worthy of that great nation. The French Government might throw into the balance its powerful authority and interfere in favour of Ireland. It would be a noble action indeed, and as serviceable to humanity as to that country."

No doubt he should receive the same answer from the right hon. Gentleman as he did in April, that the Poor Law Commissioners had power to provide for the relief of the poor in those districts, and must insist on the people filling the workhouses before granting other relief. But it was well known that the peasantry of Ireland would perish of starvation rather than give up their cabins and little pieces of land and enter the workhouse. The total failure of the Poor Law system in an emergency like this had been amply proved, and to the mode of its administration he attributed the extraordinary tide of emigration from Ireland to the United States. When there was great distress in the village of Inniskeagh the Poor Law Inspector, after visiting the place, recommended the employment of the people on public works proposed by the grand jury of the county, but was re-proved by the Commissioners, who told him he must regard the case of the inhabitants in reference to Poor Law relief alone. It seemed harsh on the part of the Commissioners; but they knew that under the Act they had no power to give out-door relief to able-bodied persons while there was room for them in the workhouse. This destitution was going on increasing every day, and he therefore respectfully asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he would not take some steps to relieve it.

MR. CARDWELL, in answer to the right hon. and learned Member for Dublin University, said it was quite true that eleven persons were under arrest at Dundalk on a charge of Ribbonism—an association which it was the duty of every Government to put down by all the means at their command. In the case at Belfast, to which the right hon. Gentleman had alluded, while the right hon. Gentleman was Attorney General, the parties were put upon their trial twice, and on both occasions the jury disagreed and no verdict was obtained. On the third occasion the parties pleaded guilty, on the understanding, sanctioned by the Judge, Mr. Justice Christian, that they should be released on their recognizances. That was done when Mr. FitzGerald was Attorney General, and if the right hon. Gentleman opposite disapproved of that course, he ought to have questioned it when Mr. FitzGerald was a Member of that House. With regard to the sergeant who the right hon. Gentleman had allowed to slip through his fingers, the information which the right hon. Gentleman had received was due to the imagination of his informant.

MR. WHITESIDE: The statement I received was from the police.

MR. CARDWELL said, the Government had never heard of the sergeant since he succeeded in slipping through the fingers of the right hon. Gentleman, and there was no truth whatever in the statement that he had been restored to his regiment, and was now receiving the pay of the Queen. With regard to the prosecution which had taken place in the south of Ireland, the same course had been followed as in Belfast, and with the approbation of the Judge, Mr. Justice Keogh. The parties pleaded guilty and were released upon their recognizances, with the exception of one, Daniel Sullivan, who had been convicted by the jury; as, however, his case was precisely similar to the others, on consultation with Baron Greene who tried him, he also was released upon his recognizances; and since then his case had been represented to the Lord Lieutenant, who had granted him a pardon. With regard to Martin Farrell, who was tried in Westmeath, the learned Judge, Chief Justice Monaghan, was consulted, and the result was not favourable, as the antecedents of the prisoner were objectionable, and the prisoner was now undergoing his sentence. With regard to Ribbonism, it was a most nefarious system, and he was happy to say it was gradually but steadily diminishing throughout Ireland, and it was honestly discouraged by the clergy of all the churches in Ireland. He did not hesitate to express his confident belief that its progress towards diminution would be rapid as well as steady.

In answer to the observations of the hon. Member for the King's County in reference to the distress in Mayo, in the first place he must demur to the hon. Gentleman founding his information from Turin newspapers and extracts from French journals—which had the hon. Member been longer in the House he would not have read. He was sorry to say that extreme distress existed in the district of Erris. This had arisen from various causes. The storms in the autumn had destroyed the oat crop; in the winter there had been a serious failure in the potato crop, and there had been an extraordinary failure in the fisheries. All this was followed by a further calamity, an extraordinary drought that deprived their cattle of the pasture on which they placed their entire dependence in the spring. It unfortunately happened, too, that the farmers had considerably increased their stocks of cattle, relying upon their finding provender on the mountains. From all those four causes combined very great distress was caused. The hon. Gentleman must not suppose for a moment that it was the intention of the Government to break down those laws which Parliament had provided for the relief of the necessities of the people under circumstances such as those of the present case. In the workhouse of Belmullet there was accommodation for 600 paupers, but the maximum number relieved had been 125; and the latest number which had reached him was 116, being however, more than double the number of the inmates last year. The guardians, with the sanction of the Poor Law Commissioners, had determined not to raise additional rates at present, but to incur a small debt for their supplies; and the supplemental rates raised in five of the electoral divisions varied from 9d. to 1s. 4d. in the pound. The arrangements for affording relief were reported to be quite satisfactory, and no person requiring assistance was refused. The persons who had really suffered the greatest distress were the small farmers of the district. But how would the hon. Gentleman propose that the Government should act with respect to them? He had found fault with a letter written by the Poor Law Commissioners to one of their Inspectors, who had taken on himself to travel into the province of public works instead of confining his efforts to the department of poor relief. The Commissioners not unnaturally thought the most satisfactory way of discharging public duties was, for each person to mind his own business. The hon. Member for the King's County wished the Government to engage in a system of public works; but there was no necessity for doing so. He was informed that the landed proprietors had not been inattentive to their duties, that considerable activity was displayed upon some of the estates, and it was reported to him that there an air of "cheerfulness and ease" prevailed. Supplies of meal were abundant, and arrangements had been made to facilitate the sale of seed at moderate prices. Any interference by the Government, he contended, would only have dried up the sources of private enterprise, and have been productive of far more suffering to the unhappy people.

Mr. Hennessy

WAKEFIELD PROSECUTIONS.

OBSERVATIONS.

CAPTAIN JERVIS asked the hon. and learned Attorney General, Whether he had understood correctly that the prosecutions in connection with the Wakefield Election, would be founded, not on the common, but on statute law, he should withdraw the Motion on this subject which he had placed on the paper.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Previously to the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member, I had determined that if, contrary to my opinion, the lapse of one year was an objection to the prosecutions that I had instituted under statute, there should be no attempt to support those prosecutions by a resort to common law. If, therefore, I and those who have advised me, are wrong in supposing that they are not affected by time, and if it should turn out that they are so affected, those prosecutions fail, and will be given up, and they shall not be supported by any resort to the common law.

AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE.—QUESTION.

MR CAVE said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether his attention has been directed to the Message of the President of the United States to Congress, on the 19th day of May, respecting the Slave Trade: And, Whether Her Majesty's Government have received any recent communications from the Government of the United States, or intend making any fresh proposals to that Government on this subject? His reason for asking the question was, that an opportunity appeared to present itself for striking a decisive blow at that detestable traffic, which had for so many years disgraced Spain, and caused the expenditure of so much treasure, and the loss of so many valuable lives to this country. In the years 1856-7 the high price of sugar had given an extraordinary impetus to the slave-trade; and during the summer of that year he had had the honour of waiting with a deputation upon the noble Lord (Lord Palmerston) then, as now, at the head of Her Majesty's Government, for the purpose of suggesting some means by which the traffic might be more effectually checked. In consequence of the suggestions of the deputation, the noble Lord had initiated the two best measures that had ever been adopted since the squadron of repression was first stationed in those seas. Through the right hon. Baronet, the Secretary for India, then First Lord of the Admiralty (Sir Charles Wood) he sent steam gunboats into the Cuban waters, and instructed the naval officers in command, that when a Spanish slaver was taken without papers or colours, which was generally the case, she should be considered as having forfeited her nationality, and should be taken into a British, instead of a Spanish Port; so that the liberated negroes might really regain their liberty, instead of being retained in virtual slavery, under the name of Emancipados, which would have been their fate in Cuba. He (Mr. Cave) had had the honour of submitting to the Admiralty a plan drawn up with great care by persons intimately acquainted with the West Indies, marking out the best cruising ground, in which there would be the least risk of coming into collision with the lawful American traders. He fully believed that the Government of the United States was as sincere as our own in their endeavours to suppress this odious traffic. He did not believe that the great mass of the American people would tolerate for a moment the revival of the slave trade to America, which had sometimes been talked of. All accounts showed that the officers of the United States Navy employed on this duty performed it with zeal, and without favour. But it could not be denied that a considerable amount of American capital was employed in the slave trade. The small but active section who so disgraced themselves and their country, and on whom the employment and success of these gunboats had fallen like a thunderbolt, were determined that they should be recalled. If there was one point upon which Americans were more sensitive than another, it was the right of search; relying upon this, these slave traders got up complaints of insult to the American flag; most of them grossly exaggerated, many of them utterly false; so that the American people became excited, their Government uneasy, till at length Her Majesty's Government, to avoid unpleasant consequences, recalled the gunboats, or, which amounted to the same thing, prohibited their interfering with the American flag. This was in 1858. Since which time the Cuban planter had imported as many slaves as he wanted. The whole number in the Island was said to be 400,000, of whom 10 per cent died annually, and there was no natural increase. We learned from other sources, that 40,000 Africans were imported every year, which exactly supplied the loss; and if any more were required, they were supplied by the equally atrocious slave trade from China and Yucatan. Now, it seemed monstrous that this should be allowed to go on in the teeth of England and America, and in defiance of the most solemn treaties. And so thought the President of the United States, for he concluded a message to Congress, on the 19th May last, which appeared in The Times of Tuesday last, in these words:—

"That it is truly lamentable that Great Britain and the United States should be obliged to spend such a vast amount of blood and treasure for the suppression of the African slave trade, when the only portions of the civilized world, where it is tolerated and encouraged, are the Spanish Islands of Cuba and Porto Rico."

Mr. Cave

He omitted, indeed, to mention, that it was the abuse of the American flag, which caused the chief difficulty. Lord Malmesbury had done as much as man could do, as the Slave Trade Papers presented to Parliament showed, to obtain a modification of the American law in this respect; but he had only obtained a long argumentative despatch from General Cass, which closed the published correspondence, and which did not advance the question one iota. He (Mr. Cave) believed the United States Government were powerless in this respect; and could not, if they wished, run counter to the prejudices of the people. Here, however, a fresh advance towards action in this matter seemed to be made by the President. The Americans were bound by the Ashburton Treaty to have eighty guns employed in the service. Half that number in light steamers would be more efficient than their present armament. The Cuba coast was easily watched. The navigable channels were not very wide. The wind almost always blew in one direction. For about four hours in the morning, between the land and sea breezes, there was usually a dead calm, giving steamers an immense advantage over sailing vessels approaching the land. A joint system of cruising might be adopted with a proper code of signals; so that whenever a suspicious vessel, with an American flag, approached within sight of a British cruiser, the latter might signalize to an American cruiser to come up and overhaul her. Other means might have been suggested; but he had already overstepped the limits of a question. His excuse being this unexpected opportunity, and the importance of the subject to the interests of humanity, and the credit of the country.

MR. KINNAIRD thanked the hon. Gentleman for having introduced the question, and asked the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, whether any representations had been made to the American Government relating to a co-operation on the part of that country with the Government of England, by which the vessels of the United States might cruise in company with Her Majesty's ships. This joint action might make up for the defects in the law, and by the co-operation this iniquitous traffic might be put down.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Before I answer the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cave), I wish, in justice to the public servant who has been alluded to by the hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr.

Whiteside), to state my entire concurrence with the observations he has made in reference to Sir Justin Shiel. It is due to a public servant who has obtained great distinction, and who has now retired from active service, that his character should be retained unsullied.

As to the Question of the hon. Gentleman in regard to the slave trade, it is a subject that must always interest the House and the country. I can add nothing to the statement of the hon. Member for Shoreham as to the negotiations of Lord Malmesbury and the attempts that were made to excite the jealousy of the Americans on the right of search. It is unfortunately but too true that the slave trade is still extensively carried on by Cuba. I believe from 30,000 to 40,000 slaves are annually brought into that island from Africa, and it is perfectly true that this trade is carried on in contempt and violation of treaties between this country and Spain. The increase of the traffic arises from various causes; one is the jealousy of the American Government as to any interference with ships bearing the American flag; another cause is the imperfection of the American law on this subject. In the English Treaty there is an article called "the equipment article," by which vessels equipped for the slave trade can be seized by English cruisers; but there is no such provision and no such power given to the American cruisers by the American law. Therefore, vessels on the coast of Africa, though completely equipped for the traffic, and waiting off the harbours to embark a cargo of slaves, if they are seen under the American flag, cannot be interfered with by our cruisers; and if they are pointed out to an American cruiser it is also unable to interfere with the vessel, because, having no slaves on board, there is no provision in the American law to justify the seizure. There is another imperfection of the American law in regard to vessels carrying no flag or papers. A slaver off the coast of Cuba having no flag can be seized by an English cruiser; but if she destroys her flag and papers she cannot be seized by an American cruiser. Her Majesty's Government has proposed to the United States a plan of co-operation, by which English and American cruisers sailing together, one would be able to seize slavers bearing the American flag, while the other could take those slavers which showed no flag at all, so that in either case it should be impossible for the suspected vessel to escape. That proposal is now under the consideration of the American Government, but we have never obtained from that Government a promise to amend their law in the particulars to which I have referred. I fear those statements are well founded, according to which it is not likely any proposition to make the laws against the slave trade more stringent would at present obtain the sanction of Congress. But the question has engaged the attention of Her Majesty's Government, and a despatch I propose to transmit to the different Powers, will explain the state of the law on the subject. It is certainly shocking and mortifying to reflect, that after all the efforts that we have made, and the solemn treaties that have been concluded with that view, we have not been able totally to destroy the slave trade. There is one point in which I do see a prospect of some good being effected. The hon. Member has made an allusion to China. No doubt the kidnapping Chinese by the most atrocious means, and removing them from their country, is to be equally condemned as the slave trade. But there is this distinction between this practice and the African slave traffic. Wherever the slave trade exists in Africa there have been previous wars, man hunting, horrible and constant destruction of villages, and the ruin of that degree of civilization which it is always the object of the British Government to promote. The case of the traffic from China is different. There the people are highly civilized, under the protection of severe laws, and the governors and persons in authority possess very sufficient powers if they choose to exercise them. It has been thought better to employ the agency and aid of the Chinese authorities, to put an end to this kidnapping, and to substitute for it a system of voluntary emigration, of which great numbers of persons in China are ready to avail themselves. In this direction, by acting together with other nations, I see some prospect of improvement. When we compare the state of things which now exists in the case of the slave trade with that which several years ago prevailed, and the diminution which the traffic has undergone, we are afforded the consolation that there is no just reason for abandoning the hope that it may be ultimately altogether abolished.

I may in conclusion say, in reply to the Question of the hon. Gentleman opposite, (Mr. S. FitzGerald) that we possess no official information from the French Government with reference to the extension of the time for the conversion of ad valorem duties, although there is private information which induces me to think that further time will be required.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR hoped that as a very grave accusation had been made against him about an hour and a half before by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin, he might be allowed to take advantage of the present opportunity to make a reply to it. It was not his habit to bring charges in that House or elsewhere, more especially against public servants who had long performed their duty to their country, without sufficient grounds; but he had felt called upon to make the observations which he had offered to the House on Friday last because of the change of policy towards Persia which the retirement of Sir Henry Rawlinson from his position in that country was supposed to indicate. In speaking of the opposite policy, which he had characterized as "the bullying system" he had found it necessary to advert to the gentleman to whom the right hon. Member for the University of Dublin had referred, and he had stated that under the operation of that system British influence in Persia had been destroyed. Colonel Sheil had never, he might add, been able to procure the abolition of slavery in that country—the boon being refused so long as he was at the Embassy at Teheran, which he had only left the Embassy a few days when the Shah had conceded to Colonel Farrant that which had been previously denied. He might further state that Colonel Sheil was not only in the habit of flogging his own servants, but had insisted that the Government of Persia should flog the Persians generally—at least so far as he (Mr. D. Seymour) could understand the circumstances of the case from the despatch which had been sent out by the Foreign Office to put a stop to the system. Then, again, Colonel Sheil had, he believed, nothing to do with overthrowing the slave trade, which important concession was the work of Mr. Murray. With regard to the Convention of Herat he need do nothing more than refer to the words which had been used with respect to it by the present Secretary for Foreign Affairs, who described it as extremely loose and ill-drawn. Having made those remarks he could assure hon. Members that he had felt extreme reluctance in bringing forward the subject which had led to them, and in being obliged to comment upon the acts of a gentleman whose private life was, he believed, most respectable, and who was the brother of one who had been among the greatest ornaments of that House. He did not, however, see how he could adequately explain the distinction between the two different policies which had prevailed in Persia, and point out the reasons why, in his opinion, the one had failed, and why the other should be adopted without introducing the name of Colonel Sheil, against whom he might add, he had no personal feeling whatever. He might be permitted to take the present opportunity of repeating his belief that, our influence in Persia must depend very much on our Minister in that country; and in support of that view he might mention the fact that, when the late Shah died, Colonel Farrant, who was at the time our Chargé d'Affaires at Teheran, had, by taking the charge of everything upon himself, and by sending letters to the various Governors, been enabled through his personal influence, to prevent the breaking out of those civil commotions which were usual on such occasions, and to procure the succession of the present Shah to the throne without difficulty. He sincerely hoped that the choice of a successor to Sir Henry Rawlinson which the Government had made would be equally advantageous, and that the eccentric habits which had to a certain extent been indulged in in Constantinople, would be laid aside in Persia. Nobody, he might add, wished better to the gentleman who was now about to go there than himself.

Lord John Russell

ENGLISH SHIPWRIGHTS IN FRENCH DOCKYARDS.

MR. H. B. JOHNSTONE said, he some weeks ago asked the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he was aware that at the end of the financial year several shipwrights had been discharged from Her Majesty's dockyards, nearly all of whom had obtained employment in the French dockyards. The noble Lord in reply said he knew nothing about the matter. On that day week there appeared in all the newspapers a report of an application made to one of the Metropolitan magistrates for a passport to France by one of our shipwrights who had been discharged from Portsmouth dockyard. The applicant stated that his object in asking for a passport was to obtain employment in the French dockyards. The magistrate thought it was an extraordinary application, and asked him whether he could not get employment in this country. The applicant said he could not, and that 500 shipwrights who had been discharged from Her Majesty's dockyards were now employed in the French dockyards, that he believed hundreds more of our shipwrights intended to follow them, and that he was anxious to get employment in France. He (Mr. B. Johnstone) did not wish to cast any blame on the Government with respect to this matter, for he knew they were not to blame. His object in bringing this subject before the House and the country was to point out the great activity that at present prevailed in the French dockyards. From information he had received there was at this moment between 1,200 and 1,300 of our skilled artisans employed in the French dockyards. If the calamity of a war should happen between England and France, we might have the pleasure of taking the French ships built by those men; but it was a very grave matter that some of our best shipwrights should be employed in building French ships. Could not some mode be suggested for preventing our shipwrights going to France for employment? If the Admiralty would discharge more gradually the men whom they did not want, so much dissatisfaction and disgust would not be created amongst them, and they would be less disposed to enter into the service of foreign countries. He would conclude by asking the Secretary to the Admiralty, whether it is true, as stated in an application made to one of the Metropolitan magistrates, that upwards of 500 shipwrights, who had been suddenly discharged from Portsmouth dockyard, had gone to Cherbourg, and are now in the employment of the French Government?

Mr. BERNAL OSBORNE bore testimony to the anxiety which prevailed on this subject. He wished to ask the noble Lord (Lord C. Paget) if he was able to contradict a statement that had been given as the reason for discharging those men from our dockyards. The reason given, as he understood, was that there was not two years' supply of timber in store. He also wished to ask the Secretary for Ireland what course he intended to take with regard to those Irish Bills which had been on the paper for so long a time? There was a Bill for the registration of births, marriages, and deaths, brought in by the Government, and he believed a Bill had been brought in on the same subject by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Naas), which stood for that night also, and there were also two Landlord and Tenant Bills. He thought, therefore, it would be very convenient to hon. Gentlemen connected with Ireland, if the Secretary for Ireland would state what course he intended to take in respect to these Bills.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he perfectly remembered the Question which the hon. Member had put to him some weeks ago with regard to the discharge of artificers from Her Majesty's dockyards, and who, it was stated, had gone to Cherbourg to enter the Imperial dockyard there. Now, that statement had caused a good deal of sensation, which was not confined entirely to this side of the water. The result was that our Consul at Cherbourg had written to our Government to state that there was no truth whatever in the report of any English workmen having got employment in the Imperial dockyard at Cherbourg. He stated, moreover, that it was contrary to the regulations that any foreign artificer should work in the French dockyards; he added also—which was a still more conclusive argument against the supposition of English workmen being so employed—that whereas both in private trade and under the system of the Royal dockyards in this country the men were earning about 6s. a day, in France the wages were about 4s. a day. It was not likely, therefore, English workmen, when there was plenty of work to be had all round the country, should go across the water to work for 4s. a day; and if any had gone, they would probably be glad to come back again. He did send, however, to Sir Richard Mayne to inquire whether any number of men had asked at the Police courts for passports; and he (Sir Richard Mayne) found on making inquiries at the Southwark Police-court that only one man, named James Bindon, a shipwright by trade, who had been employed in one of the dockyards but had been lately discharged with a great number of his fellow-workmen, had applied for a passport, and had proceeded to Cherbourg with several other men. That was according to the statement of that man, but he was the only individual who was known to have asked for a passport, and he was not returned to. It had been said that the Admiralty had discharged a great number of men, and he would state how the case stood in that respect. In the last winter, when the work was slack in the private yards, a number of extra workmen were put on in the dockyards, because there was a good sum of money under the Dockyard Vote in hand. Those men were, as he said, employed in the winter months, but with the warning that they would be discharged at the end of the financial year. But the Admiralty were anxious that, to prevent distress to the workmen, in consequence of a large number being thrown out of employ at one time, those discharges should be very gradual, and at times when private employment was very plentiful. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would not think they were unduly stinted in the dockyards when he (Lord Clarence Paget) told him they were now working there with 17,556 men, the greatest number ever employed at any former period in the present century, the greatest number employed during the great war with France being only 14,754. The hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. B. Osborne) wanted to know whether the men who had been discharged were sent away in consequence of there not being a sufficient quantity of timber in store. [Mr. B. OSBORNE: That was the reason given.] That might be part of the reason, but it was to be hoped they were not going to keep that enormous mass of men permanently employed in the dockyards. If they were kept constantly at work, of course, the stock of timber would soon be exhausted; but according to the ordinary consumption, they had now two years' stock of timber in hand, and his hon. Friend would find that the interests of the country were not neglected in that respect.

MR. H. B. JOHNSTONE said, that he was perfectly satisfied with the explanations of the noble Lord.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET continued: The hon. and gallant Member for Brighton (Sir G. Peckell) had asked him whether it was the intention of the Admiralty to give the same extra pay and allowances to the naval forces now in China as to those in India. He was afraid of saying anything which might engender hopes which might be disappointed; but he could assure his hon. Friend that the Admiralty would act strictly according to precedent, whatever that might be, and would do justice to the naval forces employed; but he could not distinctly answer the question as to what the allowances would be.

POST-OFFICE ADMINISTRATION. QUESTION.

MR. BOWYER said, that a great deal of dissatisfaction existed among the persons employed by the Post Office, and a Committee had been appointed to inquire into their grievances. Owing, however, to some difficulty in regard to their powers, two of the Committee had resigned, and the remaining Members became paralysed in their functions. The Committee had since been reinforced by two gentlemen from the Treasury, and resumed its labours. For some reason or other, however, this Committee did not enjoy the confidence of the persons employed in the Post Office, many of whom had declined to carry their complaints before it. The appointment of the Committee, and the invitation addressed by the heads of departments to their subordinates to bring their complaints before it, must be regarded as an acknowledgment on the part of the Government that grievances did exist. A public meeting of Post Office employés was held a short time ago to petition Parliament with regard to some of the grievances under which they laboured, and he could not deny that the wording of some of the Resolutions and the language used by some of the speakers who supported them were somewhat stronger and less delicate than was desirable. Still these poor men had substantial hardships to complain of, and the Government ought not to criticise too closely the expressions which had fallen from some of them in the heat of the moment. He was informed that four persons in the employment of the Post Office had been suspended for the part which they took in the proceedings of the meeting. Now, this raised a grave question in a constitutional point of view. The right of petitioning Parliament belonged to every citizen of this country, and ought to be held sacred. The punishment of these men, therefore, for exercising a right which the constitution conferred on them was scarcely justifiable. He would be told, no doubt, that these men were not entitled to take the course they did because the Government had already appointed a Committee to consider their case; but he maintained that if the Committee did not possess their confidence they had a right to appeal to Parliament to redress their grievances. He wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether these men have really been suspended, and whether, if they have, the Government will not take their case into consideration with the view of reinstating them?
Lord Clarence Paget

MR. LAING regretted that he could not give as specific an answer to the question of the hon. Gentleman as it would have been his duty to do had he received notice of it. It was certainly true that considerable discontent had existed among a large number of the servants of the Post Office, especially in the letter-carriers' department. It was also true that a Committee of the superior officers of the Post Office was appointed some time ago to investigate the complaints of these men. In consequence of a difficulty which arose as to the instructions given to the Committee, and the resignation of some of the Members in consequence, their labours were suspended, and owing to Lord Elgin's departure for China some delay occurred in pursuing the inquiry. On the Duke of Argyll being appointed head of the Post Office the Committee of the superior officers was reconstituted as a Commission, with full powers to make ample inquiry into the grievances of the letter-carriers and others, and with the addition of an element independent of the Post Office, in the shape of Mr. Hamilton, Assistant Secretary to the Treasury, and Mr. Stephenson, the chief clerk of the department of the Treasury connected with the Post Office. The Commission so constituted had for the last fortnight been actively engaged in the investigation. They had taken great pains to make themselves acquainted with all the circumstances of the case, and had on one or two occasions visited the Post Office about four o'clock in the morning, in order to see how the work was conducted of which the men complained. Every opportunity had been given to the men to state their grievances, and there was no ground for the statement that the persons employed in the Post Office did not generally repose confidence in the Commission. On the contrary, he had reason to believe that the Committee of the superior officers of the office, as originally constituted, did command the confidence of the men, and that the discontent arose from the suspension of that Committee, and the apprehension that no investigation was to take place. The inquiry by the Commission would be thoroughly searching and impartial. In a large body of men, such as was employed at the Post Office, it was essential that discipline should be maintained. Among a large number of men there would always be a few disposed to be agitators, and if, after a Commission of this sort was appointed, a number of the men held a meeting to induce their fellow-servants not to go before the Commission to state their case fairly and fully, it was necessary for the preservation of discipline that such conduct should be marked by suspension. He was not in possession of information which would enable him to state as a matter of fact that the men had been suspended, but he thought it extremely probable that they had been, and, from his own experience in the management of large bodies of men connected with railways, he thought that such a step could hardly be avoided. The Commission would shortly conclude their investigation, and their Report would, no doubt, be laid before the House. He trusted that such measures would then be taken as would remove all reasonable grounds of discontent among the servants of the Post Office.

MR. BOWYER said, he did not complain that disapprobation had been expressed of a meeting the object of which was to induce the servants of the Post Office not to go before the Commission, but that men had been suspended for exercising the constitutional right which every subject possessed of petitioning Parliament.

INDIA.—DISARMING THE NATIVES.

ADDRESS MOVED.

MR. H. BAILLIE, in moving for an Address for Copies of all Correspondence with the several Governments of India, regarding the disarming of the Natives in Guzerat, together with any Minutes or Opinions recorded by Members of the late Court of Directors previously to the transfer of the Indian Government to Her Majesty, and subsequently of the Council of India, having reference to the same subject, said he wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for India to the proceedings of the Indian Government in regard to this matter. There was no mode of punishment, no disgrace, no humiliation, so great in the eyes of a proud and warlike people as being deprived of their arms. It was calculated to arouse the bitterest feelings of the people, and this mode of punishment if carried out without great judgment and discretion would create great evils. When the people of Oude and elsewhere took up arms against us, and were conquered in fair fight, and as a matter of course were obliged to submit to the penalty—that was not the disarming he complained of. What he complained of was, that the disarming should be carried on indiscriminately, and in those territories where the people had shown no hostility, where they had not rebelled, but where, in spite of strong temptation to a different course, they had remained tranquil. To disarm in such a case was not only unnecessary, it was tyrannical and oppressive. Nevertheless, the Government of India had adopted this course, and with a severity altogether unjustifiable. He held in his hand an extract from a letter from an Indian officer of rank and position. It was dated in 1859. The writer stated,

"My opinion now is that we are hated cordially; and the mode in which the disarming Act is carried out is in a great measure the cause of it. The arms were collected by the use of torture. The Natives were tied up, and flogged, and tortured to make them confess where their arms were concealed; and sometimes the flogging produced nothing. The men employed were chiefly youngsters, inexperienced, and likely to commit all sorts of folly."

Well, this did not appear to be a very satisfactory mode of inaugurating Her Majesty's reign in India, nor of convincing the people of the great advantages they were likely to derive from subjection to British dominion. Some years ago a statement was made in the House of Commons that torture was employed in India by the Government. The statement was received with incredulity, and indignantly denied by those who had administered the affairs of India. But the House of Commons thought that inquiries should be made. Inquiries were made accordingly, and it turned out that torture was not only carried on, but that it was so common that it was used as the ordinary mode of collecting their revenue. Villages, too, had been burned down and razed to the ground in Guzerat, for no other reason than that the people were supposed to have concealed their arms. And this was in the territory of an independent Prince, an ally of the British Crown. The Indian Government had obtained the permission of that Prince to the disarmament of his subjects; but it was on that account the more to be regretted that the measure had been carried out with circumstances of such great severity. He trusted that there would be no objection to the production of the papers, for which he then begged leave, in conclusion, to move.

COLONEL SYKES, in seconding the Motion, said he had from the first regarded the disarming of the Natives as a highly impolitic measure, because it would not only be ineffectual, inasmuch as we could not disarm the people of the independent Native States, but it would indicate a degree of distrust unworthy of a strong Government. It would, moreover, expose the peaceful population of our own and the Native States where the disarming could be carried out to being made the victims of the predatory hordes who infested India. This disarmament was taking place not only among our own subjects, but was being attempted amongst the populations of the independent States of Gwalior, of the Guicowar, and the Rajpoot States. It should be remembered that the Pathan Mahomedans, the Rajpoots, and many other Native castes, looked at the bearing of arms as bound up with their personal honour; and consequently to disarm them could only excite in their minds a feeling more intense than resentment—of deep and bitter revenge—against the Government. When in the Court of Directors he had therefore protested against the measure as unworthy of us. He trusted, however, that the alarm which had existed with regard to the Native population was subsiding, and that we were beginning now to place a little more confidence in them. He had heard—but he hoped the report was not true—that in some of the Coolie villages in Goojrat the inhabitants had been removed by force from the districts in which they had been planted from time immemorial, and that to prevent their returning to their homes the sites of the villages had been literally turned up with ploughs drawn by asses, an indignity which would necessarily excite great exasperation. He was glad that the papers were to be produced, and the willingness of the right hon. Gentleman to grant them was an evidence that he did not participate in the feelings which dictated the orders that had been issued.

Notice taken, that Forty Members were not present; House counted; and Forty Members being present—

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that the measure referred to was taken before he was appointed to his present office. The disarming of the Natives was not a measure of punishment, but only one of prevention, and to be justified by the circumstances in which India was placed. The disarmament referred to had taken place with the consent of the Guicowar, and was the means of preventing serious mischief in his States. Tantia Topee went down into that country with a view of raising an insurrection, but he failed in his object, the people, who were otherwise willing enough to join him, being destitute of arms. He had no objection to the production of the papers moved for.

MR. H. BAILLIE thought it must be a gratuitous assumption on the part of his right hon. Friend to state that there would have been a rising in the States of the Guicowar if the people had had arms, because he understood that they could by no possibility disarm the people of India, and that when they were asked to deliver up their arms they merely surrendered the old and useless arms, reserving the good and useful ones. It was because the officers were aware of this fact that they resorted to such harsh measures.

MR. VANSITTART said, that the measure of disarming the Natives originated in the Legislative Council of Calcutta, where it was fully discussed and found to be absolutely necessary. It was, he thought, one of the most judicious measures that had ever emanated from an assembly of which, as he had frequently avowed, he had not a very exalted opinion. That precaution had had a great effect in keeping down the population in the Punjab. There was no doubt that the prompt disarming of the people of Scinde by Sir Charles Napier was of the greatest service to Mr. Frere in his administration of that province. Had the advice given by Mr. Coverly Jackson—who was sent to Oude by Lord Dalhousie—been accepted by that noble Lord, and the people then and there disarmed and some hundreds of mud forts dismantled, there was little doubt that the fearful siege of Lucknow and the Cawnpore and other massacres would have been wholly prevented or greatly mitigated. Therefore although isolated cases of hardship might have occurred in carrying out the disarmament, he was persuaded that it was a wise and politic measure.

MR. J. B. SMITH said, that whatever might be said of the disarming of the people, the burning of their villages could not be considered as a measure of prevention.

Motion agreed to.

Address for "Copies of all Correspondence with the several Governments of India, regarding the disarming of the Natives in Guzerat; together with any Minutes or Opinions recorded by Members of the late Court of Directors previously to the transfer of the Indian Government to Her Majesty, and subsequently of the Council of India, having reference to the same subject."

ANCHORS AND CHAIN CABLES, MERCHANT SERVICE.—LEAVE.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill to estalish a test for anchors and chain cables for the merchant service, when Notice taken, that Forty Members were not present; House counted; and Forty Members not being present,

House adjourned at Nine o'clock, till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, June 11, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS. — 2^a Ecclesiastical Courts and Registries (Ireland); Church Temporalities (Ireland) Acts Amendment.
3^a Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences; Sir John Barnard's Act, &c. Repeal.

HARBOURS OF REFUGE.—QUESTION.

LORD PORTMAN having presented a Petition of Inhabitants of Lyme Regis that steps may be taken for the formation of such a Breakwater as will render the Port of Lyme Regis a safe and efficient Harbour:—

LORD RAVENSWORTH asked the noble Duke at the head of the Admiralty whether he was aware of any intention on the part of Her Majesty's Government to carry out without further delay the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Harbours of Refuge? The recent storm had caused tremendous losses in the merchant service, and especially on the north-east coast, where the existence of harbours of refuge was most to be desired. He believed he was speaking within bounds when he said that during the late awful gale not less than 300 vessels were wrecked, mainly on the north-east coast of this country. The phenomena of storms were now so well understood that he believed intelligent commanders who were provided with good barometers might become sensible of the approach of a gale in time to make for the nearest harbour of refuge, if such an asylum were provided for them.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, it was usual to give notice of questions of this kind. As the noble Lord had not taken this course he had not communicated with his Colleagues, and was not prepared to give the noble Lord an answer.

WESTMINSTER CLOCK.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF DERBY wished to put a Question to the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack in reference to a matter in which he took a deep interest when he was not in office—he meant the state of the Clock attached to the new Houses of Parliament. The noble and learned Lord had been accustomed to complain of the silence of the clock in former times, and he had no doubt that he had endeavoured to impress his views upon his present colleagues. They all knew the circumstances under which they had been deprived of the doubtful advantage of hearing the tones of the great bell; but when a clock ceased to address itself to the sense of hearing, that was no reason why it should decline to present itself to the sense of sight. One of the hands had disappeared altogether, and the other stood at twelve, so that it had the merit of being right at least once in the twelve hours. He had no doubt the noble and learned Lord had directed the attention of his Colleagues to the subject, and, if so, he should like to hear from him, for the sake of their Lordships and the lawyers in Westminster Hall, that his efforts were likely to be attended with a satisfactory result.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR thought the noble Earl ought to have given notice of his Question. Certainly the clock was not in Chancery, or in these days it would have gone on more satisfactorily. However, he thought the noble Earl could not, with a very good grace, make any complaint on the subject, considering how long a period was taken to repair the clock when he was in office, and the condition in which he had left it to his successors. It could not be denied that the clock was in the worst possible condition. After all, however, the reform of the clock had proceeded as fast as the Reform of Parliament.

THE EARL OF DERBY: Then I gather that there is to be no alteration, at least this Session.

EARL GREY, in common with all the inhabitants of that part of London in which he lived, rejoiced that the great bell had been cracked, and he trusted that no attempt would be made to make the clock speak to their ears again in the old tones. He should like to see the hands in motion again, but he hoped the bell would remain mute.

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS AND REGISTRIES (IRELAND) BILL.

SECOND READING.

THE EARL OF ST. GERMAN'S moved the Second Reading of this Bill, which he said had for its object to restrict the Ecclesiastical Courts of Ireland to ecclesiastical-matters and to transfer matrimonial suits to the Court of Probate.

The Earl of Derby

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE observed, that the Bill contained some clauses which he thought were undesirable. The Bill did not prescribe any mode of procedure, which was a very important point.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH said, he was opposed to that part of the Bill which authorized the taking of evidence in the Probate and Divorce Courts by Examiners, as a most unsatisfactory method of taking evidence in any court of law.

THE BISHOP OF DERRY said, the Bill had been approved by the highest authorities in Ireland. He thought the matrimonial jurisdiction could be best administered by the Judge who presided over the Probate Court.

THE BISHOP OF CASHEL was understood to support the Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, he hoped that, if the Bill were carried, its provisions would be carried out with a greater regard to economy than had hitherto been observed by the Irish Commissioners of the Ecclesiastical Courts. He did not see why they should have £1,000 a year more salary than the Poor Law Commissioners, who did a great deal more work for what they received.

After a few words from the EARL OF ST. GERMAN'S,

Bill read 2^a, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

REFRESHMENT HOUSES AND WINE LICENCES BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 3^a.

LORD MONTEAGLE stated, that on a future occasion he should ask the Government to lay on the table an account showing the amount of drawback payable on foreign wines at the time of the passing of the Resolutions in the House of Commons, and to inform their Lordships whether any negotiations were now in progress with Spain and Portugal, with a view to the reduction of the duty upon wines imported from those countries; and if so, whether there was any probability that such reduction would be met by a corresponding reduction of the duties upon articles jected to by some of their Lordships, were introduced into this Bill at the instance not of the Government, but of Mr. Hardy, who was Under Secretary for the Home Department in the Government of the Earl of Derby. The Government did not, he repeated, intend to raise any constitutional objection to their Lordships dealing with any of the questions involved in this Bill; but he did not think that it would be improved by the introduction of any of the Amendments which had been suggested.

On Question, That ("now") stand part of the Motion? their Lordships divided:—Contents 36; Not-Contents 2: Majority 34.

Resolved in the Affirmative.

Bill read 3^a accordingly, and passed.

CONTENTS.

Campbell, L. (L. Chancellor .)	Gloucester and Bristol Bp.
Newcastle, D.	Aveland, L.
Somerset, D.	Belper, L.
	Chesham, L.
Townshend, M.	Churchill, L.
	Churston, L.
Belmore, E.	Dartrey, L. (L. Cre- morne .)
Chichester, E.	Digby, L.
Clarendon, E.	Foley, L. [Teller .]
De Grey, E.	Harris, L.
Ducie, E.	Llanover, L.
Granville, E.	Lyveden, L.
Mayo, E.	Methuen, L.
Romney, E.	Minster, L. (M. Conyng- ham .)
Saint Germans, E.	Monteagle of Brandon, L.
Eversley, V.	Portman, L.
Falmouth, V.	Talbot de Malahide, L.
Lifford, V.	Wodehouse, L.
Sydney, V.
Derry and Raphoe, Bp.

NOT-CONTENTS.

Harrington, E.	Denman, L. [Teller .]
----------------	-------------------------------

PROTESTS.

Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences Bill.

"DISSENTIENT:

"1. Because the Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences Bill of 1860 is dishonoured by its Connection with the Eating Houses.

"2. Because this Bill will tend to convert Eating Houses, which are innocent Places of Recreation and Refreshment, into Resorts of Vice like the Beerhouses.

"3. Because the Measure is opposed to the Wishes of the Labouring Classes, who are in favour of a prohibitory permissive Bill, enabling the Rate-payers to decide in their Localities for or against the Sale of Strong Liquors in Public Houses.

"4. Because the Licensed Drinking House System has been denounced by the House of Lords in 1743 as to Gin, and in 1850 as to Beer, and by the House of Commons in 1834 as to Spirits, Wine, and Beer.

Earl Granville

"5. Because it is criminal to sanction a Traffic that leads the Labouring Man into Temptation, that poisons his Brain with Alcohol, that injures his Health, beggars his Family, lessens his productive Power, and diminishes the Nation's Wealth.

"6. Because the drinking Habits of the People are rated by the Judges as the great Source of Crime.

"7. Because the People of England, Ireland, and Scotland, and chiefly the Working Classes, tax themselves 57 Millions yearly for Beer, Wine, Spirits, and Tobacco; the latter Two contain no Nourishment, and they are all the fertile Source of Disease, Vice, and Crime.

"8. Because all Experience proves that the greater the Number of Public Houses, where strong Liquors are sold, the greater the Drunkenness and Crimes.

"9. Because in 1743 the Bishops denounced the Gin Bill with matchless Eloquence, but this social and immoral Wine Bill was not debated by the Bishops, who were absent, or passive at their Posts.

"HARRINGTON.
DENMAN."

"For 4th and 6th Reasons.

"DISSENTIENT:

"1. Because it is inexpedient to pass a Bill which can only be temporary, whilst a new and general Regulation is rendered by it more than ever necessary for all Houses, whether licensed by the Magistrates or the Excise, for the Sale of Wine and Spirits, and Beer, or of Beer only.

"2. Because the Veto pointed out by this Bill is difficult to be carried out, and has no Reference to the Opinions of a neighbourhood as to the necessity for the Number of Refreshment Houses required therein; whilst it takes away from the Magistrates the Power which they at present (in part) possess of controlling the Sale of Foreign Wines.

"3. Because the Notice of Application for Licences for Refreshment Houses being placed on Church Doors is a Reference to a Subject entirely different from that of Religion.

"4. Because while this Bill defines "Refreshment Houses" as Houses open between Nine at Night and Five in the Morning, it requires every Vendor of Eatables who may close his House as early as Eleven at Night to take out a "Refreshment House" Licence, and to be subject to domiciliary Visits from the Police (without any Complaint from any Informer or from the Neighbours), until Five o'Clock in the Morning.

"5. Because the retailing of Wine of all Descriptions, Spanish, Portuguese, French or German, in any Description of Shop, without any limit as to Number, will interfere with ordinary Branches of Trade, and cause great Interruptions in the ordinary Course of Business, and a great Waste of Time, whilst those who have a Character for importing pure Wines will find it very difficult to maintain their Ground against unlimited Competition.

"DENMAN.

"DUNNANON."

House adjourned at a Quarter before
Seven o'clock, till To-morrow,
Half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, June 11, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Agricultural Servants; Admiralty Court Jurisdiction (No. 2). 2^o Offences Against the Person; Malicious Injuries to Property; Coinage Offences; Accessories and Abettors; Forgery; Larceny, &c.; Criminal Statutes Repeal; Highways, Roads, &c.; Tithe Commutation; Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) (No. 2); Tenure and Improvement of Land (Ireland); Leasing and Improving Land (Ireland). 3^o Masters and Operatives.

CASE OF DANIEL SHEA AND THE ISLINGTON UNION.—QUESTION.

MR. H. A. HERBERT said, he rose to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether his attention has been called to the case of Daniel Shea, who, having been sick for many months, died on the 29th of May in the Killarney Workhouse in consequence of hunger and cold endured by him on his passage from London to Cork; and whether he has directed an Inquiry to be made into the conduct of the Poor Law Officials of the Islington Union who caused his deportation under circumstances of such peculiar hardship? It was alleged that the poor man in question had not received even sufficient food during the passage.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, his attention had not been directed to this matter otherwise than by the Notice on the paper. There had been no communication made to the Poor Law Board in reference to the matter. But he had directed an inquiry to be made of the Parochial Officers of Islington as to what was known of this case, and they had positively denied that any blame attached to them, or that they were in any way responsible for the death of Daniel Shea, who was in the workhouse, and who, most unusually, applied to be removed to his own country.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL.—COMMITTEE.—ADJOURNED DEBATE.—THIRD NIGHT.

WITHDRAWAL OF THE BILL.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [4th June].

"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair;" and which Amendment was, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in order to obtain a safe and effective Reform, it would be inexpedient and unjust to proceed further with the proposed Legislative Measure for the Representation of the People until the House has before it the results of the Census authorised by the Bill now under its consideration,"

VOL. CLIX. [THIRD SERIES.]

—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, in rising to address the House on this occasion, I must say, in the first place, that it is impossible for Her Majesty's Government to accede to the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Rye (Mr. Mackinnon), and that I think it would be most inconvenient for the House itself, in deciding upon the question of his Reform Bill, to fix the time to which they would postpone it, or to commit themselves to any pledge that they would not entertain it at any period before the expiration of two or three years. I trust, therefore, that my hon. Friend will not persist in his Amendment. I have also a further statement to make to the House with respect to the position of this Bill; and in making it I beg to say that it is not my wish to excite any asperity of debate, or to refer more than in passing to the debate which took place the other night. In the debate of Thursday evening, my noble Friend at the head of the Government stated the case in favour of the Bill, and against delay, and I do not wish to abate a single word of what my noble Friend stated on that occasion; but having said thus much, it is not necessary that I should repeat any of the arguments then used on behalf of the Government. This, however, is apparent on the division, that there were 250 Members of this House who declared for the postponement of the Bill for this Session. I say for the postponement, because if we had taken a different line—if we had said, "we are determined to go on, not only with the English Bill, but also with the Scotch and Irish Bills," I think it could have been said as strenuously, and to my mind with much more reason. "You cannot expect to carry these three Bills; you might possibly have carried the English Bill; but if you attempt to carry the three Bills, it is obvious there will not be time for the performance of the work." The Government therefore—250 Members having voted in affirmation of the proposal for postponement—thought themselves bound seriously to consider the position of the question, and to ask themselves what was their duty to the House and the country. I must say that I think that if we are not of opinion that we can succeed in carrying this Bill through both Houses of Parliament in the present Session, it would be idle, perhaps culpable, to go into Committee for some four or five days and then to make the delays which would arise in Committee the reason for abandoning the Bill. The position, then, is this—we have not yet got into Committee on the 11th of June—250 Members have voted for a postponement—and there are, moreover, some sixty or seventy Amendments to be proposed in Committee. It cannot be expected but that all those Amendments would be discussed. The question of the representation of the people in Parliament is a very large one, and the Bill being before the House there is certainly no Parliamentary objection to the introduction of any topic immediately connected with the representation. There could be no objection to the argument that one part of the system of representation bears upon others, to the argument that the redistribution of Members bears on the question of the franchise, nor to the introduction of other subjects which, though not contained in the Bill, belong to the question of the representation of the people. It would, therefore, be a matter which must take up considerable time. But if we were able to command all the time from the 11th of June to what may be presumed to be the usual time for the close of the Session, I should then say that it was our duty to proceed with the Bill, and, even at a late period, to propose it for the consideration of Parliament. But it happens that there are other questions which must be considered, and some of them must interpose during the passage of this Bill through Committee. There are questions which have arisen very recently. There is the question with regard to the Supplies, which depends upon the news we have received from China, putting an end to all hope that our dispute with China can be settled without hostilities, and therefore requiring this House to consider what Supplies will be necessary for the operations of our army and navy now in the China seas, and what Ways and Means may be required for bringing those operations to a successful termination. There is the question also which my noble Friend mentioned the other night—the propositions which may arise out of the Report of the Commissioners on the National Defences. No one could pretend to say, that either with regard to the China war, or with regard to the defence of the country, it would be allowable to the Government to make themselves responsible for the postponement to another year, or even to a late period of the present Session, of questions of such urgency and importance. The question, then, being whether we should be able to go through Committee on the Bill in the course of the present Session, we came to the conclusion that it was not probable we should be able to go through Committee, and to obtain the assent of the House of Commons to the various clauses of the Bill, in the time usually devoted to the Session. There was this further objection—that if we were not able completely to carry the Bill into law, it would not be fair to ask the House of Commons to decide prematurely upon the amount of the county and borough franchise, thereby fettering their discretion and injuring the discussion of the question in another year. Supposing, then, that in the ordinary period of the Session it was not possible to carry the Bill through this House in such time as to send it up to the House of Lords for them to decide upon it, there arose this further question—whether by extraordinary means, whether by the unusual step of an adjournment instead of a prorogation, it would not be possible to carry this measure through. But I think it is evident that, important as the question is, there is not that immediate urgency with regard to it, and I may say that there is not that demand that it should be proceeded with without any delay or postponement, which would justify the Government in resorting to an extraordinary measure of that kind. Well, Sir, such being the case, we have come to the conclusion—which I will at once state to the House—that it is not our duty to attempt to proceed with the Bill in the present Session. But, in making that announcement, I think I should hardly be justified if I were not to refer to some questions which may be asked, perhaps to some reproaches that may be addressed to the Ministry. It may be said that it was not till the 4th of June that we asked the House to go into Committee, and that if we had pressed the Bill at an earlier period of the Session we should have been enabled to get a decision of the House on the provisions which it contained. But I must remind the House that in the first instance it was necessary that the usual Supplies for the army and navy should be granted to the Crown, and at a very early period of the Session we brought forward measures with that object, which were not only of the utmost importance, but likewise of the greatest urgency. We had thought it our duty to conclude a commercial treaty with France, and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the name of the Government, proposed various measures connected with that treaty largely affecting the finances of the country. According to all the views that have been usually entertained by the most competent authorities under any Government it would not have been right to postpone for an indefinite time questions of taxation and of duties of so important a character as those to which I refer. For the sake of the trade and industry of the country, and for the maintenance of the financial stability of the State, it was necessary to proceed with those measures without delay. They occupied a very considerable time; and I therefore felt myself compelled to postpone to as late a period as after Whitsuntide the proposal that we should go into Committee on this Bill. There are other questions with regard to the usual Supplies of the year which remain to be settled; the Army Votes, or many of them, are not at present agreed to. The whole of the Civil Service Estimates have likewise to be taken; and, though it be reasonable and necessary to ask for a Vote on account of them, it would not be reasonable to postpone beyond a very limited time—say the early part of July—the discussion on those Estimates. These questions would again have impeded the progress of the Bill, and would have made it necessary for us to ask for frequent delays. But, Sir, there is a subject, with regard to which I must say a few words further to the House, and that is as to the nature of the Bill which we have proposed. I do not now intend to discuss those matters which are merely points of detail, but I think it is necessary to state that the Government were persuaded, and are persuaded, that the reduction of the borough franchise is required for the future safety of the State and for the improvement of our representative system. Many years ago, when I had to consider this question, Mr. Hume, who was then a Member of this House, and who from the first day that the Reform Bill passed in 1831 always told me what he intended to do, urged, among various other arguments, that six out of every seven of the male adults of this country were excluded from the franchise; and that among those who were so excluded were men whose intelligence and probity would fully entitle them to the enjoyment of that privilege. I will own that his arguments on that occasion made a great impression on my mind, and induced me to set on foot inquiries and to send persons into the country to ask who were excluded, and to ascertain the character of those working men who did not possess the franchise. The result of those inquiries convinced me that there were many of those men whose intelligence and integrity qualified them for the exercise of the right of voting. But if that be the case, then their exclusion—their continued exclusion, their perpetual exclusion—must weaken, while their admission cannot fail to strengthen the basis on which our representative institutions rest. I am not speaking now of any particular franchise; but I am persuaded more than ever I was before that there are great numbers of persons who would exercise that franchise well and worthily, and that it they were admitted the result would be favourable to the maintenance and increased vigour of our institutions. It is, therefore, our intention at the earliest period which may be in our power to introduce a Bill containing provisions for the reduction of the franchise. Nor, Sir, am I discouraged by seeing that more than once measures of this kind have been obliged to be postponed; for I have remarked that, while proposals for the advancement of Liberal principles in conformity with the opinions entertained by the majority of this House have been frequently delayed, yet the result has been that when once they have obtained the assent of Parliament they have remained permanently enrolled among the statutes of the realm, and become permanent institutions of the country. For a long time the sacramental test was required as a qualification for office. No one would now think of proposing that test. For a long time Roman Catholics were excluded from this House and from office by old penal enactments. Nobody would now think of excluding them on those grounds. Reform itself was for a long time opposed, and successfully opposed, in this House; but nobody would now contemplate the restoration of the boroughs which were disfranchised in 1831 and 1832. And in the same way I am convinced that, when a measure has passed this House enlarging the franchise and extending to persons who are qualified to exercise it a participation in the right of voting for Members of this House, no one will think of disturbing that settlement or will attempt to curtail those privileges. It is, therefore, with the utmost confidence that I look forward to the renewal of a measure carrying these principles into effect. I do not wish now to do more than to ask my hon. Friend (Mr. Mackinnon) to withdraw his Motion, and when that step shall have been taken I shall move the discharge of the Order for going into Committee.

I

[Third Night

Lord John Russell

MR. MACKINNON: In answer to the application made to me by the noble Lord I can only say that I congratulate him, I congratulate the House, and I congratulate the country on the step he has taken. I look upon the proposal of my noble Friend as a very satisfactory settlement of this question; and I trust that the powerful mind and ample talents of the noble Lord will find ample occupation in conducting our diplomatic relations, in settling the affairs of Europe, and in promoting the prosperity of this country and of the world at large—better occupied than if this House had sat night after night till two o'clock in the morning, haggling about this question of the franchise. I will take the liberty of saying that, though with the feelings of Englishmen in general, the Members of this House may cordially enter into any question which they take up, and may vigorously defend their opinions on one side or the other, yet, when the contest is over, they will, I trust, as Englishmen, sink all remembrance of differences, and show themselves anxious to promote the business of the country by putting their shoulders to the wheel, and making up for the great loss of time which has been incurred by the discussions on this measure. Under the circumstances it is with great satisfaction that I withdraw the Motion of which I have given notice.

MR. DISRAELI:—Sir, I think Her Majesty's Government have taken a wise and not undignified course. It is much better, under the circumstances in which the House finds itself with regard to the progress of public business, that the Government should at once have made up their mind as to the course which they are to adopt, rather than have allowed this Bill to go into Committee, to waste more time, without any prospect of coming to a satisfactory result, preventing what I think we shall now find ourselves able to accomplish—the carrying on the business of the House with great effect and great unanimity on both sides. I should not have wished for a moment to touch on the subject of the Bill now about to be withdrawn; but the noble Lord made an allusion, which I hardly like to pass without comment. The noble Lord, referring—as is his custom on such occasions—to the pedigree of progress, seemed to intimate that on this side of the House there could be no authentic claim to assist in it. But I beg the noble Lord and the House to remember that this Bill is withdrawn, not from any successful opposition, or from any opposition of any kind that has been offered to the real and bond fide Amendment of the representation of the people of England. This Bill has not advanced, because, unfortunately for the Government, they were this year encumbered with a great mass of public business of a character which rendered it utterly impossible, with any support, to have carried a Bill of this kind through the House. And as there have been complaints on both sides of the causes of delay, I may be permitted to observe that the real cause of this delay is, in fact, that the Government have undertaken other questions of such importance, of such magnitude, and encumbered with such details, that it was physically and morally impossible for them to carry the measure which they have now so wisely withdrawn. In the heat of debate imputations are sometimes made on both sides of the House without sufficient grounds; but I am persuaded that I am now speaking what is literally the state of the case, when I say that the Government have withdrawn this Bill because it is impossible for them to carry on the necessary and urgent business of the country with this measure still under our notice. The delays and impediments to the Bill have arisen from the Government having other engagements which rendered progress with the measure impossible. I am not now expressing any opinion as to the policy of the measure—I do not think this is the occasion on which to enter into any discussion of the kind—but in reference to the general principles laid down by the noble Lord the Member for the City of London as to the necessity of the representation being extended in a certain degree to the working classes, I beg to remind the noble Lord this really has not been the question of controversy. The question of controversy has been as to the means and method of effecting that exten-

for the army and navy should be granted to the Crown, and at a very early period of the Session we brought forward measures with that object, which were not only of the utmost importance, but likewise of the greatest urgency. We had thought it our duty to conclude a commercial treaty with France, and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the name of the Government, proposed various measures connected with that treaty largely affecting the finances of the country. According to all the views that have been usually entertained by the most competent authorities under any Government it would not have been right to postpone for an indefinite time questions of taxation and of duties of so important a character as those to which I refer. For the sake of the trade and industry of the country, and for the maintenance of the financial stability of the State, it was necessary to proceed with those measures without delay. They occupied a very considerable time; and I therefore felt myself compelled to postpone to as late a period as after Whitsuntide the proposal that we should go into Committee on this Bill. There are other questions with regard to the usual Supplies of the year which remain to be settled; the Army Votes, or many of them, are not at present agreed to. The whole of the Civil Service Estimates have likewise to be taken; and, though it be reasonable and necessary to ask for a Vote on account of them, it would not be reasonable to postpone beyond a very limited time—say the early part of July—the discussion on those Estimates. These questions would again have impeded the progress of the Bill, and would have made it necessary for us to ask for frequent delays. But, Sir, there is a subject, with regard to which I must say a few words further to the House, and that is as to the nature of the Bill which we have proposed. I do not now intend to discuss those matters which are merely points of detail, but I think it is necessary to state that the Government were persuaded, and are persuaded, that the reduction of the borough franchise is required for the future safety of the State and for the improvement of our representative system. Many years ago, when I had to consider this question, Mr. Hume, who was then a Member of this House, and who from the first day that the Reform Bill passed in 1831 always told me what he intended to do, urged, among various other arguments, that six out of every seven of the male adults of this country were excluded from the franchise; and that among those who were so excluded were men whose intelligence and probity would fully entitle them to the enjoyment of that privilege. I will own that his arguments on that occasion made a great impression on my mind, and induced me to set on foot inquiries and to send persons into the country to ask who were excluded, and to ascertain the character of those working men who did not possess the franchise. The result of those inquiries convinced me that there were many of those men whose intelligence and integrity qualified them for the exercise of the right of voting. But if that be the case, then their exclusion—their continued exclusion, their perpetual exclusion—must weaken, while their admission cannot fail to strengthen the basis on which our representative institutions rest. I am not speaking now of any particular franchise; but I am persuaded more than ever I was before that there are great numbers of persons who would exercise that franchise well and worthily, and that if they were admitted the result would be favourable to the maintenance and increased vigour of our institutions. It is, therefore, our intention at the earliest period which may be in our power to introduce a Bill containing provisions for the reduction of the franchise. Nor, Sir, am I discouraged by seeing that more than once measures of this kind have been obliged to be postponed; for I have remarked that, while proposals for the advancement of Liberal principles in conformity with the opinions entertained by the majority of this House have been frequently delayed, yet the result has been that when once they have obtained the assent of Parliament they have remained permanently enrolled among the statutes of the realm, and become permanent institutions of the country. For a long time the sacramental test was required as a qualification for office. No one would now think of proposing that test. For a long time Roman Catholics were excluded from this House and from office by old penal enactments. Nobody would now think of excluding them on those grounds. Reform itself was for a long time opposed, and successfully opposed, in this House; but nobody would now contemplate the restoration of the boroughs which were disfranchised in 1831 and 1832. And in the same way I am convinced that, when a measure has passed this House enlarging the franchise and extending to persons who are qualified to exercise it a participation in the right of voting for Members of this House, no one will think of disturbing that settlement or will attempt to curtail those privileges. It is, therefore, with the utmost confidence that I look forward to the renewal of a measure carrying these principles into effect. I do not wish now to do more than to ask my hon. Friend (Mr. Mackinnon) to withdraw his Motion, and when that step shall have been taken I shall move the discharge of the Order for going into Committee.

MR. MACKINNON: In answer to the application made to me by the noble Lord I can only say that I congratulate him, I congratulate the House, and I congratulate the country on the step he has taken. I look upon the proposal of my noble Friend as a very satisfactory settlement of this question; and I trust that the powerful mind and ample talents of the noble Lord will find ample occupation in conducting our diplomatic relations, in settling the affairs of Europe, and in promoting the prosperity of this country and of the world at large—better occupied than if this House had sat night after night till two o'clock in the morning, haggling about this question of the franchise. I will take the liberty of saying that, though with the feelings of Englishmen in general, the Members of this House may cordially enter into any question which they take up, and may vigorously defend their opinions on one side or the other, yet, when the contest is over, they will, I trust, as Englishmen, sink all remembrance of differences, and show themselves anxious to promote the business of the country by putting their shoulders to the wheel, and making up for the great loss of time which has been incurred by the discussions on this measure. Under the circumstances it is with great satisfaction that I withdraw the Motion of which I have given notice.

MR. DISRAELI:—Sir, I think Her Majesty's Government have taken a wise and not undignified course. It is much better, under the circumstances in which the House finds itself with regard to the progress of public business, that the Government should at once have made up their mind as to the course which they are to adopt, rather than have allowed this Bill to go into Committee, to waste more time, without any prospect of coming to a satisfactory result, preventing what I think we shall now find ourselves able to accomplish—the carrying on the business of the

Lord John Russell

House with great effect and great unanimity on both sides. I should not have wished for a moment to touch on the subject of the Bill now about to be withdrawn; but the noble Lord made an allusion, which I hardly like to pass without comment. The noble Lord, referring—as is his custom on such occasions—to the pedigree of progress, seemed to intimate that on this side of the House there could be no authentic claim to assist in it. But I beg the noble Lord and the House to remember that this Bill is withdrawn, not from any successful opposition, or from any opposition of any kind that has been offered to the real and bona fide Amendment of the representation of the people of England. This Bill has not advanced, because, unfortunately for the Government, they were this year encumbered with a great mass of public business of a character which rendered it utterly impossible, with any support, to have carried a Bill of this kind through the House. And as there have been complaints on both sides of the causes of delay, I may be permitted to observe that the real cause of this delay is, in fact, that the Government have undertaken other questions of such importance, of such magnitude, and encumbered with such details, that it was physically and morally impossible for them to carry the measure which they have now so wisely withdrawn. In the heat of debate imputations are sometimes made on both sides of the House without sufficient grounds; but I am persuaded that I am now speaking what is literally the state of the case, when I say that the Government have withdrawn this Bill because it is impossible for them to carry on the necessary and urgent business of the country with this measure still under our notice. The delays and impediments to the Bill have arisen from the Government having other engagements which rendered progress with the measure impossible. I am not now expressing any opinion as to the policy of the measure—I do not think this is the occasion on which to enter into any discussion of the kind—but in reference to the general principles laid down by the noble Lord the Member for the City of London as to the necessity of the representation being extended in a certain degree to the working classes, I beg to remind the noble Lord this really has not been the question of controversy. The question of controversy has been as to the means and method of effecting that extension. And, so far as I can read public opinion and watch the progress of intellectual investigation on this subject, I cannot help thinking that before this House can ever be called on again to consider it, it will be found that there are more satisfactory modes of effecting that important object than by what I venture to call the coarse expedient of a degradation of the franchise. I would, therefore, state, on the part of Gentlemen on this side of the House, why we receive with perfect approbation the course which Her Majesty's Government has taken in regard to this measure. We recognize that in taking that course they have acted in a spirit of honour and propriety to the House. We give them credit for this, that in the course they have taken they have acted with a sincere desire for the public welfare and the advancement of the public interest. And I can assure Her Majesty's Government that they will receive from us every assistance in the prosecution of the public business which is now so urgent, and to which they have sacrificed—and especially the noble Lord at the head of Foreign Affairs—objects which were dear, and no doubt honourably dear, to them. I would now sit down had it not been my duty to ask the House for a moment to consider a personal question. If it had concerned myself solely, I should not have taken this opportunity of alluding to it; but it concerns the feelings of an hon. Gentleman, a Member of this House, and it relates also a subject which must be interesting to every Member of the House; and that is, the relation between the House generally and the individual who may from time to time be responsible for the chief conduct of its business. The other night, in the course of a debate, the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) made a statement, containing no matter offensive to myself, but he said, that after the last general election, I entered into a compact with some hon. Gentleman on this side of the House that I would introduce a Bill for the Reform of Parliament, including a £10 franchise for counties and a £6 franchise for boroughs. That statement was very freely circulated, but like many other statements I had not thought it necessary particularly to notice it. But as the hon. Member for Birmingham was then about to found an argument on it, I thought I would take the liberty, which I do not often take, of interrupting a speaker. I thought it was as much for his convenience as for myself and for the rest of the House, and inform him at once that he was under a complete misapprehension. It appears that the hon. Member for Birmingham afterwards mentioned the name of an hon. Member of this House—the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay), who was not then present, and that hon. Gentleman is under an impression that I stated that I had not been in communication with him on the subject, and that the statements to that effect which had been circulated were utterly unfounded. I should be glad at all times to remove a painful and unfounded impression from an hon. Gentleman's mind, but I hope the House will not consider it impertinent on my part, as this probably is the last evening we shall, for some time at least, speak on this subject of Parliamentary Reform, if for a few moments I touch briefly on this topic. The subject concerns the relations between the House generally and that individual who may be responsible for the chief conduct of its business. Now, when I had the honour of leading the business of this House, I considered that my time was at the service of any Gentleman on either side of the House, with reference to the conduct of business in this House, or with reference to any business that might concern his constituents; and I see many Gentlemen on the benches opposite who have communicated with me on those subjects, and I trust that they always received from me every attention and assistance in my power. Well, Sir, I received a letter, among others, requesting an interview, from the hon. Gentleman who now represents the port of Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay). He immediately had an appointment. The appointment was not a secret appointment. The hon. Gentleman came to me at Downing Street on a subject of the greatest importance. It referred to the war commenced between France and Austria, and to the important question of what was contraband of war. I gave the hon. Gentleman all the information and advice I could, and pointed out to him the means by which he could obtain assistance from the other Departments. Now it so happened that on that occasion a newspaper was lying on my table, which contained the official announcement—official I mean, in the Opposition sense—that a vote of want of confidence was about to be proposed against Her Majesty's then Government, on the ground that they were going to throw over the question of Parliamentary Reform, and that it must be a point with all sincere Reformers to insist that a measure be brought forward immediately. The hon. Gentleman called my attention to this paragraph, which he had observed before; and he said for his part he did not agree with it, and that he did not believe that a vote of want of confidence was at all one that the House would sanction. He spoke to me—I cannot say it was a confidential interview—it involved just that degree of discretion and reserve which prevents a conversation on business from degenerating into gossip. I spoke to the hon. Gentleman as I speak to hon. Gentlemen every day in my life, when I meet them in the lobby, and I trust that that sort of free intercourse will always exist in this House, and that it will not be merely in theory that we are an assemblage of Gentlemen, but in practice also. I said to the hon. Gentleman, “If they mean that they are going to introduce a vote of want of confidence unless we bring forward a Reform Bill immediately, you may rely upon it we are not going to introduce a Reform measure immediately; but neither are we going to throw over the question of Reform.” On a subsequent occasion the hon. Gentleman said to me, “I can assure you there is a feeling of great dissatisfaction on the part of many independent Members of the House, and if you will only repeat to me that you are not going to throw overboard the Reform question, but intend to deal with it bonâ fide, it would have a great effect on public opinion.” And I then said, “It is totally impossible for me, or any Minister of the Crown, in private, to say what will be the policy of the Government; what that policy will be will be stated in Parliament, and in no other place. But you may rely upon it we shall not bring forward a Reform Bill this year; that we are not going to throw overboard the question, that we shall endeavour to deal with the question in a satisfactory manner. But so far as a general course is concerned, you may take it for granted that, before the Vote is taken, I, as the organ of the Government, shall generally describe our policy, and therefore no persons will be able to pretend that they are ignorant on the subject.” And there the matter ended. I believe the hon. Gentleman the Member for Sunderland had confidence in what I stated; I believe that he wished the Government to remain in office, and I cannot see what imputation there is on his honour in his having entertained that wish. While we were in office, though he voted for the Amendment of the noble Lord (Lord John Russell), yet he had been amongst those of the Liberal party on whose generous support I had been accustomed to rely. I have no hesitation in saying that the conduct of the hon. Member for Sunderland was perfectly Parliamentary, honourable, and straightforward. I mentioned that in a letter when the hon. Member was unjustly attacked last year.—That letter was seen only by a very few persons,—and as the matter has been brought before the notice of Parliament with so much misapprehension, I thought I would take this opportunity of saying these few words on the subject in order to set the matter right. I take it for granted that the feeling which influences the House is that which influences myself, and that it has no desire to place any barrier on that frank communication which ought to be permitted at all times between the leader of this House and its other Members on whatever side they may sit, or sanction as a rule that a leader, in receiving those opposed to him, should treat them with the utmost reserve. I have now placed fairly and frankly before you the real state of the case, and I think hon. Members will be of opinion that the course which I took in the matter I was justified in adopting, and that no imputation rests on the hon. Gentleman to whom I allude, for the share which he has had in the transaction.

[Third Night.

Mr. Disraeli

MR. BRIGHT :—Sir, the right hon. Gentleman has thought it right to refer to a matter which I mentioned in a speech the other night; but the House, I think, will remember that I did not introduce that topic for the purpose of attacking the right hon. Gentleman in regard to it. My object was to show that the course of the right hon. Gentleman when he was a Minister of the Crown, and up to the time of his resignation of office, was in favour, according to his own language, of a large extension of the suffrage. He said that the Bill which he brought forward would introduce 500,000 new voters; and he afterwards said he would go even further than his Bill. Then I said it was understood that he had intimated to a Gentleman on this side of the House that he was willing to go as far as, in fact, the terms of the measure, the withdrawal of which we are now engaged in discussing, and I quoted from a speech of an hon. Gentleman of this House. In alluding to the subject,

I made no charge against the right hon. Gentleman at all; but I was simply endeavouring to show how consistent he had been up to a certain time in his views upon this question, and I can only lament that his conduct in the present Session has not been equally consistent. But leaving this, which after all is, perhaps, of not very great importance, I will, with the permission of the House, proceed to say a few words in reference to the announcement which has this evening been made by the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs—an announcement which probably has not taken all the House by surprise, and which will be received with very different feelings in different quarters of the House. Down here, I believe, and I hope in some other parts, it has been received with great regret. I do not rise, however, for the purpose of blaming the noble Lord for the course he has taken, or of complaining of the Government for the decision at which they have arrived in this matter; because I know very well that this House is not the best place in the world for getting through business, and especially if the business be one which one-half the House do not at all like. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) tells us to be oblivious of all that has been done during the past few weeks. He tells us that he and his friends have not offered any opposition to the passing of this Bill. Now, that, it seems to me, is a somewhat daring statement, considering what we have all heard and seen take place within these walls on the subject. The right hon. Gentleman and his party have, no doubt, exhibited no small degree of adroitness in the course which they have pursued with reference to the Bill; but there has been opposition upon their part to it nevertheless. It was, if I am not mistaken, a Member of the party opposite who first placed the notice on the paper with regard to the Census, with a view to get rid of the Bill. Afterwards, I admit, the hon. Member for Rye (Mr. Mackinnon)—who sits on this side, and who did not like to be defrauded of the privilege of performing, I will not say an act of wisdom, but an act which, having done something similar thirty years ago, he thought it right to be unwise enough to repeat—placed on the paper a notice to the same effect. The hon. Member for Berwick (Captain Gordon) was consequently hustled—I had almost said bullied, but that is not a proper word to be applied to him—or cajoled, or coaxed into withdrawing his Motion. ["No, no!"] I think I am right in saying that the hon. Gentleman's Motion stood first; but it was in some way managed that the Amendment with respect to the taking of the Census should be brought forward by the hon. Member for Rye. Then hon. Gentlemen opposite came with all their forces to his support, and having done all the mischief they could, they now turn round and say, "This is not our work, but that of an hon. Gentleman on the Ministerial side of the House." Now, I should wish hon. Gentlemen to bear in mind that the hon. Member for Rye has never carried anything in this House up to the present moment. We recollect, indeed, that he took an active part in a discussion about opaque smoke some few years ago, but nothing came of it, and I am not sure that there was not a pretty general opinion in the House, when the hon. Gentleman put himself forward to oppose the present Bill, that the circumstance did add somewhat to the prospects of the measure passing into a law. But, to return to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks. I cannot help feeling that he imagines we must have forgotten what has taken place with reference to this question of Reform. He says the noble Lord spoke about the working classes, and extending the suffrage to them; and then he says, "I hold precisely the same views as those entertained by the noble Lord the Member for London as to the expediency of extending the franchise to the working classes; but then I do not wish to do it by means of the coarse and vulgar method of lowering the franchise to the scale of a £6 rental. I should propose some other mode of effecting what I admit to be a desirable object." The public, however, will judge whether the right hon. Gentleman and his friends are in earnest from the fact that from them, and certainly not from the supporters of the Bill, have proceeded those grievous, and unjust, and unfounded charges which have been made during the progress of these discussions against that portion of the population living in houses whose value is below £10. Notwithstanding, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman would have us believe that he stands on a par in regard to this question of Reform with the noble Lord the Member for London, we must come to the conclusion—a conclusion at which I am sure the public out of doors will also arrive—that there exists a wide gulf between the noble Lord, who expresses confidence in the working classes, and the right hon. Gentleman and his followers, who contend that they represent poverty and passion, and that to hand over power to them would be to subject ourselves to the control of debauchery and crime. Now, I suppose as it is with the tree, the orchard, or the field, so it is with legislation, and that we must not expect more than a given harvest in a given season. It may be, also, that in this season we have shaken off all the fruit we can gather, and that we must rest satisfied with the things which we have accomplished. Looking back on the course of the Session—and I wish to say this because I think there are those out of doors who will be greatly dissatisfied with the announcement which has been made to-night, and many persons within the House who may be disposed to assail the Government for having made it—it will, I am sure, at once be admitted by every impartial person that it has not been a Session barren of results. It must not at the same time be supposed that I am not dissatisfied also with what has taken place this evening. I lament it as much as anybody; for there is, I believe, no one in this House who has given so much time of late years to this question, and I hoped—you may think, if you like, with a too ardent enthusiasm—that something might be done this year towards its settlement. To-night, therefore, when this hope is blighted, I have a right to say that I deplore as much as any man the adoption of the course which the Government have deemed it to be their duty to take. And if I do not assail them for having pursued that course it is simply because I feel it would be unjust to make an attack upon them for that for which they are not, in my opinion, entirely responsible, and to denounce them for not having accomplished an object which any other dozen Members in this House would find it equally difficult to attain. I was, however, observing that the present Session cannot be regarded as having produced no fruit. It has seen 400 obstacles to the free development of our industry, which at its commencement existed, struck out of the pages of the tariff. So important an event would, if it had taken place only a few years ago, have been sufficient in itself to mark a Session as one in which much had been achieved, and almost to immortalize the reputation of a Minister. But we have had some more work done: we have had a Treaty concluded with France—which no doubt hon. Gentlemen opposite will tell us by and by they never said a syllable against—which those who observe what is passing cannot fail to perceive there have been steady endeavours on the part of some persons in this House, and by some in “another place,” and by one influential organ at least of the public press to disparage; it being contended that there is no good faith to be expected with respect to the mode in which it is to be carried out on the part of France; that everything connected with it has been a series of blunders, and that all that enthusiasm which found expression, both in the House and in the country, with respect to it at the opening of the Session has been entirely thrown away. Now, I would beg to refer those who advance such opinions to the authority of Gentlemen who have recently returned from Paris—I could refer them even to higher authority—to show that nothing can exceed the good faith of the French Government in their endeavour to carry into effect the purposes for which the Treaty was framed. I have the best reason for believing that the duties fixed on under its operation will be below the maximum stated in the instrument itself; and I am assured on the authority of one than whom there is nobody more competent to form a reliable opinion on the point, that the necessary details being settled the result of the Treaty will, in all probability, be such as to exceed the sanguine expectations with which it was at the outset of the Session received. But, passing from the question of the Treaty—I should like to know whether hon. Gentlemen opposite are disposed to consider the occurrence of this evening a triumph or not. I do not think it appears to have excited among them much exultation. There are many of them who in all probability would prefer that this Bill had been fairly discussed, and its main provisions passed into a law. I believe that there are very few of them who have been much affected by the exaggerated statements which have been made with respect to the terrible consequences which it is said to be calculated to entail, and I suspect that between this and next winter the great majority will have learned to regret that a measure so moderate has not found its way into the statute book. The Bill is, I contend, one of a very moderate and a very reasonable character, and when you who sit on the benches opposite heard it introduced you were of the same opinion. I will undertake to say that you have been emboldened in your opposition to it mainly by the conduct of a few hon. Members on this side of the House. Now, I am told there are Gentlemen sitting on these benches who think the time is come when we ought to have what is called "a sound Whig Government;" that what they regard as the "foreign element" should be got rid of—meaning, of course, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade. Well, I may perhaps be permitted to give hon. Gentlemen who entertain those views a piece of information, and it this,—that that which they call "a sound Whig Government" modelled after the old fashion, is just as much a thing of the past as the dodo. You may say there are some remains of it, as Professor Owen knows something of the head and foot of a dodo, and what it was like; but in my opinion, you will never see that sort of Government again in this country. But if we are to sit on one side, calling ourselves the Liberal party, the sooner, I think, we get rid of these old party distinctions the better, and endeavour in the conduct of affairs in Parliament, in connection with our principles, to act rather a more unanimous part, and act in a more ingenuous, a more open and a fairer manner to the Government than has been done this Session by some calling themselves followers of the Whig party. I say, then, although hon. Gentlemen opposite do not appear to exult, I think I have reason to exult that this Bill has been withdrawn, rather than it should have gone into Committee to be mangled so that its authors would hardly have known it, to settle this question in a manner that would render it of no advantage to the country. I have said over and over again that it was not worth while to deal with this question, unless you do so much as will make a substantial change in a direction which so many of your countrymen wish, and such as shall be felt to leave one without any strong excuse for asking you at an early period to proceed further. That is my policy with regard to this question. I think it a wise policy. I am, therefore, glad that the Government propose to withdraw the Bill, rather than go into Committee and submit the £6 franchise to be made into an £8 franchise, which would have been one of the most childish, and, to the great body of the working classes, to whom you are making some advances, one of the most pernicious and insulting measures Parliament could possibly adopt. The noble Lord the Member for the City has referred to questions coming on; there is one question to which he has not referred, and that is the one which affects the conduct of this House with regard to its control over the taxation of the country. Now, I hope, if the House of Commons determines that this Session it will have no measure of Reform for itself, that, at least, it will not allow anything to be done that shall impair its powers and alter its inherent right over the taxation and finances of this kingdom. I hope that, if we are about to shut out the people, we shall not, at the same time, consent to let in the Peers. I hope the course you take with regard to this Bill of Reform is not an indication that you are willing, in any degree, to let down the character and power of this House with regard to those questions on which the public have looked up to us for generations and centuries more anxiously than to either of the other branches of the State. The noble Lord, as I understand, has given a pledge that at an early period—whether in November or in February—at the first time Parliament shall meet, the Government of which he is a Member will again introduce a Bill with a view to amend the Representation of the People. Now, I am of opinion that this determination and the measures of this Session and the discussion which has taken place on this question will throughout the country produce much healthy action. I hope that during the winter—between this time and the time when we shall meet again—such of us as may meet again—that there will be expressed throughout the country a firm and wise opinion with regard to the course Parliament should take in the coming Session. Why should not hon. Gentlemen opposite entertain more liberal views? [A laugh.] An hon. Gentleman near the gangway laughs. If this were the time I could easily show him that all the legislation of which we have reason to be proud—during his lifetime and mine—has been legislation according to what we term Liberal views—has been opposed by the party with which he is connected—["No, no!"]—has been supported uniformly by the party with which I have been connected. Well, if it be so in the past, why not in the future? We may be as right on these questions as on the previous questions. Look at the condition of our people. That great measure which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has passed this Session—the reform of the tariff—is but a portion of the great work which has been going on for twenty years; and yet I will undertake to say that that great work, completed within twenty years, has done more for the people and poor of England, in giving them the comforts of life and some taste for independence—than all the party contests, party triumphs, bloody wars, extensive conquests, martial renown, and historical glories, you have had for a century past. Now, what I want is this, that the House should always consider the great body of the people. The Peers, the rich, the powerful, can always take care of themselves, and never suffer, unless it may be for a time in great political convulsions, which we all hope may never again visit our country. Look at the condition of the great body of the people—their intelligence, their morality, their independence—and you find written in characters which you cannot mistake the real truth with regard to the Government under which they have lived. I say, then, that the course which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has taken is one laden with blessings to the great body of the people; and if the House of Commons would at the same time, whilst so much good physically was being conferred upon them—if in the same Session it could have shown its confidence in them by offering them this moderate extension of the suffrage which the noble Lord proposed—I think it would have been said in after times that there had been no Session of the Parliament of England comparable to that of 1860 for the good it had given the people and for the binding effect which its legislation had had between the great body of the people and the three estates of the realm.

[Third Night.]

Mr. Bright

[Third Night.]

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that the proposition of the noble Lord to withdraw the Bill was a wise and judicious one, inasmuch as it was impossible that it should be passed this Session. But with regard to the Treaty with France, the hon. Member for Birmingham would excuse him if, when he talked of the blessings which that treaty had conferred on the working classes, he (Mr. Newdegate) reminded him that in a large district of the county which he had the honour to represent, the people were suffering the deepest distress in consequence of that treaty. There were at the present moment 10,000 people out of employment in Coventry alone; and he should have thought that Coventry was not so very far from Birmingham that the hon. Member could be ignorant of that fact. The hon. Member had referred to favourable prognostications, and communications which he had received from France on the subject of the treaty; but he (Mr. Newdegate) did not share the bright anticipations of the hon. Member as to the result of the negotiations. He also had had communications, which informed him that the stipulations with respect to the treaty were such that the Government of France could not in justice to the expectations of the people of France reduce the duties to such a point as would allow a competition on the part of the English silk trade in the markets of France with a fair chance of an adequate profit. With regard to the Reform Bill, he entirely approved of the course which had been taken by the hon. Member on the side of the House on which he sat in not dividing against the second reading of the Bill, but in subjecting its provisions to a sifting debate. He was in favour of Reform, or rather a re-adjustment. But he (Mr. Newdegate) did not stand committed to the details of the Bill, notwithstanding his respect for the high character of the noble Lord who proposed it. He wished to take this opportunity of stating to the House that he had found from further inquiry that he had been misled as to the returns which purported to give the increase that the reduction of the qualification for county voters from £50 to £10 would effect. He would not trouble the House by stating how he had been misled, but would beg hon. Members to understand that the details of the calculation as to the increase of county voters by the operation of the Bill which he used on a former occasion were incorrect; but he begged the House also to understand that the further statement, which he made on the occasion to which he referred, showing the gross disproportion between the representation of the majority of the people who lived in the counties (that is, beyond the limits of the boroughs), as compared with the representation allotted to the borough population under the present state of the law, was, and is, perfectly accurate. He would shortly state the main objection which he entertained to the Bill. If the county franchise were to be reduced to £10, and the county constituencies were thus placed in the position which the borough constituencies now occupied, he insisted on a larger allocation of Members to the counties. The hon. Member for Birmingham had said that the proposal for the better equalization of the representation was of a democratic character, and then, oddly enough, he had declared that the House of Lords represented the counties of England; but the hon. Member seemed quite taken aback when the House of Lords took him at his word, and, in some degree, exercised that right of representation in the matter of taxation. Who now so furious as the hon. Member? What did this show but a determination on his part to keep the majority of the people inadequately represented? The hon. Member for Birmingham taunted the hon. Member for Rye (Mr. Mackinnon) that he had never carried a measure in this House. But the hon. Member for Rye had never proposed a Reform Bill, circulated it through the country, prepared maps and plans in explanation of it, and, after all, feared to submit it to the consideration of the House. And why did the hon. Member (Mr. Bright) fear? Because he sought to perpetuate that inequality of representation between the counties and boroughs which was established by the Reform Bill of 1832—because he rather sought to aggravate that inequality, that he might strengthen the party he had already formed in this House. The hon. Member lately stated in the country this palpable truth, that the Reform Bill had admitted 100 Members to the House, of whom he was the leader, and through whom he managed to exercise the patronage of the Crown in the appointment of Her Majesty's Ministers. They had had an instance to-night of his dictatorial tone; to-night he had declared that the Government must retain its present form or perish. His belief was that the hon. Gentleman did not regret the withdrawal of this Bill, because he saw that if they had gone into Committee, the question would have been raised which the hon. Member sought to avoid, whether it was not just and constitutional, whether it was not in accordance with the Republican elements in our Constitution, that the majority of the population of the country—the people of the counties—should not have a larger representation than 129, while the minority had the unreasonable number of 354. His object in rising now was to call the attention of the House to this subject, and to declare that if the county franchise were reduced on any future occasion, he would never rest satisfied till that inadequacy were amended.

Mr. Bright

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, that the hapless offspring of the noble Lord the Member for London having been so peacefully consigned to its last resting-place, he hardly liked to interpose for a moment upon the harmony of the funeral party. He must, however, say that the speech of the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire, though tinged with the most charming touch of satire, contrasted gracefully and strongly with the speech delivered by the noble Lord at the head of the Government on the occasion of the debate on the Resolution which led to the defeat of the Reform Bill introduced by the late Ministry. On that occasion the noble Lord declared that the then Government should neither withdraw their Reform Bill nor should they resign; but that, to use a sporting metaphor, they were bound to go on with their measure, having taken office "with all its engagements." The right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire, on the other hand, respectfully leant over the grave of the departed, and paid "the tribute of a passing tear." If that Bill ever required an epitaph there were two lines among the Elegant Extracts familiar to his boyhood, which would forcibly illustrate its unhappy fate:—

"If so soon as this I'm done for,
I wonders what I was begun for."

That would form a very apt inscription In Memoriam of the innocent whose existence had been so chequered and so brief. The noble Lord was warned early in the Session by the right hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman), that delay in the introduction of the measure would lead to the result which had just been witnessed. Her Majesty's Government had incurred a very serious responsibility by the withdrawal of the Bill. It was brought forward in such an incomplete shape as to be the mere skeleton of a great constitutional measure, and it was not fair to charge the Opposition with obstructing its progress because they had given notice of many proposals that would have been real amendments. He himself asked, on the introduction of the Bill, whether it was intended to accompany the Bill with any system of registration; and the cold, bureaucratic, Whigocratic answer he received from the Home Secretary was that "at the proper time Her Majesty's Government would introduce some measure for establishing a mode of registration." He had felt sure the measure could not pass from the want of such a provision; and, although the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had accused the hon. Member for Ayrshire

[Third Night.

(Sir James Fergusson) of ignorance of constitutional law; it was nevertheless the fact that if the Bill had passed in August there could have been no election till the year 1862. And if, from circumstances over which nobody could have control, a dissolution had happened in the Spring, it would have turned out that twenty-five seats would have been disfranchised by the measure, and they would have had a Parliament without a single Member to fill the new seats. He did not accuse the Government of insincerity, but they had certainly failed to provide the requisite constitutional machinery for the passing of a Reform Bill this Session. That was not the case in the Bill introduced by the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire. That Bill, as he (Mr. James) formerly pointed out, very properly contained clauses for effecting the registration of the new constituencies in the event of a dissolution following on the passing of his measure. The Government, however, took no notice of that suggestion, and when he and others called their attention to it, sneered at it—he did not mean uncourtously. Members of the Opposition had been charged with delay because they had supported the Motion for deferring the measure until the new Census had been taken; but the question of the Census had been made a material element in regard to the disfranchisement of seats, because the noble Lord, instead of adopting the number of electors for his basis, as he did in his measures of 1852 and 1854, had taken the basis of population. The noble Lord the Member for the City had accused him of making statements on the subject of population that were “ludicrous.” If they were ludicrous, why had not some Member of the Government endeavoured to contradict them? The Bill of the noble Lord was unworthy of the name, when he left Salford, with its 7,000 or 8,000 electors, in no better position in the representative system than insignificant places like Calne or Portarlington. Such a proposal had no pretensions to be deemed a real reform. He repeated that the Government had incurred a serious responsibility by withdrawing their Bill. If they had not shown an apathy and indifference which discouraged those who had wished to assist them, and among that number he included himself, the Bill might have been put into a more satisfactory shape and carried. But the responsibility of withdrawing it now rested with the Government.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH thought that hitherto the question of Parliamentary Reform had not been treated in a general and comprehensive manner. It had been made the mere battledore of party. All that the noble Lord said of his measure was, that it was the best that he believed he would be able to pass. That was, perhaps, a practical consideration with a Ministry; but in dealing with a great constitutional question it was one that was almost worthless and contemptible. Possibly there never had been at any former period so favourable an opportunity of dealing with the question as the present; but the inconsistencies of the various plans which the noble Lord had from time to time proposed had shaken the confidence of the House in his guidance on such a subject. The noble Lord had repeatedly shifted his ground. In 1852 he introduced a Bill formed on very different principles from those which he adopted in 1832. In 1832 he proposed a large disfranchisement; in 1852 he announced that wholesale disfranchisement formed no part of the principle of his Bill, but that he would transfer the franchise, whenever corruption was proved, to another constituency; and now in 1860 he adopted a principle of partial disfranchisement. If the principle of 1852 was good, how was it that the noble Lord abandoned it in 1854, and how was it on the other hand, that the great authority upon reform, who introduced a large and comprehensive measure of disfranchisement in 1854, could ask the confidence of the House and country when he produced a measure so limited and scanty as that which was now to be withdrawn? He did not indeed see that the present Bill proceeded upon any intelligible principle whatever—the extension of the suffrage was framed on a system that was utterly arbitrary, and yet at the same time no principle had been laid down which should prevent a further unlimited demand for a fresh extension at a future period. For his own part, he held that there was no ground for depriving England of any portion of her representation in order to confer it on Ireland or Scotland. There were, no doubt, anomalies in our representative system, but no one, he presumed, would venture to assert that the House did not fairly represent the intelligence of the people. He did not believe that there was any section of public opinion which failed to obtain representation in the House, in one way or another. If they once conceded any merely arbitrary reduction of the franchise, it would be difficult to say where they would be able to stop. Just as the £6 and £7-pounders were jealous of those within the present pale of the franchise, so would they, if admitted as voters, in turn excite the jealousy of the £4 and £5-pounders, who would still be excluded. He took it for granted that the public professions of the House were contradicted by the private judgment and experience of every man in it. They did not in practice prefer the lowest classes to the higher classes. If they wished for any judgment or opinion, on any affairs, public or private, they would prefer that of an educated and superior class. If, therefore, they wished to extend the franchise to the lowest classes, they must do so on some certain principle and with some limit, while at the same time, they gave compensation to the higher classes for that extension. Such a principle would not be difficult to find, it was embodied in an Amendment he had put upon the Notice Paper, which was that of the Poor Law franchise, namely, to give a plurality of votes in proportion to the property and intelligence of the constituents. He believed that if the Government adopted that principle they would find less difficulty in settling the question than they had experienced on this and other occasions. He assented to the lowering the franchise in counties, and he should on some future occasion either propose or support a £20 qualification.

Mr. Edwin James

LORD FERMOY said, that in the very few sentences which he wished to address to the House he should not attempt to follow the previous speaker, nor should he follow the right hon. Gentleman, the leader of the Opposition, upon the question between himself and the hon. Member for Sunderland; nor did he mean to follow the hon. Member for Birmingham in his discussion of the sincerity of the Emperor of the French, the advantages of the French treaty, and the merits of the Budget which had been altered in "another place;" but should confine his observations to the immediate question before the House—the bold and bare announcement of the noble Lord that he was about to withdraw the Reform Bill. The character of public men and political parties ought to be dear to every Member of the House, and he must say he heard the announcement which had been made that evening with feelings of disappointment—nay, with feelings of dismay, because if ever there was a Government, and if ever there was a House of Commons, whose sole and only mission appeared to be to carry a Reform Bill for England, they were Her Majesty's present Government and the present House of Commons. He had not been able to discern in any of the reasons given by the noble Lord any good and sufficient ground for the withdrawal of the Bill. What had been the history of the Government with regard to this question of Reform? They came into power on the express and clear understanding that they were the only parties in the country who were willing and at the same time able to carry a Reform Bill through that House of Parliament, and that—and that alone—was the ground upon which they entered office. Now, the noble Lord gave as his first reason for withdrawing the Bill the time of the Session at which they had arrived; the next ground was the Chinese war and the necessity of voting the Estimates for carrying it on; then he gave as a reason the state of the national defences; and finally, he wound up by implying—more than by saying—that there was a want of enthusiasm in the country which compelled him to withdraw it. Now, with regard to the late period of the Session, whose fault was it that they had arrived at the month of June without the Bill having got into Committee? Parliament assembled this year much earlier than usual, as they all thought for the express purpose of enabling the Government to carry out their pledge on the subject of Reform, and he, in common with many others, had been led to expect that on the very first day somebody would have announced that it was the noble Lord's intention to bring in the Bill after the lapse of two or three days, or a week at most. But what took place? On the second day, he believed it was, after Parliament met they were told that the Reform Bill was not to be brought in for a month—when the month was up it was postponed for another fortnight—and then it was again postponed that it might be brought in on an auspicious day—that day of fair auspices being the first of March. Here then was a loss of two months—["No, no!"]—well, of at least, six weeks—and by whom was it caused? By the Government. The noble Lord, though he had not actually said it, had implied that the delay was owing to hon. Gentlemen opposite. Now, in candour, he (Lord Fermoy) could not say that any proposal or Amendment had been brought forward by the other side of the House, as a body, which could fairly be characterized as unreasonable on such an important subject. No question could possibly arise that was more likely to give rise to long discussions and important Motions than a Reform Bill, and hon. Gentlemen opposite were perfectly justified in giving notice of questions which they considered of moment in reference to the principle of representation on going into Committee. He must say then, that the House was perfectly free from any charge of wasting time, and the argument of time fell to the ground, when it was remembered that this, which was to have been, par excellence, the Reform Government, had lost six weeks at the commencement of the Session before they even brought in their Bill. Then as to the Chinese war and the defences of the country, he did not see any reason why they should not provide for the Chinese war and the defences of the country, and for a Reform Bill also. At all events, if that was the only reason of the Government for withdrawing the Bill—if, after having got into office as sincere and ardent Reformers, they now swallowed all their pledges in order to discuss the China war and the national defences, he could not help saying that the Chinese Estimates might be as well submitted, and the defences of the country as well provided for by hon. Gentlemen opposite as by those who now filed the Ministerial benches. Again, as to the want of enthusiasm on the part of the country on the subject, the noble Lord had, as he always did on such occasions, favoured the House with sundry chapters of constitutional history, and reminded them that in the several cases of Catholic Emancipation, the Test Act, the Reform Bill, and free trade, and other great measures, when the principle of those measures was once carried by a majority of the House of Commons, they were certain to triumph. But he would ask the noble Lord did those measures triumph by being abandoned by their own promoters?—yet such was the course the noble Lord took in the present instance. How could they expect enthusiasm in the country, when the very men who came into power for the express purpose of carrying forward a Bill for improving the Representation of the People, abandoned it as soon as they experienced the slightest opposition? At the same time, after the speech of the noble Lord on Monday night, he scarcely thought that the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) was acting in the most open and generous manner. The noble Lord on that occasion made a declaration which carried dismay to the minds of many Members of the Liberal party; and when he said let us go into Committee, and endeavour to arrive at some sort of a franchise, the real meaning of which was, "I am not tied to anything: if you won't have a £6 franchise, let us agree to an £8 franchise; but let us adopt the rating test." That was a declaration which carried dismay to the minds of many on that side of the House, but which ought to have induced hon. Gentlemen opposite to go into Committee on the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman said that he and his party were Reformers and sincere Reformers; here, then, was an opportunity of showing it. He would venture to tell the right hon. Gentleman, that he would never again have the chance of getting a Reform Bill that would be so agreeable, or at all events so little disagreeable, to his party, as the present Bill. But the right hon. Gentleman and his friends, instead of accepting the offer of the noble Lord, had refused to go into Committee. If he (Lord Fermoy) were the hon. Member for Birmingham, and desired to agitate the country, he should be delighted that the right hon. Gentleman had refused that offer, and doubly delighted that the noble Lord had now withdrawn the Bill. This was no settlement of the question, notwithstanding what had been stated by the hon. Member for Rye (Mr. Mackinnon), and the right hon. Gentleman opposite. What the people would have received this year with gratitude, they would reject next year with disdain. The party opposite, as well as Members on that side, had admitted Reform in Parliament to be necessary, yet they refused to go into Committee, to determine how far that reform should go; they refused to go into Committee to pledge themselves to a £6, or an £8, or any other franchise; and to say to what extent the Parliamentary institutions of the country required reform.

[Third Night.]

Lord Fermoy

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: Although I was not so fortunate as to collect the tenor of the observations of the hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Darby Griffith), still I gathered from his mournful tone and manner that if he was not a mute he was a sincere mourner on this occasion. At any rate, he gained by contrast with the senior Member for Marylebone (Mr. E. James), for it must be apparent to the House that the hon. and learned Gentleman was somewhat of a merry mourner. The hon. and learned Gentleman, indeed, differing from his noble Colleague in this respect, made no secret that he did not regret the dissolution of this Bill. I, for one, do not agree that any discredit attaches to the noble Lord the Member for London for his conduct in regard to this Bill, and I think the criticisms of the two hon. Members for Marylebone are equally unjust and ungenerous. The noble Lord (Lord Fermoy) it appears was somewhat astonished the other night at the attack of the hon. Member for Buckinghamshire on the noble Lord the Member for the City of London. I was much more astonished to-night to hear the attack of the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone on the noble Lord the Minister for Foreign Affairs; because, if there were a noble Lord in the House from whom that criticism could not have been expected, it was the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone. But different positions oftentimes made different men. But I must say I do not think the House will endorse the opinion of either of the hon. Members for Marylebone. I do not think the noble Lord is responsible for giving up the Bill on this occasion: if responsibility attaches anywhere, it is to the conduct of this House. The hon. Member for Rye (Mr. Mackinnon) got up to-night in a jaunty manner—he has an idea that he is the man who has killed Cock Robin—and he says, “let us shake hands and say nothing about it;” and he congratulates the House on what he calls the settlement of this question. I, for one, can neither congratulate the House nor the hon. Member for Rye on such a settlement. I came down to vote on the Motion of the hon. Gentleman, and I should be very sorry if the House consents to its withdrawal. In bringing it forward, the hon. Member stated that he was a follower of the noble Lord, and that thirty-one years ago he had brought forward the same Motion. Yes; but on referring to the records of that date I found that the hon. Member for Rye was not then a devoted follower of the noble Lord; he spoke and voted on every occasion against the Reform Bill, and he predicted the same revolution which he now foretells from the alteration of the £10 franchise. If I recollect rightly, the Member for Rye at that time represented the borough of Lympington, which was put into Schedule B; and he brought forward his Motion not in exactly the same terms as at present, but proposed that the operation of the Bill as regarded all the boroughs included in Schedule B should be postponed until the results of the Census had been ascertained. He has no longer the same complaint to make as to Rye, because I believe that borough was excluded from the operation of this Bill; but, forsooth! he is so enamoured of his first love of thirty-one years ago that he returns to it again; and now, although a devoted follower of the noble Lord's, he brings forward this ridiculous Motion, which has no more to do with the subject than the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Devizes. We have heard something to-night of the dignity and wisdom of the course which has been taken. I think the noble Lord has discharged his duty with dignity; but I much question the wisdom of the House in the course they have taken with regard to this Bill. What are we doing? We are doing nothing but offering a premium to out-of-doors agitation. We say the people are indifferent. I do not think that is a theme for congratulation at all; because, when the people are indifferent on such a subject, it shows a conviction that they have no sympathy with this House—that this House does not understand their wants and requirements. And what has been the pretext for the postponement of this measure? The Instructions to the Committee have been framed for no other purpose than to be obstructions to the passing of the Bill. There has been no open, honest, fair, stand-up fight on this question; the Bill has been got rid off by a species of Parliamentary assassination, by the administration of small doses of adjournment and other poisonous ingredients. We are told, indeed, that in the month of June the noble Lord is able to contend against this homœopathic system of assassination, and the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone holds him accountable for having dropped the Bill. The noble Lord the Foreign Secretary had no other course; but I think it becomes the House very seriously to consider the position in which they have been placed, for I have a very strong idea that out of doors we are neither regarded with respect nor favour by the great body of the people. In my opinion, we hold a most discreditable position in the eyes of the country. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks well described the state of Reform when he said that for fifteen years it had been a Parliamentary question, and for ten years a Ministerial question. Five times have different Cabinets pledged themselves to measures of Reform; five times has the Sovereign from the throne promised legislation on the subject; and yet here we are, by a most extraordinary coincidence, on the 11th of June, 1860—throwing over a Reform Bill. ["Hear, hear!"] I can understand that cheer. I think it a most unfortunate thing for his own reputation, and for that of his party, that Lord Derby ever brought forward his Reform Bill. At the same time, I grant it was unfortunate for the country that when he did bring it forward it was so summarily rejected. I will do justice to my hon. Friend there; I think he was right in the course he took; and I think the rejection was most unfortunate, because we are shuffling off this question till God knows when, and we do not know under what circumstances the consideration of the Reform Bill may next be forced upon us. The hon. Gentlemen on the other side, the recent converts to Reform—for everybody is a Reformer now; the only question is as to the pace at which we shall go, and probably as to who shall drive the coach—did they offer any opposition to the principle of this Bill when it was first brought forward? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) opposed it rather in the spirit of Sir Fretful Plagiary. He complained that there was "not enough of incident in it," and concluded by saying that although the Bill was most meagre and unsatisfactory, he would offer no opposition to the second reading. The right hon. Gentleman the leader of the party took a different view, and complained that it would swamp property and intelligence; but, nevertheless, no hostile division was called for, and the second reading was allowed to pass almost sub silentio [Laughter]. Well, not exactly sub silentio, because we all know the "gift of tongues" has been enormous; but it was certainly allowed to pass without a division. What has happened then? We have had all those pretexts put forward which are too transparent to deceive anybody except the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone, and probably the next meeting which he attends at the "Yorkshire Stingo" will lead him to give up that delusion. I am of opinion that the country, so far from being dissatisfied with the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) will sympathize with his position; but I do not think it will sympathise with that of many Members of this House.

[Third Night

Mr. Bernal Osborne

"An open foe may prove a curse,
But a pretended friend is worse."

What is the language that has been held on this subject? I find that a noble Lord in "another place," when he came into power, made the following declaration on the subject of Reform:—

"In my opinion it is highly inconvenient that from Session to Session a question of this importance and interest should be perpetually kept dangling before the Legislature, and that Session after Session it should be hung up till a future day;"

and, without pledging himself to details, he promised to give the subject his attention "with the sincere and earnest desire to trifle no longer with this great question." What have we been doing all this Session but trifling with this great and important question? That was the opinion of the noble Lord the head of the late Government in "another place." What was the view of the leader of this House on the same occasion? In bringing forward his Reform Bill, he asked,—

"Is Parliamentary Reform a subject which touches the interest of all classes and all individuals, to be suffered to remain as a desperate resource of faction? Or is it a matter to be grappled with only at a moment of great popular excitement, and settled, not by the reason, but by the passion of the people?"

Now, I ask the House what they are going to do—will they allow the passions and not the reason of the people to settle this question? Could there have been a time more opportune than the present for dealing with this subject? I have no intention of going, as other hon. Gentlemen have done, into a discussion of the measure; but this I say, that if from year to year the House is content to shuffle off this question with pretexts and pleas which deceive no man in this House or out of it, the time may come when, with a bad harvest and with discontent reigning both at home and abroad, you will be called on to pass a measure, not by the reason, but by the passions of the people. I am surprised that the Conservative party, with such a fair offer as has been made by the noble Lord, should have been so lost to the tenets of their creed as not eagerly to accept a proposal made at a moment when men are disposed to be satisfied with much less than I am convinced will eventually have to be given. By assisting to pass this Bill they would, at any rate, have given an earnest to the country that they were sincere in their desire to amend the representation of the people.

MR. HORSMAN: Sir, Although the announcement made by the noble Lord to-night could not have been very long delayed, yet when it was made I think it was not the less agreeable to the House that it was somewhat unexpected. I should be glad to leave the withdrawal of the Bill where it was left by the judicious speech of the noble Lord, had it not been partly for the speech of the hon. Member for Birmingham, and partly for some other remarks which have been made—and which, deriving importance not so much from their reference to the past as to the future, I think it is the duty of the House not to allow to pass altogether unnoticed.

Sir, there was no necessity for the hon. Member for Birmingham to attempt to mystify the subject. The reasons for the withdrawal of the Bill are obvious,—the lateness of the season, and the general unpopularity of the measure. More than a month was lost by introducing it in March instead of January, and when introduced it caused very general disappointment. No one liked it—few expected or wished it to pass—fewer still thought it could pass. From the moment we entered on the second reading, the Government lost all command of the House upon it. The strongest speeches against it, the most vehement denunciations of it, the fiercest outpourings of reproach on it, came from the benches behind the Government; and not only that, but there was this prospect before us in going into Committee, that whereas on the last trial of strength on the Bill, the Government had only a majority of twenty-one, there were, to set off against it, no less than seventy notices of Amendments placed on the paper by Members on the Government side of the House. The noble Lord said just now there were upwards of seventy Amendments on the notice paper, but there were more than that, for I have had the curiosity to examine it—and there are in fact more than ninety Amendments, of which seventy are from this side of the House.

The general feeling, on one side and on the other was unfavourable to the Bill, but there is one section of the House to which it was most particularly unpalatable. That section is not composed of the Gentlemen below the gangway. In so far as it may be considered a democratic measure, it would rather give strength to those whose sympathies are democratic. It is not the Gentlemen on the opposite side who would be most affected by it, for Members of the Conservative party are not returned to this House by the popular element, but rather in spite of it. But the Gentlemen who most dreaded the Bill were that section of the House that is neither Conservative nor democratic, but who, representing both the aristocratic and popular element, were elected by constituencies that would be made democratic by the improvement, of which the first effect would be to improve their present representatives off the face of the Parliamentary arena. They are the Gentlemen who have really felt the greatest dislike of the Bill. There being therefore a common feeling on both sides,—when an attempt is now made to fasten that responsibility of delaying the Bill on one side of the House, which attaches to all,—and to construe the disinclination to entertain this particular measure into hostility to any Reform whatever—I think the House ought to interpose, and if we are to get rid of the Bill, we ought at the same time to get rid of all the hypocrisies and delusions that have disgraced its history. When I see, as I have to-night, the seed sown for a new crop of misrepresentations—when I see those who have become bankrupt by trading on bad Bills of Reform, scolding, and warning, and threatening those whom they have been in vain endeavouring to cajole, I think we ought to have—as for a few moments I will ask leave to have—an opportunity of settling one or two short accounts of the past before we allow them to issue a new prospectus for the future. I should not have thought of doing so had not so many references and allusions been made to the past history of the Reform question. We have heard repeated the history of all the various Reform Bills brought forward, and I really think that with regard to the future, the House ought now to take stock of the question, especially as the hon. Gentleman near me has endeavoured to pin down the noble Lord to a promise to introduce another Reform Bill in the autumn.

The country has become familiar with the whole of the Reform agitation. It originated in the mistaken belief of some shortsighted politicians, that because the Reform Bill of 1832 gave great strength and popularity to the Liberal party, therefore, when that party was at a low ebb of popularity, it had nothing to do but resuscitate the cry of Reform, and its leaders would once more be borne aloft on the shoulders of the people. That was the beginning of the second Reform of the Constitution in 1852. We have lately had some very curious and interesting revelations as to the history of that Bill. In that Reform Cabinet of 1852 it appears there was only one Reformer; he was very sincere and ardent, no doubt, and his sincerity requires no explanation; but I think the country may be curious to know how the other members of that Cabinet, that was almost unanimous in dreading and deprecating another measure of Reform, thought it consistent with their personal honour and public duty to propose to Parliament a great constitutional change that they believed, if carried out, would be dangerous and disastrous to the country. But the question we know did not stop there. Two years later these same Gentlemen who had been alarmed by the comparatively moderate Reform Bill of 1852, made themselves parties to another measure, so much larger that it is difficult to understand how it could emanate from the same Ministers and the same red box. No Minister has asked permission of Her Majesty to make a similar revelation as to the Bill of 1854 to that which Lord Grey has made as to the Bill of 1852; but, if made, they would probably be a very interesting continuation of the chapter already published. The Bills of 1852 and 1854, though brought in with all the authority of statesmen possessing a popular character, failed—as the simultaneous agitation of Mr. Hume, to which the noble Lord has just referred, for a much larger measure also failed—because the practical intelligence of the English people could distinguish between the real demand for Reform in 1832, and the artificial demand for it in 1852. They would not lend themselves to further organic changes, the necessity of which they did not see, and the plan for which they did not approve. There were, doubtless, still great anomalies in our system; but the people knew that anomalies were not grievances, and they would not lend themselves to crude, immature, rash, and mischievous attempts to tamper with the Constitution—they wanted rest rather than agitation.

But the agitation, though discounted by the country, was not suffered to drop by those in high places. In 1858, the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton once more raised public expectation only to disappoint it—I had almost said to trifle with it—and in 1859, the Government of Lord Derby inherited, as they believed, the duty and the difficulty of dealing with the question. The hon. Member for Liskeard alluded to the measure introduced by that Cabinet, and to the mistake of the Liberal party in its treatment, and my hon. Friend noticed the cheer that I gave him when I remembered that on that occasion he was one of my severest assailants for the course I took. I have this Session avoided taking any part in these discussions, because last year I took a course that was very painful to me—a course that separated me from my political friends—[“Hear, hear,” from an Hon. MEMBER on the back Ministerial benches.]—after twenty-four years of more constant, more arduous, and more consistent action with my party than that of the hon. Gentleman who sneers at me. I did not separate from those Friends without giving them, in private, the warnings I repeated afterwards in public; and I did not wish this Session to undergo the imputation of assisting to verify my predictions. When it was first made known to me—I was then in the confidence of those hon. Gentlemen—that they had determined to reject the Bill of Lord Derby’s Government, I used what was once a familiar mode of illustration among us, and said, “The Liberal party may pursue one of the three courses. It may reject the Bill on the second reading—it may amend it in Committee, or it may strangle it by an abstract Resolution. The two first,” I said, “are perfectly legitimate, and must succeed, and I am ready to go with my Friends on either of them; but the third course is illegitimate, and must prove discreditable and embarrassing, and I am not prepared to support it.” And I showed how it would prove embarrassing. I said, “You will have a narrow division, a damaging dissolution, a reduced party majority, and after a year lost, a new Bill no better than the one rejected.” My protest and my opinions are recorded; they are on that record to which any one can refer. I have no occasion to reproach myself for them, and I ought not to be reproached by any one on this side of the House. I was answered by the Member for Birmingham, and others, “A year will not be lost. A new Bill can be introduced before Parliament rises—it can be passed in an autumnal Session, and in February, 1860, we shall meet under the new Constitution.”

Mr. Horsman

The Bill was rejected—followed by the dissolution, the bare announcement of which took away the breath of the framers of the Resolution, followed again by the elections, which took away some valuable elements of their party majority. But when the new Government was formed, and when the new Parliament met, there was no hurry for a new Reform Bill. In that summer Session there was no Bill. The autumn passed, and no signs of a Bill. This year Parliament met unusually early, but the introduction of the Reform Bill was put off for more than a month. I protested very strongly against the delay; but my protest was not backed up by the ardent Friends of Reform, nor by the hon. Member for Birmingham. I protested, because I felt the absolute necessity of showing an honest desire to deal with the question this year, and because, adhering to my former views, I had no reason to dread a Bill which I believed would verify my predictions, and more than justify the course I had taken. But I found that a great change had come over the dream of the advanced Reformers. The secret of the forthcoming Bill had partly oozed out, and had produced on them a very tranquillizing effect. Their patience in 1860 presented a remarkable contrast to their chivalrous impetuosity in 1859; and while on the part of the Government there was no disposition to be prematurely communicative on the details of the measure, there was on the part of the supporters an amiable desire not to be too inquisitive. The fact was that the Ministry and their supporters were equally in a dilemma—and while the occupants of the Treasury Bench felt that they had burnt their fingers by rejecting the very moderate measure of their opponents, the occupants of these other benches were afraid of also burning their fingers by having to accept an equally unsatisfactory measure from their own leaders. So the Bill was by common consent postponed till the ides of March, with a fervent prayer on both sides that some Providential interposition would put it off till doomsday.

But Providence was not propitious, and when the day came, the appearance of the Bill was the bursting of the Bill; and the Liberal party immediately opened out their fire upon it. Of all the Reform Bills ever proposed, this was pronounced by common consent to be the very worst. "Others have been bad," said the Member for Bristol; "but this one is contemptible." "It is not Liberal," said the Gentlemen on this side; "it is not Conservative," said the Gentlemen on that. "On the most important point of Reform," said the Member for Birmingham, "it unsettles everything and settles nothing." It gives one party fresh cause for agitation," said the Member for Huddersfield. "It gives another great reason for alarm," said the Member for Edinburgh. "Where it tries to be Conservative," said the Member for Marylebone, "it relapses into old Toryism." "Where it professes to be liberal," said the Member for Galway, "it becomes revolutionary." And when at the close of all these friendly criticisms the Committee on the Bill was postponed on the 3rd May to the 4th of June, everybody knew that it was virtually abandoned. And it has been abandoned to-night.

There is only point in the speech of the noble Lord (Russell) to which I wish to refer. The hon. Member for Birmingham tried to pin the noble Lord down to a pledge that another Reform Bill would be introduced at an early period; and my hon. Friend endeavoured to fix upon his political opponents in this House a result which the public ought well to understand is due to the general feeling of the House against the Bill. It is not a result of which the responsibility attaches to one side of the House more than to another, but arises out of the general feeling on all sides—a feeling endorsed by the country out of doors, which sees plainly that this question of Parliamentary Reform has been trifled with in the course of the present Session, and that there has been on the part of the Government no effective or satisfactory attempt at its solution. But I must say that of all the men who may be charged with inconsistency on this question, and who is least justified in bringing a charge of insincerity and want of zeal against other Members, that man is the hon. Member for Birmingham. He has abandoned every principle and violated every profession in endeavouring to support a Bill which he has told us was utterly worthless. Two years ago he had a Bill of his own, which was carried with a great flourish through the country. We have never seen that Bill, but he has allowed this Bill of the Government to be substituted for it, though it does not contain a single provision that he had been accustomed to say was essential to a Reform Bill. He has approved of the £6 franchise, though he was at the pains on Friday night to show that this was a franchise which would introduce only 300,000, or less than 5 per cent of the classes who are now excluded. He told us to-night that he would have been sorry to see the Bill proceeded with if it had ended in the adoption of an £8 franchise; but when the noble Lord said on Friday night that he was ready to adopt a modification of the £6 franchise, and even to accept a higher franchise, the hon. Gentleman was a party to that compromise, and following the noble Lord in the debate, he said he was ready to do all he could to carry out the objects of the Government, so that, instead of a £6 rental, the hon. Gentleman was ready to take a higher. On the question of the franchise he is ready to exclude, as he admits, at least 95 per cent of the unenfranchised operative classes; but on what he considers the greater question of the redistribution of seats, which affects, not the operatives, but the masters, which implies a transfer of power from one class to another, and which will greatly facilitate the admission to power of his own class—on that question the hon. Gentleman will hear of no compromise. This is not the first time that my hon. Friend has failed to be the peculiar representative of working men. He has applied the same principle in matters of taxation wherever he has had to choose between removing a tax that fell on the operatives and one that fell on the master employers. In cases of taxation, as of representation, he has acted to the injury of the poor, while he has endeavoured to benefit the master classes. I believe no man is more sincere or more honest than he is in the advocacy of his own particular views; but there is this peculiarity about him, that on all questions affecting the education, the taxation, the representation of the working classes, the Member for Birmingham has been an ardent, unflinching, outspoken champion of the operative class against the rich landowner. But when it is a question not of landowners but of millowners and master manufacturers on one side, and operatives on the other, then in these cases the interests of the manufacturers and masters have been upheld, and those of the poor trampled on. Therefore, I decline taking the hon. Gentleman as a representative of the working people of this country. I do not believe that he represents their opinions.

I have said that I wish to refer to one remark made by the noble Lord, in what I have described as, with one exception, his moderate and judicious speech. But the noble Lord said something that sounded very like a promise to introduce another Reform Bill. I can sympathize with the general feeling of the House to spare the noble Lord any of those reproaches which he anticipated might be cast on him on this occasion; and I only speak now in the same spirit in which I sincerely told him last year, that if by supporting his Resolution I could promote reform, and strengthen his position, he would have no readier follower than myself; but it was because both objects would be defeated by his Resolution, and that with the success of his Resolution his difficulties would commence, that I warned him against it. And in the same earnest spirit in which I warned him as to the past, let me now once more warn him as to the future. Let me tell him that it is no light thing for a Minister of England to discredit the only free constitution now left in Europe. It is no light thing for one in the noble Lord's position to promulgate the doctrine that it is a legitimate function of the Ministers of this country once every twenty years to remodel the Constitution and effect a new distribution of political power always in one direction, giving less and less influence to intelligence and property, and more and more power to numbers, and to establish the fatal principle that the Constitution of England is only capable of expansion in a downward direction. I concur in the opinion expressed by the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Bucks, that this may be the last occasion on which, for some time to come, we may have an opportunity of discussing the question of Reform, and I cannot let it pass without saying,—what indeed we are all well aware of,—that this Reform Bill did not emanate from without, that it did not arise from the aspirations of the unenfranchised classes. It is the off-spring of official rivalries and Ministerial necessities. Political and party chiefs, racing and wrestling for power, endeavoured to outvie each other in bidding for the support of a political minority that held the balance between the great powers in the State. And while that political minority,—that party, as regards its representation of national opinion, is the least important party in the nation, it still has ruled the Cabinet, it has ruled the House of Commons, it has ruled the country, for its support was a political necessity to Ministers, who dreaded Reform very much, but dreaded exclusion from office a great deal more. The authors of these insincere Bills have, indeed, much to answer for. I cannot but recollect how, when in the autumn of 1858 the hon. Member for Birmingham was making his tour in the provinces, they and their organs denounced him because, as they said, he was discrediting the Constitution. No, Sir, he was not discrediting the Constitution—he was only illustrating that great law of the Constitution which enables every man in this free country publicly to promulgate his own political belief. But I will tell you what it is that discredits the Constitution. It is when public men, ministers and statesmen, vie with one another in promising what they do not wish to perform—in conceding what they think dangerous—denying what they hold true—pandering to unwholesome appetites, and endorsing what they despise—then it is that they not only discredit but imperil the Constitution, and arm men of more advanced opinions, but also of more earnest purpose than themselves, with a power which they find it impossible to resist; and which is capable of being resisted in the present instance, simply because the hon. Member for Birmingham happily neither understands nor represents the sentiments of the great mass of the English people. Indeed, there is, in my opinion, no man possessing his powers and his opportunities who so completely fails to excite their sympathies or to arouse their enthusiasm. They do not understand my hon. Friend's idiosyncracies; they cannot conceive how one and the same individual can be a great friend to freedom at home and a great advocate of despotism abroad. They are unable to comprehend how a great upholder of the doctrines of peace in this country can be the great admirer of the representative of war in another; nor can they approve the principle in accordance with which free nations may be absorbed or swallowed up and enslaved by a despotic Power, because the small but free State is a bad customer, and the larger one may be a large purchaser of Manchester manufactures. Least of all do they desire to Reform our institutions after the Transatlantic model. The masses in this country are sound at heart—English to the backbone; and, thank God, intelligent enough and well-conditioned enough to appreciate the Constitution under which they live. They know that under that Constitution they enjoy politically, socially, and religiously, such rights as are not enjoyed under any other Government in the world. That Constitution is precious to them as it is to us. They know that its blessings have not been easily attained, and that they ought not to be lightly perilled. The House of Commons is one of its appointed Guardians. In our hands, Providence has at this time confided this sacred trust, and that as we discharge ourselves, now or at any future time, of that high trust, honestly, faithfully, and righteously, we shall be surely judged.

Mr. Horsman

MR. ANGERSTEIN said, he could not agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the question was hazarded by the Government, and he thought the time would come when they would regret that this Bill had not been allowed to go into Committee, where it might have been moulded into such a shape as would have secured it passing into law. Had the Government taken that course the people would at length have had that Reform which had been promised them by four Governments in succession. He would leave to the country to determine whether the Opposition, who had opposed this Bill in every stage, were the persons to whom was to be entrusted the question of Reform.

MR. SLANEY thought that on the whole the Government had adopted the best course that lay open to them under the circumstances of the case; but he humbly hoped that the noble Lord's failure on this occasion would not prevent him from bringing the subject forward in another Session. It appeared to him that by a fusion of provisions contained in the two last Bills a satisfactory measure might be arrived at; but he hoped the noble Lord would in his next attempt fix his borough franchise somewhat higher. That, with a county qualification of £15, and some of the franchises out of the Bill introduced by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, would, in his opinion, make up a measure likely to meet with general approbation.

MR. LONG offered his thanks to the Government for the course they had taken that evening. The House was in the position of a contractor who had undertaken to do more than he could perform; and the best thing they could do was to confess that they were unable to perform it. The people of England cared more at the present moment about reconstructing their rotten gunboats than about reconstructing their rotten boroughs.

MR. W. E. DUNCOMBE felt it must now be admitted, although the noble Lord opposite had attempted to rouse the feelings of the people on this subject, that an almost universal apathy prevailed in regard to it. He ventured to think that apathy could only be accounted for by the general conviction that there existed no necessity for Parliamentary Reform. In his opinion the whole proceeding on the part of the Government had been got up for party purposes, to secure their position in office, and not with a view to any real remedy for abuses alleged, but which certainly had not been proved to exist. Since 1832 there had been no question which had excited the attention or moved the interest of the public that has not been brought before the consideration of that House, received full discussion, and been settled in accordance with the wishes of the people. There was the great question of free trade, for instance, peculiarly affecting the working classes—that was debated in 1846 on both sides of the House, with a view to promote the welfare of the working classes. It was a question in which the people took a deep interest, and he would ask the House whether it had not received a solution in accordance with the people's wishes? And for himself he was ready to admit that free trade had been of great benefit to the people of this country. And so, if there had been any general feeling in the country in favour of Parliamentary Reform, it would have made itself heard. Besides, before they concluded that Reform was necessary, they were bound to prove that the recent legislation of the House had not been in accordance with the views of the people. On the other hand, he believed the people attributed much of the happiness, wealth, and prosperity they enjoyed to the satisfactory legislation of that House; and it was because they were contented with the principles of Government which had been adopted, and with the legislation which had been carried out, that they now felt there was no necessity for changing the constitution of a Parliament, which had conferred on them so many and such signal blessings. He regretted to hear the statement from the noble Lord that they were next year to be favoured with another Reform Bill. He hoped the noble Lord and the Government would reconsider that matter. Surely they did not wish again to expose the House and the country to renewed uncertainty, and to an interruption of all useful and practical legislation, by the futile reproduction of such a measure, for the purpose of conciliating the hon. Member for Birmingham, who would never be satisfied with any measure of Reform the noble Lord might introduce. The Government must not judge the hon. Member for Birmingham by his speeches or professions.

[Third Night.]

Mr. W. E. Duncombe

in Parliament, but rather by the speeches he made and the principles he maintained in his tours of agitation throughout the country. He believed the principles of the hon. Member to be inconsistent with our present form of Government, and the sooner the connection between the Government and the hon. Member ceased the better. Many of the principles, and much of the policy, of the Government, particularly their financial policy, certainly savoured very much of those recommended by the hon. Member for Birmingham. He begged them not to follow in that direction. If they did, they would bring themselves into hostile collision with the real wants and wishes of the people; and though they might for a time retain the honours of office, their course would terminate in future disaster to themselves, and great disadvantage to the country.

MR. WARNER sincerely regretted that the noble Lord had been compelled, by circumstances which no doubt he regretted, but over which he had no control, to take the course he had announced to-night. The Session was eminently suited for passing a satisfactory and comparatively permanent Reform Bill. There was no excitement in the country and there was a general wish to have the question settled. He regretted that such an opportunity should be lost; he only hoped another would before long recur. Both sides of the House had the strongest interest in attaining a satisfactory settlement of the Reform question. That was especially the interest of hon. Gentlemen opposite, who so long as the question was left unsettled were placed in the wrong before the country and kept excluded from office. There would be no chance of a Reform Bill passing until both sides agreed not to treat it as a party question. He thought, however, that the time which had been consumed in discussing this Bill had not been wasted, for it had been shown that neither the House nor the country was yet prepared to deal with the question of Reform. A variety of Reform measures had been introduced of late years, containing a great variety of propositions. All these had failed to gain acceptance; and then the noble Lord was obliged to content himself with the simplest measure that had ever been presented. He brought in a skeleton Reform Bill, leaving it to others to fill it up and clothe it with flesh. The attempt, however, like all the others, was obliged to be abandoned. In any future Bill he hoped that there would be no uniform line of rental or rating to give the franchise. Such a line of demarcation was very well where the line was kept to a high standard, but when reduced to a lower level it would be impossible to retain it. He desired to see a representation of classes and of interests and not of mere numbers.

MR. WHALLEY said, he was willing to give the Government credit for honest intentions in withdrawing the Bill, but he thought that this would have been a proper occasion for them to inform the House and the country what course they intended to take on the constitutional question in debate between the Lords and the Commons. The country would not be satisfied of the sincerity of the Government if they withdrew the Reform Bill without pledging themselves to repel the insult which the House of Commons had received at the hands of the Lords. The country would not willingly allow the privileges of their representatives in that House to be overridden by the Lords on account of any paper precedents which might be discovered by the Committee, even if such could be found. Their Report ought by this time to have been laid before the House; and he thought the Government were exposing themselves to great suspicion by the course they had taken, and the appearance of trifling with the question which had been exhibited. Until this matter was settled the functions of the House were almost in abeyance. In former times it was the practice to adjourn the House until any assault on its privileges had been fully repelled; and still it was the rule that privilege questions took precedence of all others. Why did the Government depart from this practice? The noble Lord the Minister for Foreign Affairs had expressly declared that the question was more important than any that had arisen within his experience; and what could he expect but that the opponents of Reform, and those who were supposed to sympathize with the Lords should endeavour, and most successfully, to bring that House into contempt by its own conduct, as most effectually they had done by the frivolous debates on Reform? The noble Lord had submitted to that indignity, and had withdrawn the Bill. Was the Government also ready to submit not merely to the postponement of Reform, but to what was nothing less than a change in the constitution of the country. For the Lords to interfere with the Government financial arrangement was to deprive this House of the only function by which it held authority in the State, coupled with the fact that the revenue of this country is almost entirely by Act of Parliament, and that the House, in excess of its authority, had voted not merely subsidies for present wants, but had imposed on the country a permanent system of taxation. It constituted the Lords beyond all doubt the paramount authority in the State. He trusted the conduct of Government in this matter would be such as to justify the confidence with which he desired to regard them, and though at present their conduct was to himself and to others wholly inexplicable, that they would not forget the gravity of the question, or the importance that the public, when it became fully understood, attached to it. He thought it would be a great relief to the country, and a great credit to the Government, now that they had abandoned the Reform Bill, if they would give some expression of their opinion with regard to the vital question to which he adverted, and that it was not their intention to sacrifice the Constitution of the country and the privileges of that House to the arbitrary rule of the Lords.

Amendment and Motion, by leave, withdrawn. Bill withdrawn.

MR. DIGBY SEYMOUR asked whether the Order of the Day was discharged?

MR. SPEAKER: The Amendment is withdrawn, the Motion is withdrawn, and the Bill is withdrawn.

STATUTE CRIMINAL LAW CONSOLIDATION BILLS.

OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON BILL. SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL, in moving the second reading of the Offences against the Person Bill, said, this was one of several Bills for the consolidation of the Criminal Law which had come down from the Lords. The Bills dealt with offences against the person, malicious injuries to property, coinage offences, the law relating to accessories and abettors, forgery, and larceny; and they resulted from the labours of various Commissions which during the last twenty-seven years had considered the subject of our criminal law. He thought the House might congratulate itself, that after the question which had been disposed of that night, and which would have unavoidably led to the continuance of party discussion, they now approached a subject remote from party strife, which commended itself to all parties alike, and which he was sure would obtain the careful consideration of the House. Each of these Bills proposed not only to consolidate, but also to assimilate the law of England and of Ireland on the particular matter to which it referred; but only one, that relating to the coinage, included Scotland, and was therefore applicable to the whole of the United Kingdom. At the head of criminal law reformers in modern times, and the most successful of them, stood the late Sir Robert Peel, who entered upon the career of the amendment and consolidation of the criminal law in 1826. Subsequently, many statutes had been passed, putting the criminal law of England and Ireland, to a considerable extent, on the same footing. Most law reformers thought it now desirable that, instead of having one law for England and another for Ireland, the statutes in force in the two parts of the kingdom should be carefully considered, and so altered that one criminal law should be applicable to both countries; and it was to a great extent owing to the zeal and ability with which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin University (Mr. Whiteside) and the hon. and learned Member for Suffolk (Sir FitzRoy Kelly) had devoted their time and attention to this work that the attempt was now made, in addition to measures of general consolidation and improvement, to effect an assimilation, as far as practicable, of the criminal law of England and Ireland. The hon. and learned Gentleman then described the labours of the successive Commissions issued between the years 1833 and 1845 with a view to the reform of the law. The Commission issued in the latter year was appointed with power to revise the work of the Commissioners who had preceded it. In 1845 two Reports were made under that Commission, and Reports were also made in 1847, 1848, and 1849—being five Reports in all. In the year 1848 Lord Brougham introduced a Bill for the consolidation of the criminal law, founded on the Reports of the Commissioners, but that Bill did not pass into a law. The hon. and learned Gentleman, having referred to the Commissions of 1852 and 1855, proceeded to say that in 1856 eight Bills were prepared relating to England, and were introduced into the House of Lords, but failed to pass into law in consequence of the lateness of the Session. In the spring of 1857 a Resolution was come to which was embodied practically in the Bills now before the House. Up to that time it appeared that the various Commissioners had been somewhat restricted in their labours by not being called on to suggest or devise amendments in the law, their duty being simply to consolidate. Amendment, however, ought to proceed together with consolidation, for to embody the words of the existing law, however objectionable, into a consolidating statute, leaving amendments to be brought about afterwards by different other Acts, was not a very satisfactory mode of proceeding, and would not have embraced the assimilation of the law of England and Ireland. In order, therefore, to place upon the statute-book good laws, expressed in convenient terms, nine Bills, going in some respects beyond the scope of the present Bills, were brought forward, and those Bills, he might state, were the foundation of the measures he now submitted to the House. Subsequently, under Lord Derby's Government, it was determined that this matter should be proceeded with, and particular attention was called to the necessity of assimilating the law of the two countries; and, after Lord Derby's Government had ceased to exist, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin University brought forward certain Bills, and it had been the intention and endeavour of those, to whom the preparation of the present Bills had been committed, to incorporate in them everything that could be properly taken, for that purpose, from the Bills of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. With respect to the Bills of the right hon. Gentleman and those before the House, there was one point of difference which he would briefly explain. It was thought by that right hon. Gentleman a convenient arrangement in a scheme for the consolidation and amendment of the criminal law to put the punishments, with convenient references, into one distinct Bill, which might be called a Punishment Bill. This was a matter on which opinions might vary; but it had been the practice in this country to do, with respect to the punishment of crime, what it was proposed to do in the present Bills—namely, after the definition and description of each particular crime, to enact, in the same clause, the punishment. He would not affect to decide which plan was the more convenient; but he did not suppose that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would think the point of so much importance as to deem these Bills open to any grave objection on that account. He should confine himself on the present occasion to the general statement he had just made, and defer, until the next stage, any observations as to the manner in which it was proposed to bring about the amendment and assimilation of the law, and the extent to which that amendment and assimilation would be carried. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading of the Offences against the Person Bill.

MR. WHITESIDE said, the subject now before the House was one interesting alike to the philanthropic lawyer and the statesman. It was impossible to reflect upon it for a moment without thinking of the difficulties that Romilly, Mackintosh, and even Peel had to contend with in endeavouring to amend the criminal law. When the late Government obtained possession of the Reports of the Statute Law Commissioners they found there was a great difference of opinion among those eminent persons as to whether or not we could consolidate the Criminal Statute Law of the two kingdoms into one set of statutes. Some of them thought that there ought to be separate laws peculiar to Ireland, while others, including the late Chancellor of Ireland (Mr. Napier), were of opinion that it would be better to lay aside exceptional legislation and to have a common system of Criminal Statute Law applicable to the two countries. Afterwards the late Home Secretary called upon the Irish Executive Government to state in writing—which was always convenient, for it conduced to precision—their views upon the subject. That paper was drawn up, and it recommended the abolition of the punishment of death in all cases save the premeditated taking away of human life. The Bills of the late Government were framed somewhat differently from these. For example, it was thought convenient to have a Procedure Bill and a Punishment Bill separate from the other measures. That plan had now been departed from, and at the risk of repetition, the clauses of the Punishment and Procedure Bills had been incorporated in the others. He did not think that that alteration was an amendment, but rather the reverse. Again, while some of the recommendations of the Commissioners as to the abolition of the punishment of death had been acted upon, others had been neglected. The principle upon which those recommendations were founded was, that capital punishment should only be inflicted in cases in which death followed the act of the offender. In these Bills, however, while the punishment of death was no longer to be inflicted in the case of a conspiracy to murder, attempts to murder, such as administering poison, exploding gunpowder so as to damage buildings, or setting fire to a shop with intent to commit murder, were still to remain capital offences. When the Offences against the Person Bill went into Committee, it would be desirable to reconsider those provisions. He, for one, was of opinion that they would do more to repress crime by establishing a severe secondary punishment which would be certain to follow its commission, than by maintaining the punishment of death in these cases. He was also sorry that a definition of murder, calculated to put an end to the cases turning upon the distinction between implied and expressed malice, had been omitted from these Bills. Subject to the improvements which might be made in them in Committee, he thought that it might be convenient to pass those measures, and he had no doubt that if any of the clauses were altered the House would, upon a conference, be found open to conviction. With all deference to those learned persons, he was not quite sure that the Judges were the best persons to decide upon such questions as were raised by these Bills. He did not mean to be disrespectful, but he remembered several passages in the life of Sir Samuel Romilly in which that eminent man complained of the difficulties which he had to encounter in quarters where they were least to be expected. He was also of opinion that in cases of high treason it would be sufficient to take away a man's life, without depriving his family, who might have nothing to do with his offence, of his estate, and that it would be desirable to do away with the confiscation to the use of the Crown of the goods and chattels of convicted felons, thus carrying the punishment home to the defenceless and unoffending families of the criminals. The Crown virtually never did take the property of convicted felons, and therefore he thought it time to abolish the legal fiction. If they abolished the punishment of death in eight out of ten of the cases in which it was now imposed by the statute, and consolidated and assimilated the law of the kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland, they would have done a good work; and though the noble Viscount might not have passed a Reform Bill he would have had the satisfaction of having, with the assistance of the able law officers of his Government, carried a measure which would be useful to the country, and which would redound to his credit.

MR. COLLIER said, he was willing to accept these Bills, and would give his best assistance towards improving them in Committee; but he could not agree with the Solicitor General that they had at last hit upon the right way of consolidating the criminal law; and he did not believe that upon the plan now acting upon the Statute Law would be consolidated within our time. He had more than once expressed an opinion which he now repeated—that there was but one mode of dealing with this question, and that was to undertake the consolidation of the criminal and statute law as a whole. The Attorney General had intimated a plan for that purpose, the constitution of a Department of Public Justice, or a Board whose functions should be, first to expurgate and next to consolidate the whole body of law, and then submit it to that House. He believed if the Attorney General would come down to the House prepared to constitute such a Board, he would find that the House would not be illiberal in granting money for that purpose. If such a Board was constituted and composed of able men, he was satisfied that in two or three years the whole statute law might be expurgated and consolidated. If the Roman law, which was much more voluminous than ours, could be codified in four or five years, and the French law in three years, was it to be said that the English law could not be likewise codified? If the Attorney General succeeded in doing that, he would have effected a greater work than had been accomplished in our time.

MR. M'MAHON thought there were good reasons why this Bill should be referred to a Select Committee. A great deal of money had been expended on this and other similar Bills. He had looked through the Bills, and he thought he could satisfy the House that it would be a very serious thing to give them a second reading. By one provision of the present Bill the definition of murder or manslaughter extended to killing any person, whether he was a subject of her Majesty or not. If the House adopted that clause, then it followed that killing a person abroad—a foreigner—not in the dominions of Her Majesty, would be murder. Now, there was an Englishman fighting with Garibaldi in Sicily; if he should be taken prisoner, he might be sent over here and his countrymen would be required to find a Bill against him at the Old Bailey, and we should be called upon to hang him. Take another case. It was said that a great number of his (Mr. M'Mahon's) countrymen were going to some part of Italy, who might have to fight against the King of Sardinia; suppose the Sardinians to take some of them and send them over here to be hung in batches. They would thus be dealing with persons who were not subjects of the Queen, and it would be the whole story of the Conspiracy to Murder Bill over again, and they would be continually troubled with prosecutions of that kind. Then again, as if the law of landlord and tenant were not sufficient already, a very objectionable clause was inserted, making it a punishable offence to assault any one engaged in making a distress. The provision that persons who were convicted under the Act should be bound to find sureties for good behaviour would practically have the effect of subjecting them to almost perpetual imprisonment. The same defect ran through the whole group of Bills. He objected to the clause in the Coinage Bill which empowered any one to whom base coin was tendered to give the utterer into custody on the spot, because a mistake might be so readily made as to the nature of the coin, and also to the provision, that even if, in an action for false imprisonment, the plaintiff obtained a verdict in his favour, the Judge should have power to disallow costs unless he approved the case. In the Larceny Bill there was a provision that if any person should unlawfully and wilfully course, snare, or carry away, kill or wound, or attempt to kill or wound, any deer in an unenclosed part of a forest or chase, he should be liable to a penalty of £50. That was according to the existing law; but the provision went on to say that if any person should be convicted of a second offence of the same kind—namely, attempting to kill or wound any deer, &c., he should be guilty of felony. He doubted whether that could be called an improvement, and if the Bills were read a second time he hoped that at all events they would be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. AYRTON said, great inconvenience arose from their not having any key to the manner in which these Bills were prepared. It was impossible to know what part was an amendment, and what part a mere repetition of the existing law, and it was impossible that hon. Members should ascertain it for themselves by a comparison of the Bills with the statutes. Some of the amendments were not improvements. He doubted the wisdom of providing that if a person fired a gun with a charge in it, but with no cap to it, he should be deemed guilty of an attempt to commit murder. It also seemed a contradiction in terms to say that if any person attempted to procure a miscarriage it should be an offence whether the woman was with child or not. He observed that there was a want of harmony and symmetry of the Bills. A person who was hung for one felony was to be buried in a particular way, but there was no provision as to the burial of the body of a person who was hung for another description of felony. He hoped that the Solicitor General intended to proceed with these Bills, and not to make of the second readings a mere display for a night, as had been done in the last three or four Sessions, because it tended to render consolidation ridiculous.

MR. GEORGE did not think it necessary to discuss the details of the Bill at that stage, and he should not, therefore, trouble the House with any lengthened observations in regard to them. He congratulated the law officers of the Government on the vigorous efforts which they were now making for consolidating the criminal and statute law of England and Ireland, and he hoped that that consolidation would be still further extended in many other respects between the two countries.

MR. W. EWART was also glad to see that the Government had determined upon effecting a consolidation of the various statutes, and thought the country was much indebted to the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Whiteside) for having done so much towards assimilating the laws of the two kingdoms. One great reason, he thought, why all former attempts at consolidation had failed was because the Commissioners had other work to do besides that of consolidation. He was of opinion that the Bill was calculated to introduce improvements in our criminal jurisprudence. It would be a good thing to have a Board appointed that should watch the legislation of the House, codify the statutes, and so simplify the phraseology of Acts that the plainest intelligence could comprehend them. The objections that had been made to the measure might be considered in Committee. Now that the House had bidden farewell to political reform he trusted there was some prospect of legal reform.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he could assure the House that it was intended to proceed with these Bills vigorously and earnestly. It would be a poor return for the ready co-operation of the other side of the House in these law reforms if the Government were at all slow or indifferent in the prosecution of them. He should be exceedingly sorry, however, to see the Bills referred to a Select Committee, for he should then despair of seeing them pass into law this Session. All the matters which had been objected to involved formalities on which he should desire to have the sense of the House, and he had much more confidence in the benefit which would be derived from a discussion in the House than in any result to be obtained by a Select Committee. The general consolidation of the statutes was being proceeded with as earnestly as the scanty means at the disposal of those responsible for it would allow, and he hoped before the end of the Session to be able to lay on the table a Bill, which would be the first step towards a general consolidation—towards expurgating the statute book, and removing those things which were impediments to their consolidation—he might even say towards a systematic arrangement and codification of the statute law. The House would then be able to see at a glance what was the existing state of the law, and he thought it would be a surprise to many to learn to within how small a compass the statute law might be reduced.

MR. DIGBY SEYMOUR had to thank the Law Officers of the Crown for the production of these Bills, knowing from experience the difficulties that at present arose in connection with the statutes. He highly approved the determination of the Government to proceed with them vigorously; but he thought there were some parts that would require very careful consideration.

MR. BOWYER said he was afraid, although these Bills presented a considerable advantage, that when even these Bills had passed we should be very far from the commencement of a criminal code. There was a great want of scientific arrangement in these Bills, and a great deal of repetition and unnecessary matter might have been spared had there been proper scientific definitions of what constituted certain offences, such as murder and assaults. The whole Bill did not contain a definition of any offence. The language of these Bills was very different from that of any other codes in the world. Hon. Gentlemen acquainted with the codes of France, Sardinia, and Prussia would see that in them offences and punishments were set forth in very terse language, so that every person could understand what was forbidden and what the punishment was if he committed an offence. Some of the clauses of this Bill ran on to a great length without a stop, such were the long-winded phrases employed in them. This mode of drawing up Acts of Parliament ought to be got rid of as soon as possible, especially in regard to criminal matters. He must make an observation regarding the mode of debating these Bills. Bills of consolidation must always to a certain extent be taken on trust by the House, for it might happen in a thin House—a not unlikely state of things when law reform was under consideration—that some Member, perhaps least of all acquainted with law, might introduce and carry an Amendment which would put the Bill into confusion, and render abortive the labours of the learned person who had drawn it. Our form of Government was not favourable to scientific legislation. Law reform had always been prosecuted with the greatest success under despotic Governments—as under Justinian and Napoleon I. In those cases the new body of laws or code had been maturely considered by a select Council of the most learned and experienced persons. But in this country there was the inconvenience of having to discuss the Bills in two separate large assemblies, composed, for the greater part, of unlearned persons. The only way of dealing with this difficulty, was for the House to defer greatly to the opinions of the learned lawyers who prepared the Bills, and to take such Bills to a great extent on trust, without minutely discussing their details.

Mr. BUTT hoped that the Committee would be fixed for some time when there could be a full discussion of the Bills, for very extensive Amendments were required.

Mr. HENLEY was glad that the Attorney General had made up his mind not to send these Bills to a Select Committee, because the only chance of their passing them into law was to pass them in the ordinary way through a Committee of the Whole House. The Law Officers of the Crown would then be present to explain the reasons for each alteration of the law, and the House could then decide. He regretted that the Government had not found it consistent with their duty to get rid of the punishment of death for certain offences for which he thought—following the spirit of legislation of late years—it might very well have been abolished. The changes which had taken place during the lifetime of the present generation in that direction had all been successful. Where the punishment was not necessary for the repression of the crime it ought to be got rid of. These, however, were matters for Committee.

Mr. Bowyer

Bill read 2^o and committed for Thursday.

Then the Bills following—namely,

- (2.) Malicious Injuries to Property Bill.
- (3.) Coinage Offences Bill.
- (4.) Accessories and Abettors Bill.
- (5.) Forgery Bill.
- (6.) Larceny, &c., Bill.
- (7.) Criminal Statutes Repeal Bill.

were severally read 2^o, and committed for Thursday.

Mr. DENMAN thought it would be to the convenience of the House if the Government would adopt some plan by which it might be seen at a glance whether a clause was an Amendment, or alteration, or simply consolidation. That would very much facilitate the progress of these Bills. Those who had drawn these Bills could speedily underscore those clauses that were Amendments of the law, and those clauses could be printed in italics.

ADMIRALTY COURT JURISDICTION BILL.—SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. DIGBY SEYMOUR said, that at the suggestion of the Government, he proposed to withdraw this Bill, and to introduce another framed upon a suggestion from the Admiralty.

Order discharged. Bill withdrawn.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND)

(No. 2) BILL.—SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. WHITESIDE moved, that the Bill be now read the second time, and explained that the Bill was based on a mass of evidence taken by a Commission which sat some years ago to inquire into the subject. Seven or eight years ago an attempt was made by the late Lord Chancellor of Ireland (Mr. Napier) and himself to legislate on this subject by consolidating or repealing every existing law in reference to the law of landlord and tenant in Ireland; but in consequence of the large number of statutes—for when the Irish Parliament had nothing else to do they appeared to have passed a law on the subject of landlord and tenant—this was found a very laborious and troublesome affair. A number of Irish Members also objected to the Bill which was prepared, though he never could clearly understand why; because, as he had said, the Bill simply consolidated the law. However, another Bill misnamed the Tenant Right Bill having been introduced, the very simple Bill for consolidating the existing law he had brought forward was rejected. The result, therefore, was that the Bill continued in abeyance for about six years. The late Government having been called upon by certain Irish Members to deal with the matter reproduced the Bill after having subjected it to revision and improvement. The Bill was called “No. 2,” because the present Attorney General for Ireland also had a measure on the same subject. He ought to say that his Bill dealt with two matters, the law of fixtures and the law of distress, which matters were both omitted from the Bill of his right hon. Friend. The Bill of his right hon. Friend simply proposed that there should be no distress for more than a year’s rent; whilst he (Mr. Whiteside) proposed to adopt the Scotch law, reserving to the landlord the right to distrain, but securing the tenant from a hasty sale of his property if he gave security for the rent. As to fixtures, he proposed to make what was put upon the land by the tenant his property, even though the consent of the landlord had not been obtained for putting them there; but he would not have the right to remove them without the assent of the landlord. The landlord was to have the right of pre-emption; but if neither he nor the incoming tenant chose to buy them, the outgoing tenant would then have the right to remove them, which was simply justice to the tenant. If they were placed on the land contrary to covenant, the tenant would have no right to remove, but if there was no agreement there would be power to remove. This clause would probably lead to the making of agreements between landlord and tenant, or to incoming tenants buying the fixtures. These two branches of the law were, he believed, by his Bill, placed on a more satisfactory footing than by that of his right hon. Friend. He suggested to the Government the propriety of adopting this as the groundwork of any measure on the subject.

MR. DEASY said, he had not the least objection to the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman. He proposed, however, to proceed with the Bill which he had himself introduced, though he did not claim any merit for it, but was free to admit that the merit belonged to the right hon. Gentleman and the late Lord Chancellor of Ireland (Mr. Napier). He should be glad to receive any suggestions for the improvement of his Bill, whether from the right hon. Gentleman, or any Gentleman opposite, as his sole object was to carry through a measure of beneficial legislation.

MR. M’MAHON said, that the Bill was one for the consolidation of all the laws relating to landlord and tenant; but then the right hon. Gentleman had told them that Acts were passed by the Irish Parliaments when they had nothing else to do, and it was well known those Acts were all made in behalf of the landlord and against the tenant. Except the provision relating to fixtures he found nothing in the Bill beneficial to the tenant. By the 108th sec., any farmer who availed himself of nature’s provision of the harvest moon would be guilty of misdemeanour. That section declared any one guilty of misdemeanour who was found cutting corn after sunset and before sunrise with an intent to evade payment of rent. With a packed or prejudiced jury any man who availed himself of nature’s provision of the harvest moon might be found guilty of such an intent.

MR. WHITESIDE said, the clause referred to was simply to prevent a man availing himself of the moonlight to defraud the landlord of his just rights.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, the question relating to fixtures had always given rise to great uneasiness and agitation in Ireland. Some law was necessary on the subject. A short time ago an Act was passed for England on that very subject, and the provision was that the tenant should be allowed to remove or sell to the landlord such fixtures as had been erected with the landlord’s consent. He objected to the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Deasy), because it did not follow the example of that Act. There was such a thing as improving a person out of his estate.

Bill read 2^o and committed for Thursday.

TENURE AND IMPROVEMENT OF LAND (IRELAND) BILL.—SECOND READING.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [15th May],

"That the Bill be now read a second time:" and which Amendment was, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, he assumed that from the time that had elapsed since the last debate on the Bill the House had forgotten its objects. The question was, not what it had been alleged to be, one of insuperable difficulty, and the past failures had had their origin in the want of earnestness and sincerity on the part of Cabinets, or of individual Members, or of the Members of the House generally. It was said, with some truth, that those who were conspicuous in their demands for tenant right had made themselves ridiculous in the country—that they were in the habit of getting up two or three demonstrations on the subject in Ireland in the course of the year, and then letting the matter drop. He confessed that the subject was one which he approached with aversion, because he had an honest conviction that it was not the intention of Parliament to deal with the question in a manner consistent with the requirements of the Irish people. He disbelieved in the professions of the late Government, and the Bill of the present Government he regarded as absolutely worthless. At the same time he would vote for the second reading, in order that in Committee it might, if possible, be converted into a bona fide tenant right Bill. If the efforts to make it so failed he would protest against it being considered a settlement of the question, and he would advise all with whom he had influence to desist from agitation on the subject till such an organization was established in Ireland or in Parliament as would give a fair prospect of success. When they spoke of improving the condition of the Irish people they were told that the sure way to do so was to improve the land; but the truth was that in proportion as the land was improved in Ireland the people were destroyed. The landlords in Ireland had the power to make the people happy if they chose; nine out of ten of them could give leases, and they had the power to borrow money to carry out improvements. The present Bill merely enabled the landlords to do these things in a new way; there was nothing in it of a compulsory character—it left everything to the option of the landlord. Whatever were the novelties introduced into the Bill they secured no advantage to the tenant and the people of Ireland were left in exactly the position they were before. Nothing beneficial to the tenants would come from the present Bill. The landowners would only ridicule its provisions and go on, as hitherto, withholding leases and enlarging farms, to be occupied by Scotch or English settlers. The Bill did not contain one provision to mitigate the evils of which the people of Ireland complained. If they were to accept this Bill it would be an admission that they had been the victims of delusion, and that till the present Secretary for Ireland came among them they never knew what the country wanted. What the tenants wanted was some measure that would guarantee to them security for their outlay for improvements—compensation for the capital they laid out—and unless this were done it would be better not to attempt legislation at all. They must also have protection against unjust evictions; for the ancient inhabitants of the country, who were not colonists, held that an eviction was a gross violation of morality. The people of Ireland held that God made the earth for the use of all men, and not for that of the landlord alone. But he regretted to be obliged to say that, in his opinion, there was very little difference between the position of the tenant at-will in that country and the slave in America; for, although it was true the former could not be tied up and flogged, yet he might, if he disputed for a moment the authority of the landlord, be left without a roof to cover his head or a bit to eat. Now he found in the Bill no remedy for the unbridled power of eviction of which he complained, and he thought he was therefore justified in characterizing it as, to a great extent, a useless measure. It was contended, however, that the landlord was, in accordance with the principles of political economy, justified in selling his property to the highest bidder; but was it right, he would ask, to say to the poor man who could not afford to pay a single penny more for his land without exposing himself to irretrievable ruin, that he must not hope to escape the consequences, inasmuch as some stranger from Yorkshire or Inverness would be found ready to pay a higher rent and occupy his place? Such a principle became unjust and iniquitous, when in order to give effect to it, it was necessary to evict the present occupying population, and thus consign them to misery and ruin, and oftentimes to death. Why, if the doctrines of political economy were thus to be carried out to their full extent, Ireland would be depopulated in six months. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) had, in his introductory speech, talked about the prosperity of that country; but he (The O'Donoghue) could not see how she could be regarded as prosperous while discontent prevailed to so large an extent among her people that they were quitting their native shores in thousands. He found from the official returns which had been presented by the Registrar General to both Houses of Parliament, that on the 30th of March, 1851, the population of Ireland had amounted to 6,551,385, and on the 1st of January of the present year to only 5,988,820; while the number of emigrants last year had been 80,599, and the drain from that source continued to show no sign of diminution. Now, what token of prosperity, he should like to know, was to be found in facts which so plainly told their own tale? He might, however, be told that it was not the farmers so much as the labouring class who were leaving the country; but to the justice of that view he must demur, for it was his belief that the farmers and their sons were swelling the tide of emigration in great numbers. The right hon. Gentleman had further, in his introductory speech, stated that the number of evictions was considerably less in Ireland during the present year than it had been ten years ago; but that circumstance only proved that the number of the population had been reduced so low that extermination was no longer held to be necessary to such an extent as before. The right hon. Gentleman had then gone on to point to the action of the Encumbered Estates Court, through the medium of which, he said, £25,000,000 worth of property had been sold, and, for the most part, purchased by Irishmen. What was there to boast of in the Encumbered Estates Court? It only proved that one set of men had been ruined, and that another set had profited by their ruin. That Court only recognized the buyer and seller, and ignored the existence of the tenant. It was a desperate remedy applied to a most disastrous state of things, and it had led to a daily increasing emigration. The people were wretched and miserable, keenly alive to their position; they knew full well that according to law they might be dispossessed in six months, and this power of almost instantaneous eviction was held over them for moral and physical coercion. A Bill which did not apply a remedy to this state of things was not worth acceptance. He would suggest that no landlord, under any circumstances whatever, should be able to evict a tenant unless he held under a twenty-one years' lease; in all cases of dispute as to the fairness of the rent demanded by the landlord, he would send the dispute to be decided before a jury at the assizes or Quarter Sessions, and he would have no appeal from the decision of the Jury. He would allow every occupier to dispose of his interest to any one who offered a fair value, and he would allow him to make any improvements, which, however, should not be chargeable to the landlord if they were not found to improve the letting value of the land. These provisions would remove the feeling of insecurity which was the great source of evil. If adopted, the tide of emigration would be stopped, and the people, who had gone forth in thousands, would be found flowing back to settle in the land of their fathers. He had read an article in The Times which stated that the time might come when an English or Scotch agriculturist who took a farm in Galway or Kerry would be obliged to take over Scotch or English labourers with him. Matters, he feared, had a tendency to realize this prophecy; but he trusted he should never see the day. There was hardly any calamity, except war, that he would not prefer. He thought it would be better for the people of Ireland to live under an autocrat who would secure for them possession of the soil and the right to transmit it to their sons, than to live under a Constitution which only gave them a six months' tenure, and allowed them to be victims of class legislation.

The O'Donoghue

MR. LONGFIELD said, he scarcely agreed with one single observation of his hon. Friend who had just spoken, except when he said that a clause limiting the power of eviction to tenants holding leases for twenty-one years, would stop the tide of emigration. That was quite true, for such a clause would induce a tide of immigration to the favoured land, where tenants would be placed in the position of owners. He certainly did not know any position that would be preferable to that of an Irish tenant if he were not obliged, except as a matter of honour, to pay rent unless he had a twenty-one years' lease. He certainly had expected some remarks upon the merits of the Bill, but he had not been prepared for a disquisition upon extermination and the cruelty of landlords. His own experience, which was greater than that of the hon. Gentleman, enabled him to say that the evictions which had taken place were not simple arbitrary acts on the part of the landlord, and that a better feeling was rapidly springing up between landlords and tenants in Ireland. He denied that the tenants were emigrating because of those evictions, for the cause of the emigration now going on was quite different; it was a desire on the part of the young, intelligent, and energetic, to better themselves. Landlords now cherished their tenants, and tenants respected their landlords. To prove his statement, he could appeal to statistics as well as to experience. Were the pauper lists increasing? Were not the prices of stock and agricultural produce rising? Was there not an improvement in the dwellings, the clothing, and the general condition of the people of Ireland? But those facts would not induce him to refuse to pass a Bill which would tend to ameliorate the relations between landlord and tenant. The great cause of the difference between the state of things in Ireland, and that which prevailed in England, was the want of security. The principles of this Bill were threefold—to enable the tenant for life to improve land and to charge the estate as against his successors, to enable the tenants themselves to improve under certain circumstances, and to charge against the owners; and, lastly, to encourage the granting of leases. All those principles were most useful. The Bill would not give a fee simple to the tenant, but it would enable him to make a fair bargain with his landlord. At the same time he did not think the Bill was effectual in its machinery, or even in its principle, and unless it was greatly altered it would not work at all. He had spoken to many assistant barristers upon the subject, and they all admitted that they did not consider themselves a proper tribunal for the settlement of such questions. These gentlemen, however, were also unanimous in thinking that if those duties should be imposed upon them their salaries should be increased. With respect to the power of charging the estate by the tenant for life, he thought the terms offered by the Bill might be improved, but still he thought the arrangement was sound in principle. With respect to leasing powers, that provision would also be useful; but caution would be necessary in dealing with it, and he thought the powers to be given to the yearly tenant to improve might be more extensive. It was from legislation cautiously and prudently applied that he looked for improvement in the relations between landlord and tenant in Ireland, not from Utopian schemes which were only fit for the hustings, and which were certain to be rejected.

Mr. Longfield

MR. MACEVOY said, the Bill did little or nothing to meet the difficulties which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) had pointed out so clearly in his speech. It only enabled landlords, who had limited interests, to do that which their marriage settlements or other family arrangements now rendered impossible. That, no doubt, was a useful provision, so far as it went; but it conferred no special advantage on the tenant. He hoped, however, that the warnings of the hon. Baronet (Sir John Walsh) would prevent no English Members from voting for a Bill which in Committee might have engrafted upon it clauses of real advantage to the Irish tenants, and which might thus assist in settling a question of vast importance to the welfare of Ireland.

MR. WHITESIDE said, his objection to the Bill was that it would never become law. He quite appreciated what had fallen from hon. Gentlemen interested on behalf of a section of the peasantry of Ireland, but he denied that the hon. Member for Tipperary (the O'Donoghue) was correct in stating that he represented the sentiments of the people of Ireland generally, because a large class were directly opposed to the opinions of the hon. Gentleman on this very question. No doubt the events which were now passing in Ireland could not fail to make a deep impression on every thoughtful mind, but their causes were not what the hon. Member represented. If a return could be presented of the ejectments from any Irish county he did not believe that any facts would appear to justify the exaggerated picture drawn by the hon. Member, and even in Tipperary itself he doubted whether there ever were so few ejectments as at the present moment. It was not true, therefore, that the emigration now going on was to be fairly ascribed to the measures pursued by "exterminating landlords." The fact that Irishmen could find £25,000,000 to lay out in the purchase of land, and that the land had fetched so high a price went far to upset the visionary statements indulged in by the hon. Gentleman. He agreed that the operation of the Enumbered Estates Act had been unjust in its commencement in consequence of its giving no right of appeal; but this Bill would do still greater injustice. The Secretary for Ireland had declared that his object in bringing forward this measure was to deal with the law of landlord and tenant. But the first part of the measure had nothing to do with that question. The right hon. Gentleman from his residence in Ireland must surely have acquired some of the peculiarities of the country. The title of the first part of the Bill was a misnomer. It had nothing to do with landlord and tenant—the parties to whom it referred were only limited owners. It was also irrelevant, and ought to be expunged. Moreover, if any measure of the kind was to be passed at all, it ought to be applicable alike to England and Ireland. The criminal Bills they had previously discussed that night were designed to consolidate the statute law of both countries. They were also to have a Bill introduced for England, carrying out the principles of the Irish Enumbered Estates Court Act. But in this case the Chief Secretary was proposing to make the difference between the law of the two countries greater than it was already. Professing to be a measure to improve the law of landlord and tenant, this Bill began by dealing with that which had no connection with the subject. It gave certain powers over estates to limited owners. He maintained that to do that was quite unnecessary, because by a series of Acts, commencing with the 13th and 14th Victoria, they had given to limited owners, of a different class and a higher status than those contemplated by this Bill, the power of working out those improvements of the soil which it was the right hon. Gentleman's object to encourage. By an Act passed the other day, facilities had also been afforded for the erection of labourers' dwellings. The second part of this Bill related to leasing power. It aimed at a useful object; but the contrivances by which it sought to accomplish it were such as would never receive the assent of the other House. The noble Viscount (Viscount Palmerston), himself an Irish landlord, could never sanction the mode in which the power of making leases was to be given to limited owners. The entire machinery of that part of the Bill would produce continual litigation. The assistant barristers of the different counties could not now decide on the price of a poor man's pig without there being an appeal to a Judge of Assize. But under this Bill those learned gentlemen, who might never have had a foot of land, and knew nothing of its value, were to fix the rent under improving leases; and when their sanction was once given to such arrangements it was to be conclusive, both at law and in equity, unless the amount was £100 a year or upwards. That was a most objectionable principle. If a lease was honestly entered into, it should stand. If it was a fraudulent lease, it should be left to the action of the ordinary tribunals to set it aside. The noble Viscount could never have read the third part of the Bill, relating to tenants' improvements. The word tenant was defined as meaning a "tenant from year to year;" and "landlord" as "the person for the time being entitled to the rent payable by the tenant from year to year." The effect of this would be that the middleman of Ireland, who had no interest at all in the land, and the tenant, who had as little, would have the power of making a contract which would have the effect of charging the land with an annuity in respect of any "improvements" they might agree to between them. The Bill he had himself introduced gave leasing powers and the power to make contracts to the person who ought to have them, and established proper limitations. He objected to the Bill introduced by the Government, because the first part of it was irrelevant, the second part was unwise and inexpedient, and the third part allowed two persons who had the least interest in the property to charge it with an annuity. It was a Bill that never could become part of the law of England.

MR. HENNESSY adverted to what he described as the uncalled-for attack made by the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire) on a previous occasion upon the landlords of Ireland; and observed that he had hoped that the old system of denouncing the landlord class, or any particular class, had been abandoned. He regarded another Bill relating to landlord and tenant which was among the Orders of the Day, and which had been prepared by an Irish landlord, as far better than the present measure; but he trusted that in Committee some practical and useful provisions would be introduced into the Bill of the Government.

MR. BLAKE said, he would not at that late hour trespass many minutes on the patience of the House; but as representing an earnest tenant right constituency, he did not wish the debate to close without appealing to the Chief Secretary for Ireland to consider, before the Bill went into Committee, the representations which had been made to him in favour of making the measure which he had introduced more useful to that class whose just requirements and expectations had so long remained unfulfilled. As the Bill stood, the great mass of the cultivators of the soil would be left in just as bad a condition as before; as any one acquainted with Ireland would agree with him that, judging of the future by the past and present, that the great majority of the landlords would prefer taking chance to come in for the benefit of the tenant's improvements than undertaking to compensate for them; and the consequence would be that, so far as the tenant-at-will was concerned, that the same state of insecurity would prevail—the land would not be properly cultivated, and neither owner or occupier would be benefited. The right hon. Gentleman who introduced the Bill, appeared to dwell with peculiar satisfaction on the fact of the great increase of fat cattle in the country; but he quite forgot to mention the fearful decrease of human beings in a land capable of supporting twice as many; and he would seriously recommend him to ponder on these lines—

"Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey, Where bullocks fatten, but men decay."

It was not a fact that the emigration from Ireland was composed of the labouring population of Ireland. He represented one of the ports that was a great point of departure, and he could positively say that there were quite as much of the farming classes went away as any other, and latterly the vast majority of the exiles consisted of those who constituted the flower, and strength, and hope of every country—persons from fifteen to thirty-five years of age. He did not expect that the House of Commons would grant much to Ireland merely for the sake of justice, and he would not, therefore, appeal to them on the ground of the benefit Ireland would derive from a just settlement of the land question; but he addressed himself to the English and Scotch portion of the House, if they valued the safety and prosperity of the Empire, not to delay, before it came too late, conceding to the Irish peasant what was asked for him. The hon. Member for Tipperary had shown the fearful decrease of population since 1851. According to the usual ratio of population, Ireland ought to have increased 2,000,000 since that period; but, instead, it had diminished some hundreds of thousands, and this was not caused by famine or disease, but by the people flying from the country. As Imperialists, he asked them to consider the effect of all this. He was sorry the hon. Member for Birmingham was not in his place that night, as he would tell him a fact that would make him a tenant-righter. It was calculated that each person in Ireland consumed, on an average, three pounds worth a year of British manufacture. Now, with two millions of people gone to a land which did not consume much English goods, there was six millions of money every year out of the pocket of the British trader, for which he might thank the Irish landlords, and the Government which combined with them against their best customers. Then, when war threatened and they wanted men, they could not get them in Ireland, though it was once their best recruiting ground. Even the militia regiments that remained at home could hardly complete half their complements. Take the Waterford Artillery as an example—the pay was good, the employment light, the officers popular—and yet he would appeal to the hon. and gallant Member for the County Waterford, who sat opposite, and was one of the most deservedly popular officers in the regiment, whether he ever saw more than 400 men paraded, whilst they ought to have mustered 800 bayonets at least, and such was the case with a great many other corps nearly as distinguished. Every man who left the country carried in his breast a deep feeling of hatred against the Government, whose disregard for the welfare of his country obliged him to exile himself from the land of his birth, which an Irishman loves so well, and the feeling of those who remained behind was just as embittered, and with cause too. They felt it was utterly useless to appeal to the English Parliament to enable them to live by even hard labour on their native soil—and the consequence was that they were looking elsewhere and trusting to other means to obtain that justice which their own Government denied them. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Gentlemen appeared to doubt that. Then, why did they not trust the Irish people with arms and enrol them as volunteers? Because they knew well that they had disregarded their grievances, and could hardly expect them to fight for the maintenance of a power under which they became every day poorer and less independent. Before he sat down he would tell them another truth, and he addressed it to them as a solemn warning and not in an exulting spirit, because he regretted the deplorable state of things which he depicted, and earnestly wished that there was a cordial union between England and Ireland, founded on mutual interest and the desire to maintain and help each other—they were afraid of a French invasion. ["No, no!"] No doubt they were, or else why all the talking and arming, and other precautions against it? Well, he could tell them, from his knowledge of Ireland, that if they allowed things to go on as at present, and confirmed the Irish peasant in the belief which he now very strongly entertained, that nothing would be done to secure to him the fruits of his toil, that if a French invading force landed in the country, of even thirty thousand men, that the British flag would not be flying in any part of the island in a fortnight afterwards. ["Hear, hear," and derisive cheers!] Hon. Gentlemen might laugh, but let them take care that his prediction would not some day be realized; they had it in their power to prevent it; they might by a simple act of justice make Ireland happy, prosperous, and loyal, instead of being as she was a reproach and a cause of dread in the hour of danger; they then had an opportunity of doing a gracious act without the appearance of being coerced into it, and he implored them to avail themselves of it, and they might rely, by so doing, they would benefit every interest in Ireland, strengthen the hands of Government, and add to the strength, security, and greatness of their mighty empire.

Mr. Blake

Mr. CARDWELL said, that when the House went into Committee on the Bill he should be able to discuss at greater length than at present the various objections which had been raised to the provisions of the measure. The right hon. and learned Member for Dublin University had charged him with having introduced a Bill applicable only to Ireland, which, it seemed, was retrogressive legislation, since all measures ought to be applicable to England, as well as to Ireland. Why, the right hon. and learned Gentleman had himself upon a former occasion brought in a Landed Estates Bill applicable only to Ireland, and at that moment he had two measures before the House which were limited in the same way to the sister kingdom. The right hon. and learned Member said that the first part of the Bill relating to landlords was irrelevant:—but the House would not deal with the measure if it dealt exclusively with the tenant; the landlord must be included. He had also stated that the first part of the present Bill—that relating to landlord's improvements, contained a mass of novelties and new ideas which had never been heard of before. Now, the truth was that the clauses thus characterized by the right hon. and learned Gentleman were nothing more nor less than an attempt to give practical effect in Ireland to an Act of the United Kingdom, passed in 1845, enabling landlords to mortgage their estates for the improvement of their land, and to the Montgomery Act, which, as the House had been told, had converted Scotland from a wilderness into a smiling garden. Hitherto, in consequence of the Act of 1845 being worked through the instrumentality of the Court of Chancery there had not been a single application under it in Ireland; and hence his wish to invoke it from a sleep of death and give it life and vitality. In like manner the Settled Estates Act of 1855 was the basis of the second, or leasing, part of the present Bill. That Act also operated through the instrumentality of the Court of Chancery, and consequently was a dead letter, or nearly so, in Ireland. By the third part of the Bill he did not seek to give compulsory or retrospective legislation as against the landlord, but simply established the principle that where a tenant, with the knowledge and approbation of his landlord, had expended his capital or his labour upon the improvement of the road, he should not be liable to be disappointed of his just expectations, but the harvest should return to the bosom of him who sowed the seed. Such a principle he thought could not fail to facilitate and stimulate the improvement of land in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by expressing his obligations to Mr. Sharman Crawford, not only for his valuable labours on behalf of the tenants of Ireland, but also for the candid and friendly spirit in which he had spoken of the present Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 2^o, and committed; considered in Committee, and reported; to be printed as amended [Bill 172]; re-committed for Friday.

House adjourned at a quarter before Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, June 12, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1st Masters and Operatives.2nd Highland Roads and Bridges.3rd Petitions of Right; Ecclesiastical Courts Jurisdiction; Malicious Injuries to Property Act Amendment.

DILAPIDATION OF GLEBE HOUSES.

QUESTION.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON, seeing the Archbishop of Canterbury in his place, was anxious to inquire of that most rev. Prelate, Whether he could afford any information as to the Dilapidation of Glebe Houses Bill, and whether there was any intention of proceeding with it in the present Session?

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, that the subject had been brought under the consideration of Convocation, but he was afraid that at this period of the Session there was little hope of any legislation taking place upon the subject.

LIGHT WEIGHT RACING BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF DERBY presented a petition from the Stewards of the Jockey Club on behalf of a General Meeting of the Club against the Bill, and said that he would make no observations on the subject till after his noble Friend (Lord Redesdale) had given his reasons for the second reading of the measure.

LORD REDESDALE, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said he would in the first place allude to the petition which had just been presented against it by the noble Earl. He believed that in the first draught of the petition laid before the Jockey Club, a great many reasons were urged against the Bill; but it was thought more prudent by those present at the meeting that all reasons should be omitted; and accordingly the petition as now presented to their Lordships only expressed the opinion of the Club that all regulations respecting racing were better entrusted to their authority, and that the passing of the Bill would have a prejudicial effect—though they did not inform the House in what way the Bill would have a prejudicial effect. He had given notice on Friday last that, in consequence of representations made to him by trainers, he meant to reduce the minimum weight in his Bill from 7 stone to 6 stone. What then could be the objection of the Jockey Club to the measure? It could not be to its principle, which was that there should be a minimum weight prescribed for handicaps—for one of the stewards had announced that it was his intention to propose a higher minimum than had been hitherto adopted in such races. The only objection of the Jockey Club, therefore must be, that the Bill interfered with their authority in these matters. This raised the question whether they ought to repose confidence in the Jockey Club in respect to this point. Had that body acted so as to induce the public to trust to them for this reform? That the minimum should be raised would be admitted, he thought, even by those who might see it their duty to speak against the Bill. Then, how long was the present system to be allowed to go on without any steps being taken by the Jockey Club in that direction? Shortly after he had brought in the present Bill, one of those gentlemen who had signed the petition declared, through the public journals, that, he meant to propose that the weight should be raised to 5 stone. After some discussion had taken place in the newspapers, it was announced that that gentleman and another distinguished member of the Club intended to propose a minimum of 5 stone 10 pounds. Ever since he had raised the question he had declared that if the Jockey Club would take it up seriously, he would not go on with the Bill. But nothing had been done by them. Several meetings of the Jockey Club had taken place since; yet, notwithstanding the declaration of the steward to whom he had referred, not only had nothing been done, but all their proceedings had been in opposition to the present Bill. Their Lordships would, therefore, see that under these circumstances he could not do otherwise than proceed with the Bill. He desired at the same time to inform the House that the Jockey Club was not unanimous in their opposition to the measure. He had had communications from members of the Jockey Club, who stated that they were in favour of his Bill and ready to support it. Therefore the petition before the House could only be considered as representing the opinion of a portion of that body. The principle of the Bill, as he had stated, was to raise the weights above the standard to which modern practice had reduced them, and particularly to strike a blow at a great deal of the gambling that took place in racing transactions, through means of what were called light-weight handicaps, which Admiral Rous, the steward before mentioned, had openly acknowledged to be injurious to the best interests of the turf, and to encourage trickery of all sorts. These matters had naturally attracted the attention of those who liked the sport, and who were anxious to promote the improvement of our breed of horses. As a specimen of the present system, he would refer to the race that was lately run for the Chester Cup. In that race 29 horses started, and only six of them carried more than 7 stone. The highest weight in the race was 9 stone, carried by a six-year-old horse; the next was 7st. 8lbs., and the other weights ranged down to as low a figure as 4st. 10lbs. An aged horse started with 6st. only, and the winner, a three-year old, had been handicapped at 4st. 7lbs., but carried 5st. 3lbs., being 10lbs. extra for races won after the handicap had been made. Those of their Lordships who knew anything about horses must feel that this system of weights was perfectly ridiculous in so far as it furnished any fair test of what horses could do. In calling their Lordships' attention to the support the Bill had received, he asked them to bear in mind that he had no connection with the turf whatever, and that the support he had received was wholly unsolicited by him, and that on the contrary he had declined to avail himself of some proposals he had received for securing support from certain quarters. A gentleman who owned racehorses, and with whom personally he was not acquainted, had written to him to say that he was in favour of the Bill, and offered to get up petitions from trainers and others for it, but knowing the position in which these trainers stood to their employers, he did not think it desirable to ask from that body of men any opinion on that subject. That expression of opinion, however, which he had thus declined to solicit, he had received spontaneously from the trainers themselves. He had received a letter from one of the Newmarket trainers, embodying the sentiments of many of his class, in which it is said,—

"I can assure your Lordship that the general opinion is that if the Bill passes with a limitation to six stone your Lordship will have conferred a great boon and benefit upon the racing world generally."

THE EARL OF DERBY: By whom is that signed?

LORD REDESDALE: By Mr. Bradley and twenty-four other trainers. That memorial was forwarded to him, and he, therefore, agreed to reduce the minimum from seven to six stone. The memorialists also said:—

"We are of firm opinion the present state of weights is productive of serious mischief, in that accidents have several times occurred through boys of such tender age and light weights having little or no command of horses. Bartholomew's accident at Goodwood for instance. We suggest six stone as an Amendment, feeling sure, from the general opinions expressed, that it would give great satisfaction and be a great boon to the turf."

He would ask their Lordships to consider how strong must be the views of those persons who thus placed confidence in him, who was unknown to them, and quite unconnected with racing affairs. Many other trainers had also expressed strong opinions in favour of the Bill as it now stood, and they were more interested in the matter than any other persons, for their livelihoods depended upon a proper system being adopted, and their profits on the number of horses kept in training. Adverting to the dangers attending the light-weight system, he would call their Lordships' attention to what must be the danger of placing a child, weighing little more than four stone, including saddle and bridle, upon a young and fiery horse. Surely their Lordships would acknowledge that that was a danger to which they ought not to be exposed, and that legislative interference was as much called for in their case as in that of factory children. Again, what must be the nature of the process necessary to bring down even ordinary boys to the required weight, and what effect did such training have upon their constitutions? Their Lordships must not imagine that these children enjoyed all the profits received for their riding. They were mostly apprenticed to trainers, and were permitted by their masters to ride, and who received the wages for their efforts, and although the boys of course received some presents for riding satisfactorily, whether for winning or for losing, the fee for riding went into their masters' pockets. There was another reason, he believed, why the trainers as a body were desirous that the minimum should be raised to six stone, and that the system of putting up small boys to ride horses should be abandoned, and that was the moral effect it had upon the boys themselves, and the pernicious habits they acquired, which frequently clung to them through life. He had received a letter from a person who had been formerly a jockey, and is now a trainer, in which he said :—

“How comes it that complaints are so often made to the stewards of meetings, and boys fined. Those who put them up pay the fine, and make them do wrong next time to serve a purpose. Then they get suspended, and all this comes from evil-disposed persons who give them orders to ride in such a manner, knowing they will be punished. But what do they care if the child has served their purpose? Nothing of the kind occurred before light handicaps were the fashion, and during the twenty-eight years I was a jockey I was never called before the stewards for misconduct, nor did such things occur once in twelve months with any jockeys at that time. This is the greatest proof we want reform. These boys do what our laws say shall not be done, but how can you complain against a child that cannot help himself? It is the man who puts him up who is to blame. Allow me on behalf of nine out of ten of my brother trainers and jockeys to thank your Lordship for the good you have already done with your Bill, which we hope will be made law.”

Let their Lordships consider what must be the feelings of an honest trainer in putting up a boy who was physically unable to do him justice and to bring out the qualities of the horse, upon whose training he had bestowed his time and attention. He had given one reason for his Bill in the present misuse of boys; another reason was that the present light-weight system was prejudicial to the breed of strong and useful horses. There was certainly some difference of opinion as to whether there had been any deterioration in the breed of thorough-bred horses in the country or not; but he was satisfied that there had been a material deterioration, for, although undoubtedly some superior animals were produced, yet they were by no means in proportion to the number of horses bred, nor were they of so strong and useful a character as those which were formerly bred in this country. He had put the question to a noble Lord not now in his place—a racing man, and in favour of light weights—whether he believed that there were now as many horses capable of carrying good weights over long courses as there were thirty years ago; and he at once said “No,” although the number of horses in training had greatly multiplied. Those who, like himself, were hunting men knew how difficult it was to procure strong well-bred hunters, especially those approaching to thorough-bred, or to find thorough-bred stallions in country districts likely to get such horses, and there were complaints from all quarters of the injurious effects produced by the present system of breeding more with a view to speed than stoutness. There were several precedents for legislative interference in regard to the breed of horses, racing arrangements, and for the prevention of gambling. All racing must be more or less attended with gambling; but it was nevertheless permitted and encouraged, upon the ground that it tended to promote excellence in our breed of horses, but when a system prevailed which tended to promote gambling, and at the same time to discourage the breeding of stout horses, a ground for legislative interference was established. Some of the Acts for encouraging the breed of horses probably arose out of the great destruction of these animals in the wars of the Roses, the first being in the time of Henry VII. In the reign of Henry VIII. Acts were passed in relation to this subject, and also in that of Edward VI. and Elizabeth. As a precedent for legislation on racing matters, he would specially call attention to the 13th Geo. II., cap. 19, which was the foundation of the present Bill, by which the weights were limited to 10 stone for five, 11 for six, and 12 stone for seven-year old horses. That Act was passed in 1740, at a time when the turf was greatly patronized in this country and when its interests were carefully watched. That may be considered the period when our thorough-bred stock was being perfected, being half-way between the birth of Flying Childers in 1715 and that of Eclipse in 1764; and he would ask any advocate of the present system whether he believes that our breed would have attained its present excellence, if, instead of the weights prescribed in that Act of Geo. II., the light weights of to-day had then ruled on our race-courses? It was said that they ought to avoid indiscriminate legislation; and he too was entirely against such legislation—but Parliament ought to see whether this was not a matter requiring attention, and one in which their interference would not be productive of much benefit. A noble Earl had written to him through a public paper, saying—“Suppose a Bill were passed compelling you to place your home farm in the hands of trustees, with Mr. Mechi as manager thereof, would not that be just as reasonable as the Bill you have introduced?” Now, he was glad that the noble Earl in advancing this argument had reasoned by analogy, for that enabled him to point out the noble Earl's mistake. When you reasoned by analogy it was necessary that the things compared should be analogous. He presumed that the noble Earl considered both cases analogous because both were an interference with private concerns; but he forgot that the character of the interference must be similar, or else the cases were not analogous. If he were to bring in a Bill declaring that the noble Lord's stud should be placed in the hands of trustees, who should name the trainer, that would be an analogous interference to the one the noble proposed for his home farm; but to provide that when his horse was entered for a public stake he should run under certain conditions was only the same kind of legislative interference with private concerns as that which prescribed, when he brought his corn to market, that it should be sold under particular regulations with regard to weights. The noble Lord appeared to be unable to discriminate justly between what is private in racing and what is public. When a man entered a horse for a public stake he was not the only person concerned. There were others who entered their horses, some with the intention of running them honestly, and others, he was sorry to say, who entered them with a dishonest object. Again, there were persons who ventured their money on the performances of these horses. If, therefore, any measures could be adopted by the Legislature to check dishonest practices on the part of owners or others in a public race, he contended that it became a matter of public concern and a justifiable subject for public interference. There were a great many private matters in which the Legislature thought it right to interfere. For example, it interfered in the most sacred of all private relations, marriage, declaring that the ceremony should only take place in certain hours of the day; and he certainly thought that to regulate the weight which should be put upon a horse in a public race was nothing like so violent an interference with private concerns as to prescribe the hours for a man's marriage. In point of principle, therefore, if you could show that the Bill was likely to be of public advantage there could be no ground of objection to it on the ground of its being indiscriminate legislative interference. The question was one which the Jockey Club ought to take up, but if they did not do so it was one which called for legislation. The Jockey Club was moreover not omnipotent, and any steps it might take to check the practices of which he complained might not be universally accepted. There were thus good grounds for proceeding by Act of Parliament, instead of leaving the matter in the hands of the Club. Some five months had now elapsed since the introduction of the Bill; and yet, though the attention of the Jockey Club had been called to the Bill, and though, knowing the objection entertained to it by some leading members of that body he had offered to withdraw it if they would promise reform, they had held meeting after meeting without taking any steps in the matter. Among the large number of trainers in favour of the Bill, Mr. John Scott, who might be regarded as the head of the profession, strongly advocated the introduction of a six-stone regulation, and declared that with such a provision the measure would confer great benefit. On these opinions he greatly relied, and with such testimony in its favour he begged to move the second reading of the Bill.

Lord Redesdale

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^d.

THE DUKE OF BEAUFORT rose to move that the Bill be read a second time that day three months. Notice had on two occasions been given by advertisement that this question would be brought before the Jockey Club. On the first occasion they were unanimous, and on the second there was but one dissentient to the opinion that this was no fit subject for legislative interference. The noble Lord had urged the second reading of the measure on three grounds—first, that it would tend to improve the breed of horses; secondly, that it would prevent rascality; and, thirdly, that it would dispense with the employment of young boys in riding. On the first point he differed entirely from the noble Lord. He thought that carrying heavy weights would be much more likely to deteriorate the quality of horses than carrying light weights—carrying heavy weights would break down half the horses before they arrived at maturity. He assured the noble Lord that he should be most happy to assist in putting down rascality on the turf; but he could not see, and a great many others could not see, how you were in any way to attain that end by introducing a different scale of weights. It seemed to him that there would be as much rascality if the riding weight was 6 stone as if it were 9 or 10. With regard to the misuse of boys, he did not believe that they were so liable to accident as the noble Lord had represented. He was sure that many of the trainers who had signed the memorial had done so under a misapprehension. He had a conversation the other day with Mr. John Scott, who told him that he was in favour of a Bill that the minimum weight should be 6 stone, because his horses would then be better ridden. He then said to Mr. Scott, "Suppose you had a valuable horse in a race, with 11 stone on his back, what would you do?" to which the reply was, "Scratch him at once." Mr. Scott was not the only trainer who entertained this opinion; he had spoken to many others who expressed the same views. There was no doubt that attempts were made to corrupt the boys engaged as riders, but he thought that all such cases could be better dealt with by the Jockey Club than in any other way. No accident, he believed, had ever happened at a race to a boy under 6 stone. That was a remarkable statement, but he understood that there was no doubt of its correctness. He could assure their Lordships that it was the almost unanimous opinion of the Jockey Club that the Bill of the noble Lord would do a great deal of harm, and would do little or no good of any kind.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and insert ("this Day Three Months").

THE EARL OF WINCHILSEA said, he did not think there was any ground for bringing against our present racing system those severe charges which the noble Lord the author of the Bill had advanced. He (the Earl of Winchilsea) felt persuaded that the Bill would hold out a premium for bad horses, because under its operation such a crushing weight would be imposed by handicappers upon good horses that no owner would run them. The noble Lord was merely theorizing upon a question, of the practical working of which he knew nothing. There was nothing to justify the imputation of the noble Lord that our breed of horses was degenerating under our existing system of racing, and in reply to such an allegation it was only necessary to point out the eagerness of foreigners in competing for the successful runners on the English turf. England, indeed, had not only given race-horses to the world, but also laws and regulations for racing; and he did not think that the present Bill, which would be the severest blow the turf had received since the time of Charles the Second, came with a very good grace from their Lordships. It was impossible to deny that racing in this country was made the subject of extravagant gambling, but the extent of that evil was, he thought, frequently exaggerated; and he should also express his belief that the freedom from émoules and revolutions which England enjoyed in the most critical periods was, in some degree, to be attributed to the fact that racing afforded to persons of restless temperament a much more innocent excitement.

The Duke of Beaufort

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE rose to tender his thanks to the noble Lord who had introduced this Bill, and to express his sincere hope that their Lordships would pass it into law. He felt even more strongly than the noble Lord apparently did the call of humanity upon this subject, if humanity was to be deemed a motive for legislation. He had always viewed with considerable dislike any restriction upon what might be called the rights of labour, but many such restrictions had effected a great amount of good, and he had no hesitation in saying, from what he had himself observed at races, that the present Bill was as much required as any Factory Act ever passed by Parliament. It was terrible to see the children who were put upon horses and exposed to the most fearful accidents for nothing in the world but what might be called the supposed pleasure of others. It was said if crushing weights were put on horses no man would run first-class animals—but such magnificent horses as West Australian and the Flying Dutchman were never put into handicaps. He was not aware, for example, that any horse had ever established its reputation by winning the Chester Cup. These prizes fell to the owners of horses that carried mere "feather weights," and which were in many cases kept back merely for the purpose of succeeding in such contests. The noble Duke opposite had talked of the cruelty of running a young horse upon hard ground with 11 stone upon its back. Why should 11 stone be put upon its back because they were not to be allowed to put less than 6? If the merits of horses were fairly put before the handicappers, there never would be animals started with a difference of 5 stone between them. Such a difference would be found only where a deceit had been practised. The noble Lord who had introduced the Bill did not intend that horses should run with 11 stone upon them, nor would such be the effect of his measure. His own impression was that the root of the evil lay in horses being brought out too young. What good could be attained by running horses when it was impossible to have a fair trial of their bone and muscle? The late Lord Jersey, who had often carried off the "blue riband" of the turf, never ran a horse until he brought him out for the Derby, and if the only effect of the present Bill should be to put a check upon running horses of two years old it would prove a good and useful measure. With all deference to the noble Duke, it was not uncommon for the poor children who were at present put on horses to meet with serious accidents. Upon one occasion, at Northampton, he saw a boy killed by the mere stumbling of a horse; though he was not thrown, the mere concussion of the brain was fatal, and he believed a similar accident happened a few years back in the south of England. It stood to reason, indeed, that if children were put upon horses accidents would occur. He had always approved of plates being given by the State for the encouragement of the breed of horses, and therefore it was from no dislike to the turf that he supported the present Bill, which he trusted would receive the assent of their Lordships and of the other House of Parliament.

EARL GRANVILLE: I do not think the question now before your Lordships can be called a party question; and in rising to make a few observations upon it I wish to be understood as expressing my individual opinion only. I have listened very carefully to the speeches which have been delivered in the course of the discussion, and I must say they have been amusingly consistent with the nature of the subject and with the character of the different speakers. The noble Lord who moved the second reading of the Bill took a steady heavy-weight gallop over the old Beacon course. The noble Duke who followed, preferred a short half-mile run, while the noble Earl who spoke on the same side was as light and as frolicsome as a fresh two-year old. I do not mean myself to enter into any elaborate discussion of the general merits of the Bill—it deals with details which I do not think it necessary your Lordships should discuss—more particularly since it appears from the speech of the noble Earl that the Jockey Club have the intention of taking the question into consideration. I am not going to discuss at length the question raised by the noble Marquess, whether it is desirable in handicaps that the handicappers should go down as far as four stone, or such low weights. The noble Marquess stated some objections of detail, with regard to those great races into which I need hardly enter, and which I think had better be left to the Jockey Club than be dealt with by your Lordships. My noble Friend the Chairman of Committees reproached the Jockey Club with being so exclusive that they would not permit the interference of laymen upon any question which came before them. If the Jockey Club had legal power which enabled them to control all matters connected with racing, and it was shown that they acted in opposition to the opinions of every one who took an interest in racing or in the improvement of the breed of horses, then a case might be made out for interference on the part of your Lordships. But the Jockey Club has no legal power whatever. They are the landlords of a part of Newmarket Heath, on which races are run, and are therefore able to insist upon the observance there of any regulations which they choose to make; but with regard to other racecourses, they have no power whatever, and the adoption of their regulations in other parts of the country is an entirely voluntary act on the part of those who have the management of race meetings. What is the composition of the Jockey Club? Are its members exclusively of one class, and so bound up in one amusement that they may be considered entirely to exclude from their consideration all matters which are not connected with it? The list of the Club includes fifty-four members, some of whom are members of agricultural societies; some are cavalry and yeomanry officers; ten, I think, are masters of foxhounds, and twenty are Privy Councillors. Of these twenty Privy Councillors, one has been President of the Poor Law Board, two have been Postmasters General, two have been Viceroy of Ireland, seven have been Cabinet Ministers, and two have been Prime Ministers of this country twice in their respective lives. This is the constitution of that eminent body; and if they are backed up by a large part of the population, by the owners of horses and by those who take an interest in the amusement of racing, I think it is but fair to infer that they are not so exclusively absorbed in the pursuit of racing as to be likely to exclude from consideration all the collateral advantages which may be derived from it. I now come to the reasons why I do not think that your Lordships ought to take legislative action upon this subject. Two of the reasons for this measure are contained in the preamble of the Bill, and the third is that upon which great stress has been laid by the noble Marquess—humanity to the boys who are put upon these horses. Upon this last reason I cannot lay great stress. I think it is impossible to compare legislation of this sort, even if effectual, with legislation applied to great masses for the restriction of the hours of labour, or for preventing the employment of young children in mines. If you enter upon the course contemplated by the noble Lord in this Bill, you must pass an Act to prevent boys going bird's nesting, or venturing into the water before they are able to swim. [A laugh.] Noble Lords may laugh, but I remember being in a country in which a similar precaution was enforced. I wanted to bathe in the Danube, and before I was allowed to do so I was obliged to exhibit in a small pond before two gentlemen in uniform, who had to be officially satisfied of my power of swimming before they allowed me to enter that noble river. Such an amount of interference I imagine that your Lordships are not prepared to adopt. The next object of the noble Lord is most laudable—namely, the diminution of gambling and dishonest practices. Now, no one in this House—not even my noble Friend who spoke so warmly—will contend that there are not many malpractices and a great deal of gambling of an injurious character connected with the Turf; but does any one suppose that this Bill will put an end to those evils?—that some trifling regulations as to the weights which horses are to carry will put an end to gambling and to the malpractices which are connected with the turf? The idea that it would do so is perfectly futile; and I believe that if you wish to protect young and inexperienced persons against those fraudulent practices, you can take no more unwise course than by an unwise Act of Parliament pretending to do that which no legislative enactment can effect. With regard to the breed of horses, I totally disbelieve that there has been any deterioration in it. I think that it is impossible to walk through the streets or parks of this Metropolis without seeing that no such thing has occurred. The noble Duke (the Duke of Beaufort) referred to a conversation which he had had with an eminent trainer; probably your Lordships will not think it irrelevant if I state the result of conversations which I have had to-day with one of the greatest dealers in the Metropolis, and a large job-master. The dealer sells horses of all kinds, hunters, hacks, and carriage horses, and it is of course his interest to represent that there is extreme difficulty in procuring good horses, and that it is, therefore, necessary to ask very high prices for them. He told me that there was at present a greater demand than at any previous time for a very beautiful class of horses with very high action, and that any price could be got for them; but he said, "If you ask me for a fair opinion whether you find fewer horses than you used to do combining great strength with high breeding, I believe that, notwithstanding the drain for the foreign market, there are quite as many to be obtained as formerly." The jobmaster to whom I intended to apply for information was not at home when I called; but his foreman said, "Oh, complaints that you cannot find good horses are universal; but it is fair to say that I have been a long time in the job trade, and I never remember a period at which exactly the same complaints were not made." This is confirmed by the observation of the noble Chairman of Committees that so much as 120 years ago complaints were made that there had been a frightful deterioration in the breed of horses. This is, in fact, one of those complaints which are constantly made, but which, when examined into, prove entirely without foundation. As far as I can see, there are no precedents whatever for such a measure as this. The clause to which my noble Friend referred as furnishing such authority was repealed a few years afterwards, and in the Index to the Statutes I can find no reference to any proposition of a similar kind connected with the subject of racing. For these reasons I certainly am not inclined to support the Bill of my noble Friend. Without professing to give an opinion that it may not be desirable that the Jockey Club should fairly consider this question, at any rate I do not think it is one with which your Lordships ought to interfere. There has lately been too much desire to legislate upon every possible question, and I am persuaded that that desire ought to be checked rather than encouraged. There is an old maxim, de minimis non curat lex, which I think may fairly be translated, "Do not legislate for feather weights."

Earl Granville

THE EARL OF DERBY: Doubtless your Lordships have received a great deal of edification and amusement from the speeches that have been delivered in the course of this debate, and no doubt my noble Friend who introduced this Bill has likewise received a great deal of edification and instruction on this topic; but I hope your Lordships will not think it disrespectful on my part, on a subject of this kind, to say that I think your Lordships as a body are hardly competent to judge of the merits of the question, notwithstanding that you have received so much support in your deliberations by so full a bench of the right rev. Bishops—we are hardly, I think, so competent to deal with such a question as the present as those who have devoted more of their attention to the subject, and who take a deeper interest in the pursuits of the turf. I am anxious to state in a few words how far I concur and how far I differ from my noble Friend the Chairman of Committees in the objects which he seeks to effect by the prevention of malpractices, the improvement of the breed of horses, and, to a certain extent, the protection of the jockeys themselves, both low weights and high weights. These objects I conceive most desirable ones; but, on the other hand, I think I can show my noble Friend that his Bill will not in the slightest degree attain them. I concur with my noble Friend the President of the Council that unless a very strong case is made out it is most undesirable that your Lordships and Parliament should legislate upon a subject of this description. No doubt if there is a great object to be attained, or a great and gross abuse to be put down, and legislation will effect the object or put down the abuse, that would be a justification for the interference of the Legislature even with such a subject as this. But is that the case? My noble Friend believes that there is a great deal of gambling, especially that species of gambling produced by handicaps. Now, I so far concur with my noble Friend that I very much regret the increase of handicaps compared with weight-for-age races which has recently taken place. At the same time, I see that in the present state of the turf it would be impossible entirely to abandon handicaps without putting an end to many county meetings, and thus losing a great deal of harmless amusement. I do not deny that handicaps afford considerable facilities for fraudulent practices; but that does not at all depend upon the more or less weight which the horses are to carry. The object of those who subscribe to and enter their horses for handicaps is to deceive the handicapper, not with regard to the positive, but with regard to the relative weight-carrying qualities of their horses. My noble Friend said that horses are kept in training for these handicaps which would not continue in training if they did not exist. That may be so; but, on the other hand, if my noble Friend examines the statistics of the turf he will find that horses are now kept in training for a much shorter period than they used to be, and that a comparison between the young and old horses formerly and at the present day shows a considerable difference. Some days ago, with reference to this Bill, I looked up some statistics, and they will be interesting, as enabling us to compare the ages of the horses that ran in 1829 and 1859. I have only the ages of those that ran and won in 1829, and of the running horses in 1859, but the figures enable us to compare the ages of the horses. In 1829, of the winning horses there were of two-year-olds fifty-five, of three-year-olds 194, and of four-year-olds and upwards 279. The total was 528 horses. The proportion of two-year-olds to three-year-olds was as two to seven, and the proportion the two-year-olds bore to the whole number was one to nine and a half. I find that, in 1859, 1,666 horses started for the different races, of which number 588 were two-year-olds. 504 were three-year-olds, and 574 were four-year-olds and upwards. While the proportion of two-year-olds to three-year-olds was as two to seven in 1829 it was in 1859 as eight to seven. The proportion of two-year-olds to those above them, which was in 1829 about one to nine, was in 1859 more than one to three. I mention these facts to show that there was a much larger proportion of old to young horses formerly than at the present time. My noble Friend objects to these handicaps that they tend to discourage the good horses, and to give great advantages to bad and inferior horses. Now, the very character of a handicap is, that you must frame your handicap so as to give a moderate three-year-old as fair a chance of winning as a superior five or six-year-old. If, therefore, you began with 7 stone, the consequence would be that in all handicaps the superior old horses would have to carry 11 stone and 12 stone, and the handicaps run would be left to inferior horses, which would have the advantage of being ridden by jockeys instead of boys. The good horses would then be excluded from handicaps, while at present they have a fair chance. But when my noble Friend says that horses that cannot carry 6 stone ought not to be kept in training, and are good for nothing, I assure him he is quite mistaken, for I could mention horses that with 6 stone on their backs cannot live at a racing pace for three minutes, but yet are competent to carry my noble Friend over a cross country for hours, and to keep up with the hounds. You cannot, in all cases, have lasting qualities accompanied by the enormous effort and great speed of racing; but it does not follow because a horse cannot carry 6 stone in a mile and a half race and live, that he belongs to an inferior class of animals, and is incapable of being made useful for hunting purposes. My noble Friend says it is more difficult to get good hunters now than it used to be; but I must remind him that hunting is a very different thing now from what it formerly was. Perhaps my noble Friend would like to turn out at six in the morning, go on a long, slow drag before he found his fox, and then ride after it at six or seven miles an hour for the remainder of the day. If he wants a class of horses suited for that kind of work, I admit he would not find them in handicaps. But if he inquires how horses can best combine bone, blood, speed, and endurance, I believe that the character of English horses never stood higher, and that in these qualities they are unmatched by any country in the world. If my noble Friend thinks that to prevent gambling on the turf all that is necessary is to do away with light weights, let him go to a steeplechase. I never saw but one, and never wish to see another. But there they have heavy weights, old horses, and long courses. No boys are put upon horses in these steeplechases, the lightest weight put up being 8st. 7lb. A steeplechase, therefore, combines all my noble Friend's requirements; and yet I will venture to say that, with regard to the character of the horses, the gambling, the fraudulent practices, the danger to horses and men, and the number of serious accidents, there is no comparison whatever between the ordinary racing with boys of light weight and steeplechasing. I do not deny that there are evils inseparable from handicaps; I regret their prevalence; but they do not depend either on the lightness or the heaviness of the weights, but on the character of the horses themselves. That which is really the cause of a great deal of the evil and the deterioration in the breed of horses is the way in which the animals are forced forward, owing to the vast preponderance of two-year-old races. The consequence is that young horses are called upon for exertions far beyond their strength, and great numbers of horses are broken down, while others are entered without reference to their carrying light weights, or to their competency to stand the work, because being brought out as two-year-olds they may, over a long course, have an advantage and answer the purpose of gambling, and winning the large stakes which are attached to these two-year-old races. I do not wish to put down all two-year-old races by legislation, but I should like to induce members of the turf, in the interest of the turf and of the breeders of horses, to see if some intervention and regulation are not possible. If not, your Lordships would do much better absolutely to prohibit all two-year-old races than to raise the weights of the jockeys. One reason why it is desirable that practically the weights should be somewhat higher than they are at present is not on account of the danger to little boys or the argument which my noble Friend has brought forward, but on account of the great difficulty you have in procuring jockeys to ride old horses in the present competition with the light-weight system. As soon as a jockey arrives at the weight of 8st. 7lb. he has comparatively little opportunity of riding, for the great amount of riding is monopolized by boys of from 6st. 5lb. to 7st. 12lb. When jockeys arrive at 8st. 5lb. the labour they have to undergo to bring themselves down to racing weights has cost the life of many respectable men, and is attended with great danger to others. I will only say that this matter is under the serious consideration of the Jockey Club. Notice has been given of a motion at their next meeting for raising the weights on the Derby and some other races from 8st. 7lb. to 8st. 10lb. A proposal is also under the consideration of the Jockey Club, which has my cordial concurrence, to enable them to raise the weights on handicaps to a minimum of 5st. 7lb. I assure your Lordships that many boys can ride as well as any men, and would be perfect masters of their horses under circumstances where my noble Friend would find himself in a considerable "fix." The improvement of the breed of horses and the prevention of gambling are very desirable objects; but I do not think they will be touched or promoted by the measure of my noble Friend. I think that he has not established such a case as will induce your Lordships to enter upon legislation where all previous legislation has proved a failure. I assure my noble Friend that the subject is under the consideration of the Jockey Club, and that this year will probably not pass without some legislation in the direction of his wishes. I therefore trust, after the opinions expressed by your Lordships, that my noble Friend will not give us the trouble of dividing, but will consent to withdraw the Bill.

The Earl of Derby

LORD REDESDALE replied. He thought no better proof of the necessity for increasing the weight could be given than the returns quoted by the noble Earl. They proved most clearly that a system equally injurious to the breed of horses and to the best interests of the turf had sprung up of late years in connection with the light weight handicaps; that the evil was increasing, and that reform in racing matters was urgently required. He considered the noble Earl's speech to be in fact favourable to his proposition; but after the promise he had given that if the Jockey Club would take the matter in hand he would not persevere with it, he had no choice but to act in accordance with that promise, after the assurance which the noble Earl had given to him and to the House on the part of the stewards of the Jockey Club, who had selected him to present their petition, and empowered him to enter into that engagement on their behalf. He would, therefore, ask leave of the House to withdraw his Motion for the second reading, and if the Amendment was also withdrawn, he would then, with the permission of the House, withdraw the Bill. He might be permitted to say, however, that there was strong evidence that the introduction of the Bill had led to the serious consideration of this subject, and therefore he should always feel satisfied with himself for having brought it forward. He would add, that none of the arguments which had been brought forward proved that the subject was one with which the Legislature ought not to interfere. If the Jockey Club should by new rules put down the abuses complained of, and if what they proposed met with universal submission from the racing world, legislation would be both unnecessary and undesirable. But the interests of the dishonest members of that society were opposed to the establishment of a sound system, and he feared not only that the Club rules, if carried to the required extent, would be resisted in some quarters, but still more that the Club may be deterred from doing all that they ought from an apprehension of such resistance. If such should be the case, he trusted they would not hesitate to apply to Parliament for a law to enforce their rules, and he was satisfied that whatever they asked for would be granted.

Amendment and original Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn, and the Bill also withdrawn.

DUCHY OF CORNWALL (LIMITATION OF ACTIONS) BILL.

COMMITTEE.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE moved that the House go into Committee on this Bill, and stated his belief that the Bill would have the effect of placing the Duchy of Cornwall and landed proprietors in the neighbourhood, on the best possible footing.

LORD VIVIAN said, he could assure the noble Duke that great jealousy existed in the minds of those holding property within the bounds of the Duchy, in consequence of the sharp practice exhibited by those charged with the management of its affairs. Those who held lands "in charge" thought that they had been very hardly treated by the agents of the Duchy, and unless these lands held "in charge" were exempted from the operation of the Bill he should move clauses to effect that object.

House in Committee.

Clause 1 (9 Geo. III., cap. 16, to extend to the Duke of Cornwall.)

On the Motion of Lord KINGSDOWN the following addition was made to the clause.

("Subject nevertheless as to the Property and Possessions included in this Act to the Provisions contained in Sections Seventy-two and Seventy-five of the Act of the Seventh and Eighth Years of Her Majesty above referred to with respect to the Property and Possessions included therein.")

LORD VIVIAN complained that a case had occurred in which parties were refused access to the records of the Duchy, except on condition that they would not oppose this Bill.

LORD PORTMAN said, that there was a sharp practice in manner and a sharp practice in action. They were not pleasant words to use in any case, but few men were able to conduct public business in the soft and oily way which would probably satisfy the noble Lord. He certainly denied that there had been any sharp practice on the part of the Duchy in action. It had been found most difficult to recover and maintain the rights of the Duke of Cornwall, which in past times had suffered material damage.

LORD CHURSTON stated that cases had come to his knowledge, and things were said to be done by order of the Duchy, which, if they did not actually amount to sharp practice, certainly savoured of it.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE observed, with regard to the inspection of Duchy records, that in the case of Crown records, any person who asked to examine them was called upon to state whether he wished to do so for the purpose of opposing the rights of the Crown, and unless he stated that that was not his object, he was not allowed to inspect them. He believed that if an inquiry were instituted by impartial persons into the management of the Duchy property, it would be found that, so far from sharp practices having been resorted to, there had been a desire to act with the greatest possible leniency in maintaining the rights of the Duchy, which, in some instances, had been sacrificed for noble Lords and hon. Gentlemen, who now came forward to complain. The noble Lord said that there was a feeling of uneasiness in Cornwall on the subject, and no doubt if a person had got property which did not belong to him, he might feel uneasy when the rightful owner came forward to claim it. With regard to the present Bill, if the opponents of the measure thought it no boon, let them say so, and he would at once give it up; but it was not fair towards the managers of the Duchy estates, nor to the illustrious Prince, who was about to come into the property, to make accusations of "sharp practice." If any persons had such charges to make, let them bring those charges forward distinctly before the Duchy Council, and they would be investigated, and, if found substantial, the grievance would be remedied.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, he could bear testimony to the fact that "sharp practice" did not always originate with the managers of Crown property, but was very often practised against that property. He believed his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales to be justly entitled to every farthing that could be properly obtained from the property assigned for the maintenance of his dignity.

LORD VIVIAN said, he should be rejoiced to see his Royal Highness receive every farthing to which he was entitled. He had spoken on behalf of others, and not from any interested motives of his own.

Lord Portman

LORD KINGSDOWN did not believe that during the twenty years he had been a member of the Council of the Duchy, upon any one occasion, upon any one subject, in reference to any one appointment or other act, there had been a single object in view except that of discharging honestly and faithfully the duties imposed upon the members.

LORD PORTMAN acknowledged that there had been a strong expression of feeling in the Duchy, but he was sure it was not well founded.

Clause, as Amended, agreed to.

LORD VIVIAN then moved to insert the following clause.

"Provided always, That Section Seventy-two of the said Act of the Seventh and Eighth Years of Her Majesty shall be and the same is hereby incorporated with this Act, and shall be read as Part thereof; provided also, that no Manors, Lands, Tenements, or Hereditaments, or the Rents, Revenues, Issues, or Profits thereof, shall be deemed to be or to have been duly in charge to the Duke of Cornwall so long as any Person or Corporation shall be or shall have been in possession of such Manors, Lands, Tenements, Rents, Tithes, or Hereditaments, or in the Receipt of the Rents, Revenues, Issues, or Profits thereof, adversely to the Duke of Cornwall."

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, he must oppose the clause.

Motion, by leave of the Committee, withdrawn.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

The Report of the Amendment to be received on Friday next.

UNION OF BENEFICES BILL.

COMMITTEE—(ON RE-COMMITMENT).

Order of the Day for receiving the Report of the Amendments read.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH suggested that as notice had been given of many Amendments it would be better that the Bill should be re-committed, in order that the new clauses should be considered.

Order discharged; and Bill re-committed to a Committee of the whole House forthwith; House in Committee accordingly.

Clauses 1 to 11 agreed to.

Clause added to enable an exchange of patronage.

Clause 15, (Site of Church to be pulled down not to be sold or let without certain Consents.)

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD moved an Amendment. He had no objection to sell the sites of the removed churches; but there were certain cases in which the ground itself under the churches had been consecrated for the burial of the dead. He contended that where the Church had pledged herself in the most solemn manner to maintain for ever a certain parcel of ground it was monstrous that she should afterwards come to Parliament and ask for power to break her pledge, for the purpose of taking advantage of the increased value of the land so consecrated. The deeds of consecration of a church and of a burial-ground were essentially different. One consecrated a building for the purposes of worship, the other set apart a portion of ground from all profane uses for ever. He saw no objection to selling the site of a church to which no consecrated burial-ground was attached, because the occasion for which the consecration of the building took place having passed away, and it being for the glory of God and his increased worship and service that the church was to be removed, he did not see any objection to selling the ground on which the church stood. But it was different with the churchyards in which the dead were buried. It might be said that the same objection applied to churches in which dead were buried in the vaults; but his Amendment did not touch them, because in the first place the vaults being constructed in the ground under the church, and the church alone being consecrated, there could be no objection to the removal of the coffins, as they would have to be removed in any case should this Bill pass; but at all events it would throw on those who objected to the sale of such sites the onus of proving that the ground was consecrated, which would be almost impossible.

Amendment moved, after ("Department") to insert ("nor if it shall have been consecrated for the Burial of the Dead.")

EARL GRANVILLE said, he was quite at a loss to know how any objection could be raised to the sale of the sites in question, when it was notorious that ground of a similar character had been sold to railway companies; and surely, when the sole object of the Bill was to provide increased facilities for the worship of God, the most tender conscience could not object.

THE BISHOP OF CASHEL could not see any difference between selling the site of a church and a burial-ground, seeing that both were consecrated.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD thought that his right rev. Brother misapprehended the question. In the one case it was the church and not the site that was consecrated, and in the other it was the ground itself. The church might be removed, but the bodies of the dead remained in the churchyard by which it was surrounded.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, that the distinction drawn by his right rev. Brother was so very fine that he could hardly understand it. He could understand the Church being held to the strict performance of all her contracts, but he could not comprehend why she should be allowed to depart from them in the case of churches, and be prohibited from doing so in the case of burial-grounds. His right rev. Brother had no objection to the sale of the site of a church under which hundreds of corpses might have been buried, but the consecration of which for burial it was impossible to prove. The operation of the clause would, therefore, on his own statement, be nugatory. He looked upon this as an insidious attack intended to destroy the whole of the Bill, for if it were carried the good effects of the measure would be rendered entirely nugatory.

THE EARL OF POWIS supported the Amendment. This point had been settled in a Bill which was passed five years ago. They ought not for a few thousand pounds to shake the confidence of the people in the permanence of these sites for burial-grounds.

THE BISHOP OF ST. DAVID'S did not think the argument of the right rev. Prelate who moved the Amendment had been at all shaken. This was a Bill for Church purposes, and the question was, would the advantage arising from the sale of these sites, cover the loss arising from the violation of the contract created by the consecration of these burial-grounds?

LORD CRANWORTH said, that it would be extremely difficult for any one to prove that a particular piece of land had been specially consecrated as a place of burial; and the result of the adoption of the Amendment would merely be to raise uncertainty as regarded the title, and persons would not purchase unless at a diminished value to cover the risk.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, if there was any great public necessity for the sale of these sites, he should not object to the measure; but when he found that no such necessity existed, he was disposed to support the Amendment.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, that in order to meet the objection of the noble and learned Lord, he had no objection to add the following words, "Provided also that the validity of such sale should not be questioned by reason of any allegation that the ground had been consecrated." It should be recollected that this was a Bill for Church purposes, and it was not for the Church to propose to disturb these contracts, which were made by the Church, and consecrated by her.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, the sale of a church or a burying-ground was as repugnant to his feelings as a layman as it could be to that of a clergyman, and he would only consent to it in cases of extreme necessity; but the Amendment of the right rev. Prelate would, in point of fact, put an end to the practical working of the measure. He regretted that such a Bill as the present should not have been taken up by the Government, as without their assistance the right rev. Prelate would never be able to carry such a measure as would produce the full effect desired. Surely, if they were willing that these sites should be sold for the benefit of railway companies, they would not object that they should be sold for purposes of a purely religious character. The Bill would to a certain extent be useful, but this great question could never be fully settled till it was taken up by the Government.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK said, that believing that the measure was one of great public necessity, he would support the clause as it stood.

THE BISHOP OF SALISBURY was opposed to the removal of any churches. Let the pews be removed, and good clergymen placed in them, and congregations would be drawn thither.

After a few words from EARL GRANVILLE,

On Question, Whether the said Words shall be there inserted? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 10; Not-Contents 21: Majority 11.

CONTENTS.

Marlborough, D.	Oxford, Bp.
Carnarvon, E. [Teller.]	Salisbury, Bp.
Powis, E. [Teller.]	St. David's, Bp.
Romney, E.	Denham, L.
Hutchinson, V. (E.)	Lyttelton, L.
Donoughmore.)

NOT-CONTENTS.

Campbell, L. (L. Chancellor.)	Somerset, D.
Newcastle, D.	De Grey, E. [Teller.]
	Ducie, E.
The Bishop of Oxford

Granville, E.
St. Germans, E.
Bangor, Bp.
Carlisle, Bp.
Cashel, &c., Bp.
Derry and Raphoe, Bp.
Durham, Bp.
Lincoln, Bp.

London, Bp.
Ripon, Bp.
Cranworth, L.
Dartrey, (L. Cremorne.)
Harris, L.
Kingsdown, L.
Wensleydale, L.
Wodehouse, L. [Teller.]

Clauses 15 to 21 agreed to.

Clause 22 (Providing Funds for Payment of Expenses of carrying Act into execution).

THE EARL OF POWIS said, he thought it extremely undesirable that when a sum of money had been raised by the sale of these sites, a portion of it should be locked up to remain as a fund for future speculative alterations. It would be merely a temptation to the schemers who surrounded the office of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, to propose useless plans for making away with this money.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON submitted that the objection would be met by an alteration, of which he had given notice; and after a short conversation,

Clause agreed to.

Clause 27 (Appropriation of Seats in Church of United Parish).

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD objected to the power given to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to meddle with pews. He believed the right rev. Prelate had no objection to the Amendment which he had proposed, namely, to leave the Bishop to deal with them by faculty.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, the opinion he held on this subject might be unpopular, but he objected to pews altogether. It was the old custom, before the Reformation, that there should be no pews at all; and in the church which he attended they had been swept away. Whenever he went to church, he sat with the rest of the people, without the smallest distinction; and it appeared to him that nothing could be so inconsistent with the feelings with which a man ought to attend Divine worship as that he should box himself up in a pew. Take power by all means to knock pews down, but do not provide for building them up again.

Then it was moved to add the following Schedule.

"The Metropolis (including all Places comprehended in that expression, as defined in the Act 18 and 19 Vict. Cap. 120, intituled 'An Act for the better Local Management of the Metropolis')."

"Cities of—"

"York, Exeter,
"Lincoln, Norwich."

The same was agreed to.

The Report of the Amendments to be received on Thursday next.

LORD REDESDALE gave notice of some further alterations which he would move on the third reading. Amongst them was a proposal to give powers for re-seating churches without a union of benefices. There were a great number of sacred edifices in the City, in which there was no provision whatever for those casual visitors, of whom there were always many in London. Last Sunday, however, he was at one (St. Michael's, Cornhill,) that had been admirably restored, and there he found exactly the arrangement which he thought desirable. There was a large congregation; and it appeared to him that if a similar course were adopted at some other of the larger and handsomer City churches—Bow church, for instance—the same result would follow.

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS JURISDICTION BILL.

THIRD READING. BILL PASSED.

Bill read 3^d (according to Order).

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD proposed an Amendment rendering it penal to be guilty of any indecent behaviour in a church, whether during Divine service or at any other time. This was intended to meet the case of persons staying behind after service to sing hymns, which was one of the forms which indecent conduct had lately assumed.

LORD CRANWORTH said, that the Bill was aimed against indecent behaviour in churches at any time; and therefore he did not see the utility of the proposal.

Amendment withdrawn.

LORD WENSLEYDALE proposed a clause somewhat mitigating the penalties imposed by the statute of Philip and Mary, but re-enacting the power which was given by that Act to any person to seize and convey before a magistrate any one offending in church.

LORD CRANWORTH did not propose to repeal the Act of Philip and Mary, so that any portion of it which remained in force would continue to do so; but he begged their Lordships not to be led by their indignation at what had recently been taking place to enact a provision so little in accordance with the general spirit of our law as to give any person power to seize any other person—not in flagrante delicto, but at any time—and to convey him before a magistrate on a charge of misbehaviour in a church. It had been said that "hard cases made bad law;" but let them not make bad legislation.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR also opposed the Amendment, saying that, although he was as anxious as anybody to put an end to such disgraceful scenes as had recently occurred, he did not think that this was the proper way to attempt it.

Amendment negatived.

Amendments made.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

House adjourned at Ten o'clock, till To-morrow, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, June 12, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1st Criminal Lunatic Asylum; Passing Tolls; Burial Grounds (Ireland).
3rd Councillors of Burghs and Burgesses (Scotland).

ANNUITY TAX ABOLITION (EDINBURGH) BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Annuity Tax abolished).

MR. BLACKBURN said, he thought that power should be given to the Commissioners to recover the arrears of the tax, and he would therefore propose, in line eight, after the word "imposed," to add, "and all arrears of the said tax then due shall be payable to the Commissioners hereinafter appointed, who shall have power to collect and recover the same." He did not know whether the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Black) was still in arrear, but he believed that he was so some time ago.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he was opposed to the Amendment, inasmuch as it would have the effect of making it obligatory on the Commissioners to recover the arrears. He was of opinion that the recovery of the arrears should not be dealt with at all by the Bill, but left to the discretion of the Commissioners.

MR. BLACK said, it was perfectly true as had been stated that he had for a considerable time refused to pay the annuity tax, and his object in thus acting was to make the condition of the clergy so uncomfortable that they would be ready to agree to any reasonable proposition which might be made for the settlement of this question. He considered the proposition made by the present measure was a very fair one, and, therefore, he should not continue to withhold the payment of the tax. He had no objection to the principle involved in the Amendment, but he believed that if they left the collection of arrears in the hands of the Commissioners, they would consider themselves bound to secure every farthing of arrears from the inhabitants of Edinburgh, which would have the effect of continuing the irritation in regard to this question. On this ground he should oppose the Amendment.

M

Mr. DUNLOP said, that he thought that if the object was really to promote peace, it would be much better not to press the Amendment.

Mr. MURE observed that he was of the same opinion.

Mr. BLACKBURN said, that as the feeling of the Committee was opposed to him, he should not press the Amendment.

Amendment withdrawn; Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 (Commissioners appointed).

Mr. CAIRD said, he objected to the composition of the Commission, which was to administer the affairs of the churches, on account of the undue preponderance given to the legal bodies. The three legal bodies of Edinburgh, who contributed only a very small proportion of the tax, ought to have only one representative instead of three. The other two representatives should be conferred on the Kirk Sessions. He should propose an Amendment by which the appointment of one Commissioner would be placed in the hands of the three legal bodies in Edinburgh, and to leave three to be appointed by the Kirk Sessions.

Mr. BLACK said, he agreed with the hon. Gentleman that those legal bodies contributed a very small proportion of the tax, but on the whole he would be better pleased to have the Commissioners elected by the legal bodies than by the Kirk Sessions.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he held that the legal bodies, being now liable to the impost, were entitled to three representatives on account of their weight and intelligence.

Mr. DUNLOP observed that he was in favour of the Amendment.

Mr. MURE said, he had placed a notice on the paper to amend the constitution of the Commission by declaring that one of such Commissioners should be elected by the Kirk Session of the Tron Church.

Mr. Black

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he was prepared to modify the clause, and to place the appointment of the Commissioners in the hands of the legal bodies, the Merchant Companies, and the Kirk Sessions. The legal bodies to appoint one, the Merchant Companies to appoint one, and three to be appointed by the Kirk Sessions, who were to be composed of all the parochial churches of Edinburgh. In that way the total number of Commissioners would be raised from ten to eleven.

Clause, as amended, agreed to; as was also Clause 4.

Clause 5 (Commissioners to appoint an Agent and Secretary).

Mr. BLACKBURN said, he wished to move as an Amendment, to insert the word "property," after the word "of" in line fifteen, in order that the property in the churches should be transferred to the Commissioners as well as the administration of them. He thought it quite clear that those who ministered and maintained the churches ought to be the proprietors of them. Why should the churches remain in some anomalous way the property of the town council, to be quarrelled for hereafter, and to give the council a right of interference.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 15, after the word "of," to insert the word "property."

Mr. BLACK remarked that he should oppose the Amendment. The churches were all built by the inhabitants of Edinburgh, who had laid out immense sums upon them, and it was not because they gave up their administration that they should be divested of their rights of property.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON remarked that the inhabitants would be represented in the Commission as well as in the Council.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he thought it advisable to allow the property of the churches to remain vested in the Corporation.

Mr. MURE admitted that the churches had been built by the inhabitants, but thought it was absurd to suppose that the Commissioners would do more to deteriorate their value than the Town Council, in whom they were at present vested.

Question put, "That the word 'property' be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 40; Noes 78: Majority 38.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 6 (Property of the City Churches transferred from the Magistrates and Council to the Commissioners).

MR. LOCKHART said, he proposed in line 34, after "respectively," to insert "with the exception of not less than one-tenth of the number which shall be reserved as free sittings for the use of the poor." His object was to secure a certain amount of accommodation for the poor.

MR. BLACK said, he opposed the Amendment. He thought if such a proposition were assented to the Commissioners might be prevented from raising the funds necessary under the Bill.

MR. BLACKBURN observed that at present the seats were let by the magistrates, but their authority was much disputed. The Bill gave to the Commissioners the right of letting the seats, and it certainly ought to provide that a certain proportion should be reserved for the poor, who were unable to pay for accommodation.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that while thoroughly sympathising in the object which the hon. Member had in view, he believed it would be better attained by leaving the matter to the discretion of the Commissioners than by allotting a limited number of free seats to the poor. He might add that he was not aware that in any of the churches in Scotland there was a want of seats set apart for the poor. If, however, it were the general feeling that the Amendment was necessary he should not oppose it.

MR. LOCKHART said, that as he read the clause, the Commissioners had no alternative but to let the whole of the seats.

COLONEL SYKES said, he should at all times support any proposition for giving proper accommodation to the poor in churches.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON remarked that they ought to establish in the Bill the principle that a certain portion of the seats in the various churches should be set apart for the use of the poor as free seats.

MR. CUMMING BRUCE supported the Amendment, in order to establish the principle that a certain portion of each church should be devoted to the use of the poor.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the principle which ought to be adopted was not the distinctive allocation of so many pauper seats, but the exemption of a certain class of persons from the payment of seat-rents.

There was a strong feeling in Scotland against the poor being limited to a certain part of the church.

MR. BLACK submitted that in the churches of Edinburgh, at all events, there had never been any complaint of want of accommodation for the poor, although it was true in the church of St. Andrew there were no free sittings.

MR. CUMMING BRUCE said, it appeared to him that the example quoted by the hon. Member for Edinburgh was a sound reason for the adoption of the Amendment. He was desirous of extending the operation of the clause to the church of St. Andrew.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he would vindicate the rights of the poor to free sittings in the churches of Scotland as well as in those of this country.

MR. HOPE remarked, that the system of free seats worked very well in England, and also in the country districts of Scotland. There was no reason why, if it were tried, it would not also operate beneficially in the towns of Scotland.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he would suggest the omission of the words "for the use of the poor."

Amendment, with this alteration, agreed to; Clause agreed to; as was also Clause 7.

Clause 8 (Commissioners to provide for the Repair of the Churches and other Expenses out of the Surplus of the Seat Rents, and to invest the Balance remaining).

MR. BLACKBURN said, he could assert that after paying £600 a year to thirteen ministers of Edinburgh, the funds provided by the Bill would leave no margin whatever for the expenses of the Commission, and the possible, indeed during the next year or two, almost inevitable diminution in the amount of the seat-rents. There ought also to be some provision for the two suspended parishes. He would therefore move an Amendment to the effect that the amount of annuity tax to be raised should be £5,000, instead of £4,200.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 37, to leave out the words "four thousand two hundred," and insert the words "five thousand,"—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words 'four thousand two hundred' stand part of the Clause."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he should oppose the Amendment, as contrary to the whole spirit of the Bill. The principle of the Bill was that it was a fair settlement of the question to make provision for thirteen ministers; but if the Amendment were adopted, it would entirely set aside that arrangement.

MR. MACKIE suggested as a compromise that the sum to be raised should be £4,500.

MR. BLACK said, the Town Council of Edinburgh complained that £4,200 was too much, and thought £4,000 would be quite sufficient.

MR. MURE said, that the provision made by the Bill was wholly inadequate to secure a salary of £600 a year for each of the thirteen clergymen whose interests were affected, and at the same time to defray the expenses of the Commission. The people of Edinburgh ought not to object to raise £5,000 a year when the object for which it was raised would relieve them of a tax which at present amounted to £15,000 a year.

MR. BLACK said, the people of Edinburgh believed that the amount to be derived from seat-rents was considerably underrated, and that more than ample provision was made both for the clergy and for the expense of the Commission.

MR. MURE said, he was confident that under the present arrangement there would not be enough money to pay the salaries of the ministers for the first few years of the new system. The proposed addition to the tax was so very trifling, not a farthing in the pound, that he hoped it would be conceded.

MR. BLACK called in question the data upon which the hon. Member (Mr. Mure) based his calculations. He thought that any attempt to increase the amount proposed would have the effect of occasioning irritation among the people of Edinburgh.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he had no doubt that, even if there were any deficiency at the first, the Established Church would find no difficulty in raising the £300 or £400, which might be required. The seat-rents might be increased, and the expenses of collection might be reduced, and the congregation might come forward to take upon themselves the expense of repairing the churches. On the other hand, the Amendment, if insisted on, would have the effect of defeating the settlement which they were on the eve of accomplishing, and which, he was sure, all parties must desire.

MR. DUNLOP said, he thought that the Church had no right to complain of the proposed arrangement. The sum provided was already too large. Nor was there any risk of the clergymen being deprived of the salaries proposed. On the contrary, he was of opinion there would be a considerable augmentation of the funds from the seat-rents.

MR. BUCHANAN said, he was in favour of the suggestion which had been made by the hon. Member for Kirkcudbright (Mr. Mackie) — namely, that the sum should be increased from £4,200 to £4,500.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, the Church of Scotland had already made a great concession in consenting to the reduction of the number of the City clergy; but there was a point beyond which they ought not to go, and that was the point of ensuring the thirteen ministers who were retained a salary of £600 a year. He was of opinion that it was impossible, with a due regard to principle and propriety, to fix less than £4,500 as the settlement.

MR. BLACKBURN said, he would withdraw his proposition in favour of the suggestion of the hon. Member for Kirkcudbright (Mr. Mackie), so that the sum should be fixed at £4,500.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Another Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "two," and insert the word "five," instead thereof.

MR. HADFIELD deprecated the principle of paying the clergymen £600 a year, besides providing means for the collection of the funds.

Question put, "That the word 'two' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 89; Noes 58: Majority 31.

Clauses 8 and 9 were then agreed to.

Clause 10 (Assessment to be collected along with the Police Assessment).

MR. MURE moved, that the following Amendment be added to the Clause:—

"That the tenants or occupiers of any property liable in payment of the said increased police assessment, shall be entitled, and they are hereby authorized, in making payment of the rent of the said property, to retain from such rent the amount of such increased assessment, except in the case where the said property shall, prior to the passing of this Act, have been let for a term of years, in which case the said increased assessment shall be borne by the occupier till the expiry of the period for which the said property was let."

MR. BLACK stated, that every Act relating to this tax that had been passed distinctly provided that it should be levied on occupiers. It would be unjust to the proprietors of Edinburgh to transfer the incidence of the tax to their shoulders. He was, therefore, opposed to the proviso.

MR. BLACKBURN said, he believed that the proposed Amendment would tend to promote peace in the collection of the tax.

SIR WILLIAM DUNBAR observed, that he was of opinion that the Amendment would be an entire departure from the compromise that had been agreed to.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided—Ayes 53; Noes 85: Majority 32.

Clause agreed to; as were also Clauses 10 to 13 inclusive; House resumed; Committee report progress; to sit again on Friday, at Twelve of the clock.

ITALY.—THE SICILIAN INSURRECTION. QUESTION.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to increase our Naval Forces in the Sicilian waters, in order the better to afford aid and shelter to such persons as may claim protection from the English Flag; whether it is intended to communicate to the Court of Naples the abhorrence of Her Majesty's Government of such acts as the recent bombardment of Palermo; whether it is intended to accompany such communication with a recommendation to conduct the War in future upon the rules recognized in civilized warfare; and whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to protest against, and, if necessary, vigorously to endeavour to avert, the interference of any non-Italian Power in the struggle now pending between the King of Naples and his subjects?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, in answer to the first question of my hon. Friend, I have to state that my noble Friend at the head of the Foreign Department has requested the Admiralty to station one ship of war at Marsala, one at Messina, and one at Palermo, and four ships are to be stationed in the Bay of Naples, all for the purpose of affording shelter to the British subjects who may require it. I hope that distribution will be sufficient and satisfactory. With regard to the second question, we understand that the Government of Naples has sent a diplomatic agent to Faria and London, who may very shortly—within two days—be expected to arrive here, for the purpose of making certain communications to the two Governments of France and England. I trust the House will not for a moment doubt that in our communications to that envoy we shall express to him those feelings which Her Majesty's Government, in common with everybody in this country, entertain with regard to the barbarities which have been perpetrated at Palermo—barbarities which are really disgraceful to the present age and civilization. With regard to any expectations that such a representation may have any beneficial effect on the future conduct of the Government of Naples, I cannot venture to lead the House to entertain any very sanguine hope. That Government is far more likely to do that which happened at the sack and massacre of Perugia, where the officer who committed those atrocities received promotion at the hands of the Papal Government. It is more likely, I apprehend, that the naval and military officers who conducted the operations at Palermo, instead of reprimand and punishment, will receive tokens of reward from the Royal Government of Naples. With regard to the last question we know that the Government of Naples has applied for assistance to its foreign allies—assistance in the shape of a guarantee to the King of Naples of the possession of the Two Sicilies. Austria has peremptorily and positively refused to interfere in the affairs of Naples. We have every reason to believe that the determination of the Government of France is similar to that of Austria, and I need not say what is the feeling of the British Government upon a matter of that kind. It is the fault and fortune of Governments like those of Rome and Naples, when, by the cruelties and atrocities committed under their authority, their subjects have been driven to desperation and have revolted, that they appeal to all friendly Powers for assistance to remove the men who are the authors and instigators of the revolution. Those Governments forget that they themselves are the real and original authors and instigators of those revolutionary movements, and if their prayer were granted, and steps taken to accomplish the object they desired, unless, which is very unlikely, they were prepared to alter their own courses, the first, most effectual, and only necessary step would be their own removal.

MILITIA DESERTIONS. QUESTION.

LORD BURGHLEY said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether a Militiaman absenting himself without leave does, in addition to the loss of his day's pay, necessarily forfeit a portion of his bounty; and, if such is the case, whether it may not be advisable to modify this portion of the Militia Act, so that the interference with the bounty should be left to the discretion of the Commanding Officers of the several Regiments?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, the rule now was that if a militiaman absented himself during the whole time of training he forfeited his whole pay; if he were only absent for a portion, it was left to the discretion of a Board of Officers, under the sanction of the Commanding Officer, to decide whether he should forfeit the whole or a portion only. He did not think it necessary, therefore, to make the alteration of the law suggested by the noble Lord.

ELECTION COMMITTEES.

QUESTION.

MR. WARNER said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is intended to introduce any measure for amending the constitution or procedure of Election Committees?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the whole subject of the hon. Gentleman's question had been considered at some length by the Committee appointed to inquire into the Corrupt Practices Act. A good deal of evidence—of very valuable evidence—was taken by them on the matter, which evidence was now on the Table of the House. The result of the deliberations of the Committee had been not to recommend any alteration in the constitution of Election Committees. Therefore he was not prepared to state on behalf of the Government that they had any intention of proposing a Bill to that effect; but it would be necessary before the end of the Session to deal with the question of renewing the Corrupt Practices Act.

COLONIAL MILITARY EXPENDITURE.

QUESTION.

MR. CHILDERS said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether Government will propose to refer to a Select Committee the subject of Colonial Military Expenditure?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that the subject had already occupied the attention of a Committee of the department, which had not been unanimous, but had sent in two Reports, embracing both sides of the question; the Government would deal with the subject without referring it to a Select Committee.

Lord Burghley

HIGHLEIGH PREBENDAL GRAMMAR SCHOOL.—QUESTION.

MR. FREELAND asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When the Return from the Rev. Thomas Brown, with reference to the Highleigh Prebendal School, for which an Address was ordered on the 9th day of February last, would be presented?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, in consequence of the Address to Her Majesty for a Return, a communication was addressed to Mr. Brown soon after the Address was presented, but no notice had been taken by Mr. Brown of the letter of the Secretary of State. No doubt there was an intentional omission to notice the letter, and therefore no further application had been made to the rev. Gentleman.

MILITARY ATTACHES TO FOREIGN COURTS.—QUESTION.

MR. O. STANLEY said he rose to ask, Whether it is true that Colonel Hamilton has been appointed Military Attaché to the Court of Prussia, and whether it is the intention of the Government to appoint Military Attachés to the other Courts of Europe?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The Government of France have appointed Military Attachés to the missions at almost all their Embassies at the principal Courts. The British Government have long had a Military Attaché to the Embassy at Paris, and it has also been thought expedient to appoint one at Berlin. I am not prepared to state the extent to which my noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs intends to carry the system.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I should be glad to know whether the Government of France have lately appointed a Naval Attaché to their Embassy here, and whether Her Majesty's Government intend to appoint a Naval Attaché to the Embassy at Paris.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, the French Government have attached a Naval Officer to the Embassy here. I do not know whether my noble Friend has decided on taking a similar step in respect to our Embassy at Paris.

THE ORGANIZATION OF THE INDIAN ARMY.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that in adverting to an answer given by the Secretary of State for India on the subject of the Indian Army on Friday evening, he would beg to ask, Whether the deliberations which the right hon. Baronet then spoke of were those of the old Council of India in England; and if so, whether they expressed any opinion contrary to the opinion of the Council in India as to the organization of the Local Army?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he was glad that the question of the hon. Baronet had given him an opportunity of re-stating, the answer he had given to a similar question a few nights ago. It was quite true that the Report of the Commissioners upon the organization of the Indian Army had been referred to the Military Committee of the Indian Council, and their Report was among the papers laid upon the Table of the House. He had not taken the opinion of the Council of India collectively upon that Report. As he stated the other night, he had been in constant communication during the whole of the autumn, with almost every Member of the Indian Council upon the subject of the amalgamation of the Indian forces with the army of the Line, and he was well acquainted with their views. Whilst the question was pending before the Cabinet he did not think it desirable to take the opinion of the Council collectively, or to bring the subject before it in a formal shape—for two reasons. In the first place, he undoubtedly thought that he ought to remain unfettered by any discussion of the Council, in which he could hardly avoid taking a part in his discretion as a member of the Cabinet Council of the Empire, by whom the question must ultimately be determined; and, in the next place, no discussion of the Council could lead to any result, because no action could be taken upon it. It seemed to him very undesirable to bring the question before a body by whom action could not be taken, while if the decision of Her Majesty's Government had been in the other sense, no action would have been necessary. The day after the decision had been come to by Her Majesty's Government he stated it to the India Council, and proposed to them to take a formal step, which would give any of them who chose the opportunity of recording their dissent from the decision of Her Majesty's Government. They thought at the time that it was too late for them to do so; and they declined to avail themselves of the opportunity. He was still of opinion that they might fairly and properly have done so, and he gave them the first proper opportunity in his power of dissenting from a decision of the Secretary of State in Council, to be taken by him consequent on the determination of the Government of the country. They said, at the same time, they wished it to be understood, as he knew before, that their opinions were adverse to the amalgamation. He had stated this to his colleagues in the Cabinet at the time, and he stated it to the House the other night; but in justice to the Indian Council he was glad to add that they expressed themselves perfectly ready to abide by the decision of Parliament and of Government, and that, however much they might be opposed to the measure, they would do their best to carry it out.

BOARD OF ADMIRALTY.

COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

ADMIRAL DUNCOMBE said, he rose to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the Constitution of the Board of Admiralty, and the various duties devolving thereon. He was not insensible to the responsibility attaching to the course which he was about to take, or the differences of opinion existing as to the constitution and duties of the Board of Admiralty. It was not his intention to make any observations which could be supposed to imply a censure upon the mode in which either the present or the past Boards of Admiralty had discharged their functions. His endeavour would be merely to show that some alteration and modification might be made with a view of strengthening the naval administration of the country. He believed that the Gentlemen composing the various Boards of Admiralty had all endeavoured, as far as circumstances permitted, to do their duty. Their term of office was so short that, as "new brooms swept clean," they would naturally endeavour to discharge their duties faithfully. It was with the system, and not the individuals, that the faults lay to which he desired to call attention. The various articles which had appeared in the newspapers of every shade of politics, adverting to the shortcomings, the miscalculations, and the enormous outlay in the Admiralty department, could not fail to have attracted attention. Formerly, and for the many years that he had the honour of a seat in that House, the Naval Estimates, with the exception of the statements made by the Government officials, and the remarks of those naval officers who might happen to be Members of Parliament, were allowed to pass without comment. But at present the interest taken in the subject was very great. His right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), the hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Biscoe), the hon. Member for Ripon (Mr. Warre), and other hon. Members, none of them connected with the navy, had manifested great interest in the Naval Administration of the country. In fact, there existed throughout the country a desire that our Naval Administration should be as perfect as it was possible for human wisdom to render it. Whatever might have been the causes of this increased interest in the subject, whether it had been created by the events of the Russian war, by the complaints made of the transport department, by the recent shipment of a force to China, by the large and inevitably expensive repairs of our steam fleet, or by the discovery of the defective state of the gunboats—certain it was that a great desire had been awakened for inquiry into our naval system, and to remodel it in accordance with the requirements of the present day. Committees having been granted in reference to the transport service, and the construction of the gunboats, it would be unpardonable in him to occupy the time of the House on those points; but he might express his surprise that more effective supervision had not been exercised, and that if the time of the dockyard officers had been too fully occupied, the services of officers who, from their experience afloat, were good judges of materials and workmanship, had not been rendered available for this purpose. When, some short time ago, an hon. Gentleman moved for leave to introduce a Bill relating to the construction of piers and harbours, the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty opposed it, on the ground that the Board was already overworked. That, he thought, was not a valid reason for the opposition. The different departments, if properly organized, could never be overworked; for the strength would be increased or diminished, as circumstances required. If the Admiralty were, nautically speaking, "undermanned," it was necessary to adapt the institution to the requirements of the country. In 1832

Admiral Duncombe

the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham) when First Lord of the Admiralty, abolished the Navy Board. Great evils had admittedly arisen from the conflict of authority, and he did not question either the policy or the ability of the right hon. Gentleman. Affairs had gone on smoothly for a number of years, as long as there was no pressure on the department; but during the last six or eight years, when the reconstruction of the navy, and the difficulty of manning the fleet, had forced themselves upon our attention; and when the novelties which modern science had introduced into every department, entailed the necessity of increased supervision and expense, it became evident that the machinery of the Board of Admiralty must undergo extension and adaptation to the altered circumstances. It was with the object of discovering what improvements or modifications were required, and with a view of accommodating the system to the sentiments of the nation in the present day, that he brought forward this Motion. The noble Lord might say he had no right to make objections, without being able to show that what he proposed would be an improvement. If his opinions had any weight in the Committee, he thought the suggestions he should be disposed to make would be improvements of the present system. He would recommend that the First Lord of the Admiralty should be a Minister of Marine, and be placed on the same footing as the Minister of War. Of course he would have a seat in the Cabinet, and would conduct the political and diplomatic part of the business connected with that office. The Board of Admiralty should be entirely a Naval Board; he said this without any disparagement of the present civilians on it; he knew from experience that many points came before them for decision, on which decision was very difficult, without some knowledge of naval matters. He would also make it a sine qua non that the Comptroller of the Navy should have a seat at the Board of Admiralty, and be the immediate means of communication between his own department and the Board. It should be borne in mind that the largest expenditure took place in the Comptroller's department. Ships were ordered to be built, and great outlay might be incurred without the Board, as a Board, knowing any thing about it; and he ventured to say that it frequently happened that the first knowledge which the Lords of the Admiralty obtained of a certain ship—the Algiers, for instance, being launched, or the Princess Royal laid down on the same slips the next day—was from seeing the announcement in the newspapers a few days afterwards. That was not as it ought to be. It could not occur if the Comptroller had a seat in the Board, and laid the business of his department regularly before it. All matters relating to building ships, and their steam machinery, should be brought immediately under the notice of the Board, and all representations of the Comptroller could be directly considered by it. As the Comptroller was at present overworked, he should have under him a Board of Construction, composed of three individuals, thoroughly competent to superintend the building of ships, who might prevent an enormous expenditure on certain vessels, and their inefficiency after being lengthened and altered. As to the expenditure in that way, it would be curious to know what had been spent on the Princess Royal, which had been commanded by the noble Lord opposite, for repairs and alterations. He should like to know what had been the expenditure on that ship since the noble Lord had hauled down his pennant. The expenses of the screw fleet had been enormous, especially through straining at sea. His opinion was that although steam must of course be used when expedition was required, yet that in such cases as the voyage to Lisbon, which was, in familiar language, merely a man-of-war cruise, the ships might have gone under sail, and not have incurred the strain arising from the forcing such enormous masses through the water by means of the screw. Another cause of complaint, and which required investigation, was the building of the steam rams, which he believed would be of no more use than the old Trusty, which had just had a shot sent through her sides. He believed that the cost of these vessels, nearly £600,000, would be entirely thrown away. Having stated his views, he did not wish to trespass at any length on the time of the House; but he thought the present was a very favourable moment for considering a change of system. The noble Duke at the head of the Admiralty had had experience of the House of Commons, and his calm discrimination was such, he was sure he would consider fairly any suggestion on this subject. The First Naval Lord (Admiral Dundas) was unrivalled in the list of officers in which he stood. There was the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty, who had with so much candour, good nature, and talent conducted its business this Session, and the noble Viscount, himself the head of the Administration, had at all times shown a deep interest in the naval affairs of the country. He proposed the Committee solely with the object of improving naval administration, and not in any way as a party question. If any crisis should unfortunately occur, England would expect much of its navy; he hoped it would find every man ready to do his duty; and that every man in office had already done his duty also. The hon. and gallant Member concluded by moving the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the constitution of the Board of Admiralty, and the duties devolving thereon.

Motion made and Question proposed,—
“That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the constitution of the Board of Admiralty, and the various Duties devolving thereon.”

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: Sir, I must give the hon. and gallant Member great credit for the tone of his observations; the spirit in which he had pointed out what he considered defects in the Administration of the Admiralty with a view to their removal was anything but unfriendly. I do not think it can be said of the present Board of Admiralty that it has been at all anxious to avoid inquiry into the various branches of the administration under their care, inasmuch as they have agreed to no less than four Committees and Commissions of Inquiry. I would remind the House that at this moment there is a Committee sitting on a very important branch of the Admiralty business—the Committee on the Piers and Harbours Bill. My hon. and gallant Friend is mistaken if he supposed that the Board is averse to that Bill. The Bill is for giving facilities for the erection of piers and harbours. It is one which has many things to recommend it, for there can be no doubt that if the vast expense of preliminary inquiries into such erections could be saved, a great service would be rendered to the public. I admit that I objected to the Bill; but the objection was not to its principles, but the details. A vast amount of work has already been thrown on the Board by the construction of piers and harbours, and it would add materially to that work, and be very unadvisable to impose upon it the responsibility which now devolves on Select Committees of this House as to the construction of all the har-bours that may be required for the whole of the United Kingdom. I think the public would object to such powers being given to the Admiralty. That was my only objection to the Bill on Piers and Harbours. There is another Committee about to sit, also on an important branch of the Admiralty business—the transport of troops. The Committee was moved for by the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay). From that inquiry I think much valuable information may result. There is another Committee carrying on an inquiry into the question of the gunboats. To the Motion for that Committee the Admiralty had no objections to offer, on the contrary, it thought the subject a very fair one for inquiry into by this House. All the difference of opinion between the Admiralty and the hon. Member for Sunderland was this—the Admiralty had, at the time the Motion was made, taken steps for commencing legal proceedings in reference to the gunboats, and thought till those proceedings were decided it would be unadvisable to prejudge the question by commencing an inquiry. I, for one, am glad that it has been appointed, for by its means all the parties concerned are likely to be dealt with in the best and fairest way. I have now pointed out three inquiries into business connected with the Admiralty, which are at present being prosecuted, and to the institution of no one of those inquiries has, I may add, the slightest opposition being offered by the Board. There has, moreover, been a Royal Commission appointed to investigate that vast department of the Admiralty relating to shipbuilding, to which my hon. and gallant Friend has alluded. That Commission will have a considerable amount of labour to go through in the discharge of its duties, and I need hardly say that it will receive from the Admiralty all the facilities which it is in its power to afford in their performance. I believe that great improvements may be effected as the result of the investigation, and I need scarcely assure the House that if I should be called upon to give evidence before it I shall do so with the utmost readiness and in the sincere hope that it may be productive of good. Here, then, as I have said, we have four important inquiries being prosecuted into the various branches of the Admiralty business, and that, too, with the full approbation of the Board; a fact which clearly proves that it does not shrink from the examination.

My hon. and gallant Friend, however, is not satisfied with what is taking place, but wishes that an inquiry into the constitution of the Admiralty itself should be instituted. Now, I would beg to remind him that an inquiry into the constitution of the War Office, and military departments is at present in progress, and that so far as I can learn from rumour there are many great authorities on the subject who would appear to be rather favourable to the assimilation of the constitution of the new office to a certain extent to that of the Admiralty. ["No, no!"] I speak merely from general rumour, but be that as it may, it is, I think, advisable to await the Report of this Committee, which has been charged with the duty of making inquiry into the management and control of the army, and from which, no doubt, many valuable hints as to both services may be gathered, before we take any step such as that which my hon. and gallant Friend seems to wish us to adopt. I may further observe that I did not gather from his remarks that he has any particular fault to find with the Admiralty beyond that which relates to the branches to which I have already alluded, so that all his subjects of complaint are already under inquiry. He would appear, indeed, to be of opinion that the navy should be governed exclusively by naval men.
Lord Clarence Paget

ADMIRAL DUNCOMBE: I said I should like to see a Board composed of naval men and also a Board of Construction. I did not say that the First Lord should be a naval man.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET:—That sounds very well, and I am sure I need not say that I, as a naval man, have the highest respect for my brother officers, who, I think, would be found equal to the performance of their duties in any position in which they might be placed. I would, however, observe that the strictly naval duties of the Admiralty form but a small portion of the general business which it has to discharge. My hon. and gallant Friend seems to have overlooked the circumstance that it has a vast amount of business of a purely civil nature to perform; and, without troubling the House with any very great detail, I will endeavour to point out what are the civil duties which belong to the Admiralty, irrespective altogether of those purely naval duties, such, for instance, as the manning and disciplining the fleet. I would first mention its duties in connection with piers and harbours, and no one who has not been connected with the Admiralty can imagine the vast amount of business arising from the necessity of dealing with all the tidal waters of the United Kingdom. Now, business of this nature nobody, I imagine, can seriously contend to be beyond the capabilities of a civilian to transact. I may add, that until lately the Admiralty had also the entire of the duties connected with packets to perform; duties from which it is now, however, very advantageously, as I think, relieved. I shall next proceed to advert to its civil duties in more immediate connection with the navy. First of all we are merchants. We purchase vast masses of raw material in the shape of timber, iron, copper, coals, and a variety of other articles. [An hon. MEMBER: But you do not sell.] Yes, we also sell sometimes, as in the case of old stores, for instance. We are in addition great manufacturers in almost every trade, from the construction of great anchors to the making of the minutest nail; some of the articles which we require being manufactured by contract, and many in our dockyards. We are shipbuilders on a very extensive scale in our dockyards, and we purchase vessels built by private contract, including engines, boilers, and "all the appurtenances thereunto belonging." These are matters, I may add, each of which is under the control of a particular Lord of the Admiralty; so that my hon. and gallant Friend is mistaken in supposing that the shipbuilding is not under special control. The fact is, that it is under the superintendence of the First Sea Lord, who is in daily communication with the Comptroller of the Navy, and is familiar with all those details to which the hon. and gallant Gentleman alluded. I must, however, admit that this suggestion of a Board of Construction has much in my mind to recommend it. Besides the civil functions of the Admiralty which I have enumerated, we are victuallers. We purchase an immense amount of provisions, not only for the navy but also for the army and other public departments. It is our duty to provide all the medical necessaries for the fleet as well as to supply them to all the distant stations. These are duties, as I think the House will admit, of a civil nature. In a scientific point of view we are astronomers, inasmuch as with us rests the preparation of all the scientific works for the guidance of mariners. We are hydrographers, inasmuch as we have to survey every sea all over the globe; and, finally, we are architects. It is our duty to construct vast docks, warehouses, barracks, hospitals—in short, buildings of every description. Now, these are functions of a civil character, and I cannot concur with my hon. and gallant Friend in the opinion that the existence of a Board composed of exclusively naval men is necessary for their efficient discharge; while from my brief experience at the Admiralty, the working of which I have watched narrowly, and which I have compared with the Ordnance Board, to which I have had the honour to belong, as well as with others, I am disposed to think, that although it is far from perfect it possesses many advantages when the system is properly worked, which they do not enjoy. There are many who, no doubt, will say they object to the system of governing the navy by a Board—to those Gentlemen I would answer that the whole of the duties, to which I have adverted, together with a vast mass of other business to which I have not referred—are so interwoven one with the other, that if the heads of the several departments did not meet daily and discuss the various measures proposed to be carried into effect, you would have one member prosecuting works of which his colleagues would have no knowledge, and thus great inconvenience might be caused.

The Board of Admiralty has two very important principles belonging to it—one is, that it has the power of acting with suddenness and secrecy in all matters where suddenness and secrecy are required; and in all matters where deliberation or ventilation is necessary, the Board of Admiralty has equally the power of deliberating carefully on all matters which appear to call for careful deliberation. Take the military duties of the Board—no doubt I shall hear that if it were necessary to-morrow in time of war or trouble to act with promptitude, we have not the means of insuring such action at the command of the Admiralty. It is perfectly within the constitution of the Admiralty that the First Lord should order the movements of the fleet—he can take any steps he thinks requisite for the movements of the fleet. He also has in his hands a very important privilege, and when my gallant Friend means to touch the constitution of the Admiralty, I would have him to bear in mind that in the navy, from the beginning to the end, from the top to the bottom, with the exception of flag officers, and certain Board promotions for distinguished service—all promotions and appointments to ships of every description are in the hands of the First Lord of the Admiralty. I would ask him would you place that extraordinary power in the hands of a naval man, or would promotions then fall into the hands of the Board? I am arguing in the dark. I do not know what my gallant Friend would wish. I only tell him what is the present constitution of the Board of Admiralty, and how difficult it will be to alter it. I wish him to bear this in mind that, whereas in the army promotion goes by purchase, and in certain branches of it by seniority, in the navy the whole of it is by choice. Now, I maintain that if you were to put that in the hands of a naval man, you would be running a very great risk. I am far from saying or supposing that there are not many naval officers who would conduct that patronage and the business connected with it with the strictest impartiality. But I do maintain that we naval officers who have spent our lives in the service must necessarily have a great number of personal friends and followers, and, if you had for the First Lord a naval man, he would be pressed by many considerations of that nature which he is entirely clear of now. I would add—but this is my private opinion, not as Secretary to the Admiralty—I think it is of very great importance that he should be a Peer, in order to be far away from any pressure as regards Parliamentary influence. I am stating frankly my opinion in regard to these matters. A very strong opinion has been given lately in favour of Board meetings of the officers of the dockyards, by the Committee on Dockyard Economy. It was found that there was not sufficient personal communication between the officers of the dockyards, and it was recommended that they should have morning meetings at the dockyards precisely similar to Board meetings, with the view of arrangements for carrying out in common the duties of the office. If such meetings are necessary in the yards they are equally so at the Admiralty. I have now touched as far as I could on the objections which have been and may be urged to the present constitution of the Board of Admiralty. I hope that my hon. and gallant Friend, having given his observations to the House, will not push this matter to a division. Taking all things into consideration, having several inquiries going on at this moment into various branches of the Admiralty, having got a very important inquiry going on as to the constitution and government of the army, the Report of which may be of use hereafter, especially considering the time of the year at which this Motion is brought on, I am afraid I must, on the part of the Government, oppose the Motion of my gallant Friend.

Lord Clarence Paget

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: I think my noble and gallant Friend, the Secretary to the Admiralty, has altogether misunderstood the speech and the purport of the Motion of the hon. and gallant Admiral on the other side. I must say, I never heard a more practical or more sensible statement made by any naval officer in this House than has been made by the hon. and gallant Admiral. The gallant Admiral never raised any question about altering the system of promotion by the Admiralty; he never made any suggestion that the First Lord of the Admiralty must necessarily be a naval man; he expressly, as I understood, guarded himself against any recommendation of that kind. His Motion is a very simple one; it is for a Select Committee to inquire into the constitution of the Board of Admiralty—as simple a Motion as could be brought forward by any man. And what is the answer of the noble Lord? He says that already, so much is the Board of Admiralty suspected by the House and the country that they have been obliged to agree to four Commissions or Committees of inquiry in regard to it. The gallant Admiral steps forward and says your constitution is not satisfactory, give us a Select Committee to inquire into the constitution of the Board, and the noble Secretary enumerates all the trades which the Board performs. That is just what the country says, the Board is “Jack of all trades and master of none.” The noble Lord says, “Here are all these Commissions of Inquiry.” Yes, you are not trusted; and if you are not trusted, let me ask who is to blame? The noble Lord himself has done more to discredit the Board of Admiralty in the House and the country than any other Member of the profession. Did I not hear the noble Lord in the last Parliament impeach the Admiralty for having wasted £11,000,000 in five years? and having made that statement, and having adhered to it, although he could not prove it, the noble Lord ought, of all people in the world, to have seconded the Motion of the gallant Admiral for a Committee of Inquiry. I shall support the Motion of the gallant Admiral. I think it will do a very great deal of good, and disabuse the public mind of many accusations that have been made. Let us have the Comptroller of the Navy before that Committee; and that is the way to get at the truth of the charges. The charges made against that excellent and upright officer have never been retracted to this day. When the noble Secretary thus attempts to trail a red herring across the path of the gallant Admiral, and speaks of the Board being merchants, chemists, and sailmakers, I say that is no answer to the Motion at all; it is one of the very best reasons for the inquiry. He tells us we have got four Commissions; well, I say, go a step further; we want a fifth; give us an inquiry into the fountain head of all this mischief, the Board of Admiralty itself. With regard to the present constitution of the Admiralty the noble Lord is so anxious to remove the suspicions of an unjust tampering with promotion, that he wishes to remove the First Lord altogether from the public view—he wishes to make him a sort of Japanese First Lord—never to be seen. I do not agree with that view. But the gallant Admiral has made an excellent suggestion with regard to the Comptroller; he is in a most anomalous position. He is one of the most eminent officers in the whole service, and yet he has not a seat or a voice at the Board. Then, again, the noble Lord tells us that matters of shipbuilding are discussed at the Board. If that be the case, things are greatly altered since I was at the Admiralty. At that time nothing about shipbuilding ever came before the Board. The noble Lord said the First Lord was in daily communication with the Comptroller, but all the information he derived from him is strictly private and confidential. The whole business is done in the First Lord's room, and I defy the noble Lord to produce a single instance of a Board meeting at which anything was done relating to shipbuilding. The noble Lord asks what are you going to do? He says if you take one stone out of the edifice of the Board of Admiralty, the whole will fall to pieces. I say if it cannot bear examination it ought to fall to pieces. I am surprised the noble Lord should take this line, because, if I remember, on a former occasion he used very strong language as to the necessity of inquiring into the Board of Admiralty.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon—I never said anything about that.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: Why, did the noble Lord not say that there had been eleven millions sterling wasted? Then he ought to support this Motion. I know there are people at the Admiralty who are very anxious for inquiry; and unless you do reconstitute that Board in a more satisfactory form you will be always liable to have these charges made, but not substantiated, for they never have been substantiated. I am sure that one of the recommendations of the gallant Admiral—namely, giving the Comptroller a seat at the Board, would introduce a most beneficial change. The business of that officer has attained such gigantic proportions that no single person, however able, can be equal to its discharge. It is not fair to Sir Baldwin Walker that he should hold so responsible a position without having a seat at the Board, and without having further assistance. The Navy Estimates are enormous, but the country will not grudge them if they are well administered. With a view to the better working of the system I have no hesitation in supporting this Motion.

COLONEL DICKSON said, the noble Lord had stated, as a reason for opposing the Motion, that there was a Commission already sitting in "another place," and that he had heard in the street there was some idea of that Commission issuing a Report in favour of assimilating the control over the army to the same kind of Board which now ruled over the navy. On such a decision he for one would look with the greatest dismay. He had seen with deep regret the changes that were attempted to be introduced into the administration of the army. All these so-called improvements went in the wrong direction, and he should be very sorry if the command of the army were entrusted to a body like the Board of Admiralty. He had spent much time on different naval stations, and mixed much with naval men, but he had never gathered from a single naval officer that he approved the system of management pursued under the Admiralty. The noble Lord had himself given a strong reason for granting that inquiry. The number of the duties imposed upon the Board of Admiralty far exceeded what any Board could possibly discharge. An inquiry was, therefore, needed to see whether many of those duties might not be committed to separate departments with advantage to the service and economy to the public. No man could manage the affairs of a department so well as those who were directly interested in them; and if a naval officer was at the head of the Board he would fulfil its duties and distribute its appointments with as much justice and impartiality as any civilian, and even with less regard to family connection and more regard to professional qualifications than had been recently exhibited in some branches of the public service. He must, however, dissent from the statement that the noble Lord had at all contributed to bring discredit on the Admiralty. He should regret if the noble Lord allowed the sweets of office to seal those lips which had formerly uttered such vehement denunciations on the abuses existing in the navy; for he believed there was no man better fitted to confer honour and dignity on the gallant profession to which he belonged than was the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: The hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. B. Osborne) has stated, I must say with a great deal of truth, that the disposition which has existed in this House of late to distrust the conduct of the Board of Admiralty may be attributed in no very inconsiderable measure to the language of my noble Friend opposite (Lord C. Paget) in the last Session of Parliament. Although the noble Lord's motives were very laudable, the part he took and the allegations and imputations he made did a great deal to excite doubts in this House with regard to the mode in which the business of the Admiralty was conducted. I have never hesitated to express my regret at the course which the noble Lord then pursued, and at the allegations which he then brought forward—allegations which he never has substantiated, and which I have always believed are incapable of being substantiated, in the shape, at all events, in which he couched them. At the same time, I think he will admit that I have never refused to do justice to the frank and agreeable tone in which he has always fulfilled his official duties in this House as Secretary to the Admiralty; and I believe he has never deserved more credit for that tone than he does to-night, when speaking under some degree of personal difficulty, from the fact that he is not only the Secretary to the Admiralty, but also a naval officer. He is entitled, therefore, to praise for the calm, urbane, and dispassionate manner in which he has met the present Motion. I refer with considerable diffidence to this subject, because my official experience as First Lord was limited to less than a year and a-half; but I must frankly confess that my noble Friend has gone rather further in his estimate of the efficiency of the Board of Admiralty as an administrative machine than I am disposed to do. My experience impressed on my mind the conviction that theoretically the constitution of that Board might be improved. I think the suggestion of the gallant Admiral that it would be well for the Comptroller of the Navy to have a seat at the Board is an excellent one, and I doubt if it would not further improve the constitution of the Board if the Accountant General was also a member of it. Although I do not think the machinery of that Board is perfect, yet, having regard to the enormous amount of multifarious and complicated business which it has to transact, and the extreme difficulty of deciding in what shape that body ought to be constituted, I should be sorry to see such a question handed over to a Select Committee of this House, the great majority of whose members would probably be wholly inexperienced in the details of this important Department. But after the opinions that have been frequently expressed both in the last and in the present Parliament as to the necessity of some inquiry into the constitution of the Board of Admiralty I venture to suggest to the Government whether it might not be well for them to take upon themselves the consideration of that question. I am inclined to think it could be much better dealt with by the Government than by a Select Committee. But if the investigations of the Government should lead them to think that the matter ought to be further examined into, with a view of making any material changes in so complicated and important a machine, I would again suggest to them that the same course should be adopted with regard to the navy as was adopted with regard to the army, and that the inquiry into the constitution of the Board of Admiralty should be referred to a well selected Commission. I therefore hope the gallant Admiral will not press his Motion, but if he does I shall not be able to vote with him.

Colonel Dickson

Notwithstanding the experience of the gallant Admiral for a few months at the Board of Admiralty I am bound to say that he has fallen into some mistake in matters of fact. The first statement which struck me was, that the First Lord only heard of a launch from reading the newspaper. [Admiral DUNCOMBE: I said the Board, as a Board, had no previous information.] Well, if the gallant Admiral likes, that the Board only heard of the launch of a ship by reading in the newspapers of it having taken place some few days previously. With my experience, I can say that that is an entire error on the part of the gallant Admiral. While I was at the Admiralty no launch ever took place without due and ample notice being given in the most formal manner, sometimes to an extent which occurred to me was beyond the necessity of the case, and without the notice being read at the Board. But I only allude to this statement with regard to a ceremony comparatively unimportant for the purpose of noticing another statement upon a much more important subject. The gallant Admiral certainly implied, if he did not make the statement, and the statement was broadly and distinctly made by the hon. Member for Liskeard, that the question of shipbuilding is never discussed by the Board of Admiralty. [Mr. B. OSBORNE: Hear, hear!] I am sure the right hon. Baronet who was for some time First Lord of the Admiralty, and now holds the office of Secretary of State for India, will bear me out in saying that it is no more consistent with his experience than with mine. [Sir CHARLES WOOD: Hear, hear!] I do not know what rule prevailed when the hon. Member for Liskeard was at the Admiralty, or when the gallant Admiral was a member of the Board. But this I know, that while I had the honour of a seat at the Board, the Comptroller of the Navy—the Surveyor of the Navy, as he was then—attended regularly on one day in every week and went into every matter connected with shipbuilding which he was pleased to bring before us. He came as regularly as the heads of other departments, either at a Board at Somerset House or at the Admiralty, and he communicated upon all points connected with shipbuilding, the importance of which in the transactions of the Admiralty every one must admit. The hon. Gentleman said that the Board had no cognizance of the building of ships. [Mr. B. OSBORNE: Hear, hear!] I again say that no shipbuilding of importance, or of any extent, or of any class of vessels, was carried on without being discussed and decided upon by the Board while I had the honour of presiding over it. I state this in the most distinct manner. It appears to be a question of the difference of practice between one Board and another, rather than a question of the constitution of the Board, and of course I can only speak of the practice during the time I had the honour to hold office. The gallant Admiral fell into a considerable error with regard to the cost of the iron-plated ships. Perhaps the decision to build one of them was one of the most important decisions to which the late Board of Admiralty came, and I am glad to see that it has been followed up by the present Board. The gallant Admiral called them rams. They were never designed or intended as rams, but are, in fact, iron-cased ships, intended to resist shot, and, notwithstanding what he says of experiments made upon them, they must be far more capable of resisting shot than an ordinary wooden-sided ship. I trust and believe that they will be a valuable addition to the navy, but as to their costing £600,000 each, as the gallant Admiral has stated, I believe I am right in saying that that is much nearer the cost of the two, if it does not exceed it. I do not think the gallant Admiral distinctly stated it, but if he implied a doubt whether I had taken upon myself to give the important order for building the ship, or whether it was done by the Board, I can only say that one of the last things I should have thought of doing would have been to give an order of such magnitude and importance without the knowledge and sanction of the Board with whom I had the honour of acting. I do not think that I need detain the House any longer. I have explained some statements which might lead to a misapprehension. I have stated the views which I entertain on the general question, and under the circumstances I am not able to vote in favour of the Motion.

MR. LINDSAY said, though, when he entered the House that evening, he had not made up his mind what course to take, he thought, from the statements on both sides, that he could have no doubt about voting for inquiry. It was evident there was something wrong in the administration of the navy, otherwise why should the Admiralty resist inquiry? That inquiry was needed was further shown by the able speech of the noble Lord, by which it appeared that the variety of duties to be discharged by the Board was so great, that he could not conceive how any Board, constituted like the Admiralty, could conduct all those vast and various interests with advantage to the public. There was also another important point. They were expending something like £13,000,000 on the navy, and there was a common impression on men's minds that, with different management, £10,000,000 might be made to go as far as the £13,000,000. He believed that the question of building large ships was never brought under the attention of the Board, but was left entirely to the Comptroller of the Navy, and it was in those things that the large expenditure was incurred. The Comptroller ought, he thought, to have a seat at the Board, and all these matters should be brought regularly under their notice. The right hon. Baronet (Sir John Pakington) had said he should not vote for the inquiry; but if the question before the House had been simply for inquiry, he would not have supported it; his difficulty was, whether the inquiry should be gone into by the Government or by a Commission. It came then to the question, should the inquiry be carried out by a Commission. To that he (Mr. Lindsay) said decidedly, no. The House and the House alone could furnish the proper tribunal to inquire into such a subject as the constitution of the Admiralty. Surely among the 654 Members of the House, there could be found fifteen Gentlemen quite as competent to inquire into that question as any outside it. With regard to the charges which had frequently been made in that House against the noble Lord (Lord C. Paget), he thought it right to say that he (Mr. Lindsay) had a certain share in the responsibility of the noble Lord's statement, for he seconded his Motion. He had a distinct recollection of what the noble Lord stated at the time. The noble Lord did not bring any charge against Sir Baldwin Walker, or indeed against any one connected with the Admiralty. He stated that on going over the expenditure for a certain number of years, he observed that there were about five millions of money the mode of expenditure of which he could not see from the accounts laid before the House. His charge really referred to the imperfect form of keeping the accounts. His allegation was that they were so kept that it was impossible to trace how that five millions of money in the course of some eleven years had been expended. He felt bound to say this much in justification of the noble Lord, who had, immediately that he came into office, taken in hand the improvement of the accounts; and he had laid upon the table of the House a Return with which the House had never been favoured before, and by which they would be able in future to trace in what manner the money had been expended. Upon the general question, he (Mr. Lindsay) had nothing more to add, except that he trusted the Admiralty would, upon consideration, not oppose the Motion, considering the temperate spirit in which it had been brought forward.

Mr. Lindsay

MR. BENTINCK said, the question before the House was of vital importance, and ought to be settled at once. Therefore, he thought the House were much indebted to his hon. and gallant Friend for having brought it before them, although he did not agree with him in every detail. He concurred with his hon. and gallant Friend in thinking that there was no reason for attaching blame to any particular Board of Admiralty, or for the introduction of anything like party spirit in discussing a Motion of this kind—nay, further, he would admit that if they were to have a civilian at the head of the department, they could not have a better man than the Duke of Somerset; while as regarded his noble Friend opposite, he should think his retirement from the office he now held a national misfortune. His hon. and gallant Friend complained that the result of the present constitution of the Board was a wasteful expenditure of money. He (Mr. Bentinck) admitted that to a certain extent, but he felt that there was a much greater evil—a want of efficiency in the service; and he had always contended that so long as there were civilians at the head of the Board of Admiralty, the whole system must be imperfect, nor could they depend on that rapidity and certainty of action which was necessary to meet great and sudden emergencies. It was not to be expected that men who undertook a particular branch of business for the first time would understand it thoroughly; and there was this disadvantage attending the system, that the moment the person appointed became competent, he was, in all probability, by some freak of the House of Commons, turned out of office, and a fresh man, as ignorant as he was at first, brought in. Thus it was that one of our most important public departments was left to the management of men who were no doubt adepts in political warfare, but very tyros and schoolboys in the business of governing the navy. The gunboats had been alluded to, and he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for India (Sir Charles Wood) whether the order for hauling them up at Haslar, and leaving them there for a long time dry and unexamined, had not emanated from him? He had heard the naval men of the Board disclaim any responsibility as to that order, which had cost the country £70,000, and its only effect had been to increase the progress of the dry rot in the vessels, which had been germinated by the green state of the wood of which they were built. If it was true that the right hon. Baronet was the author of that absurd scheme, that was in itself a strong argument against having a civilian at the head of the Board. His noble and gallant Friend had said that the duties of the Admiralty were in many respects of a civil character, as merchants, shipbuilders, chemists, &c.; but he (Mr. Bentinck) did not see why naval men could not qualify themselves to deal with such matters as well as the civilians who were appointed under the present system, and who, as far as he had ever heard, were not selected because of their practical knowledge and experience in such pursuits, but from motives of a very different kind. The fact that there were four different Inquiries going on already was no answer to the present Motion. Those Commissions and Committees to which his noble and gallant Friend (Lord Clarence Paget) had called attention, did not go to the root of the evil, which was the constitution of the Board; and even if they did, the Board of Admiralty, after all, might not adopt the recommendation of the Commission. The only object in appointing a civilian to the Board of Admiralty was to give the Minister of the day the means of appointing an important Member of the House of Commons to a place. The noble Lord advocated the appointment of a civilian to the head of the Admiralty because he said a naval man would be prejudiced. Now, there were two grounds on which a naval man was better qualified than a civilian to select officers for promotion. In the first place, he would necessarily have better opportunities of being acquainted with the professional merits of those who sought promotion; and in the second, he would be less fettered by those political ties which attached to a civilian, who owed his appointment to distinguished ability in the party conflicts in that House. He quite agreed that if the First Lord was to continue to be a civilian he should be a peer, as that would to some extent get rid of the influence of the House of Commons in the direction of the patronage of the navy, which would always, while it prevailed, be applied more with regard to political than professional objects. He concurred in the praise which had been awarded to the present Secretary for the Admiralty, who, he fully admitted, had done his best since his accession to office to remedy the evils he found existing; and if he had been unable to remedy them effectually, that was only an additional proof that there was something wrong in the constitution of the Board. He considered the suggestion of the right hon. Baronet below him (Sir John Pakington)—that the Inquiry should be conducted by a Commission appointed by the Government instead of by an independent Committee—was much about the same as if the prisoners awaiting their trial at an assize were to propose that they should be tried by a Commission selected by their own body. Those who sat on the front benches on both sides looked upon the patronage of these public departments as the political prizes to which they in turn succeeded, and were not disposed willingly to give them up, and, therefore, this suggestion of the right hon. Baronet had been made; but until the House of Commons took up the matter with a strong hand and determined to act for itself, they could not hope for the application of any efficient remedy.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he wished to congratulate the gallant Admiral on having brought forward this question, and to express a hope that his efforts would be attended with more success than those which he himself had made on the same subject. He would not follow the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty through what he would call the rubbish which he had spoken about Lords of the Admiralty being architects, shipbuilders, masons, painters, and members of every other trade; but would confine himself to offering a word or two on the military duties of the First Lord. From the time that he entered the service a general complaint—whether right or wrong—had been always made against the Admiralty, and a general distrust of their administration was felt throughout the country. Since 1850 there had been constant changes at the Board. The right hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir Francis Baring) was followed by the Duke of Northumberland; the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham) his successor, was replaced by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Halifax (Sir Charles Wood); then the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) succeeded to office, and now they had the Duke of Somerset. How was it possible to maintain the efficiency of a service on which the safety of the country depended, or to carry out any regular system where the First Lord was so often changed, and where the Board of Admiralty changed nearly as often as himself? Then, who were the Lords of the Admiralty chosen from? It was not necessary that they should be men of talent; it was only requisite that they should have a seat in the House, be well-connected, and friendly to the Minister of the day, and they were morally certain of enjoying a place at the Admiralty. A Board thus constituted, and with a civilian at its head, could know nothing either of the discipline of the navy or of the character of officers and seamen; how, then, could it give satisfaction to the country at large? Formerly all the patronage of the navy centred in the First Lord. In order to prevent this power from being abused, Parliament, having the good of the service at heart, limited the rule of promotion to one in three. But these were all grasped by the First Lord. All the appointments of the present Admiralty had been to officers who had held several and successive commands. One officer, to the perfect astonishment of the whole service, had been passed over by different Governments sixteen or seventeen times, ever since the period of the Burmese war, in which he performed his duty to the great satisfaction of the country and of the Board of Admiralty itself. He had just been passed over again for an officer who was his senior, but who had only recently struck his flag from a previous command. He was not the only one who had been passed over. There were a great many others who had not been employed. He did not find any fault with those who had been employed; they were all good officers, but how was it possible for the others, who never stood any chance of hoisting their flag in time of peace, to be efficient in case war were to break out. There was another thing he had to complain of, and that was the manner in which orders were given by the Admiralty, often contradicting each other. As an illustration of this, he might state that when in command of the Channel fleet he was ordered by the Admiralty to remove the guns from the upper deck of the St. Vincent. He did so, and immediately he received another order to put them back again. Again, when the Albion was under trial, he received an order to send her home without delay; it was done, and then came out a letter stating that their Lordships regretted that the Albion had not been thoroughly tried. Legally, all orders ought to be signed by two Lords, but the Secretary of the Admiralty had stated to-night what he never heard before,—that the First Lord himself could issue an order if signed by the Secretary. The six Lords worked in separate rooms, dividing the business of the different departments between them. They met in the board-room at twelve o'clock for general business. This sounded well enough in theory; but it was not good in practice. A Lord of the Admiralty, after doing his business at the Board, went down to Somerset House, where a whole heap of papers was placed before him. It was impossible for him to read them, and he signed them as fast as possible, so that in fact the actual duty was performed by the department. Officers in command were often in a difficulty, in consequence of having three masters. When he was in command of the Baltic fleet, he received orders from two Lords of the Admiralty, and from the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. When he sailed he had orders from the Admiralty to proceed to Wingoe Sound, and wait there for further instructions. When he arrived there he was informed the ice in the Baltic was breaking up; but he had orders not to enter the Baltic. The Earl of Clarendon, however, had had the same information, and sent him out a letter which showed his judgment. It was an order to proceed, as the ice was disappearing, to a position that would prevent the Russian fleet from entering the North Sea. The orders from the Admiralty and the Secretary of State were exactly opposed to each other; but he had no hesitation about them. The Earl of Clarendon's order quite agreed with his own information, and he immediately passed through the Belt and got up to Copenhagen. He believed he did quite right; and he thought the country owed a great deal to the Earl of Clarendon; had he (Sir Charles Napier) followed the orders of the Admiralty, a northern confederacy might have been established by Russia in the Baltic. But by the next packet came despatches from the Admiralty, stating that "My Lords" were astonished at what he had done, as he had acted without the concurrence of the Board. The next packet had brought him out a letter from the First Lord of the Admiralty, which, as it had reference to public affairs and contained no secret, he supposed he might read to the House. However, on reflection, he thought it better not to read it; but it was quite clear that if the Russian fleet had got into the North Sea he could not plead the orders of the Admiralty as an excuse, for the Board would have immediately turned round on him and asked why he had not conformed to the instructions of the Secretary of State, which he had, as it happened, been wise enough to follow. The next complaint which he had to urge against the Admiralty, as at present constituted, was that it had never struck out any efficient plan for manning the navy, which it might have done if it had only set zealously about carrying into effect the recommendation of the Royal Commission, while those, he contended, who read the Report which had recently been published in reference to Greenwich Hospital, must be, as he himself was, perfectly astonished at the manner in which that establishment was managed, and at the want of attention in the case of the widows and orphans of the men by which the action of the Board had for a series of years been marked. Now, he had often heard it stated in that House by First Lords of the Admiralty that the Board as a body decided on all the matters of importance which came under the control of the department, but the fact nevertheless was, that when the First Lord did not want to take the opinion of the Board on any particular point, he retired with the Senior Naval Lord, or such other member of the Board as he pleased, into his room, and there came to the conclusion which he deemed to be most expedient. In corroboration of that view he might relate a story which was well known at the Admiralty, although it might not be in that House. It was said that when the Government of the day desired to supersede Lord Hood in his command, because he complained that the fleet was badly managed, Lord Spencer had gone down to the Admiralty and placed a minute on the table of the board-room directing that Lord Hood should be superseded. He then turned round to the senior Lord, and asked him to sign the order, but the request was declined. The second member of the Board who was asked also refused, and Lord Spencer thereupon threw the order down to the bottom of the table to the Civil Lord, observing, that if it were not signed at once the Admiralty would exist no longer. The result had been that Lord Hood, one of the best officers of which the country could boast, had been superseded in his command. Now if the Board of Admiralty was to be continued, it was, he contended, most desirable that the Comptroller of the Navy and the Accountant-General should be among its members. He might add that as matters were at present arranged, the mode of inspecting the fleet was extremely unsatisfactory. Two members of the Board might go down perhaps to Portsmouth or elsewhere for that purpose dressed in private clothes, but they carried no weight with them under those circumstances, and produced no impression on the men. Now, in the case of the army—which, if military gentlemen wished it to be placed under the same sort of superintendence as the navy, all he could say was, God forgive them—whenever there was a display of want of discipline, the Commander-in-Chief sent down the Adjutant-General to Plymouth or Aldershot, or any other place in which a mutiny might have occurred, and that officer made his inspection in uniform, turned out the regiment, and instituted the strictest investigation into the whole affair; while, if that were not sufficient, the Commander-in-Chief prosecuted the inquiry in person. Then there were in the army inspectors of infantry, who made frequent visits to the several stations, while there was no Adjutant-General or no inspector in connection with the Board of Admiralty to examine into the causes of a mutiny, if it arose on board a vessel or to ascertain the state of discipline of the men. There was a simple remedy. There were the sinecure offices of Vice-Admiral and Rear-Admiral in the gift of the Prime Minister. If, in future, the Prime Minister would constitute the First Naval Lord of the Admiralty Vice-Admiral of Great Britain, and the second Lord the Rear-Admiral of Great Britain, and attach the Comptroller of the Navy and the Accountant-General to the Board, a great improvement would be effected; but instead of the First Lord, he would have a Minister of Marine, and let each Lord of the Admiralty have his own distinct duties to perform, for which he should be held responsible. The Comptroller of the Navy had nothing to do with timber, and knew no more about the quantity in store than he himself did; nor had he any authority to send for the storekeeper to inquire about it. He believed there was not more than two years' stock of timber in the yards; and was that a state of things that ought to exist? The whole of the store department should be under the control of this officer. He would say nothing of the statements made by the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty. It was quite true that he did not accuse or complain of Admiral Sir Baldwin Walker, but it was said there was a loss of £5,000,000 in the course of eleven years—it had not been properly accounted for. Sir Baldwin Walker was called on to state whether this was true or false. He went into the whole concern. He answered every statement article by article, and proved that during those eleven years every accusation was inaccurate. There was only a sum of £4,000 or £5,000 expended for some other purpose than had been intended. Yet, notwithstanding all this, the stain remained on Sir Baldwin Walker and the Accountant-General, who were supposed to know about it. He thought that unjust, and had given the Secretary of the Admiralty the opportunity of stating in the House that, after examining the statement of Sir Baldwin Walker, the whole had been regularly accounted for; but until the matter was investigated by the Commission sitting on the dockyards the stain would remain. With regard to the gunboats, they were a shame and a disgrace to this country. It had been said that the Board of Admiralty were perfectly aware when orders were given to build them that they were to be built of green timber, for no other was to be found in the yards, but the contract was that they should be built of sound timber. An investigation was now going on into the whole matter, and no doubt the truth would come out. Another fault had been committed by the Admiralty, and it was a grievous one. They had a fine fleet after the Russian war. A great part was paid off, but there remained seven, eight, or ten sail of the line, which, however, were paid off, and the men sent adrift. The consequence was they had never been able to recruit the navy since, or get a fresh supply of proper petty officers. There had been no economy whatever in that, for the saving of pay was more than counterbalanced by the expense of putting the ships again into commission. He implored the House to grant this Committee of Inquiry. If the Admiralty were well conducted, a Committee to examine all the departments would produce a most satisfactory result. If the Admiralty thought themselves guilty, of course they would not submit to inquiry. But he trusted the House would make a thorough and searching investigation.

Sir Charles Napier

Sir Charles Napier

Mr. WARRE said, he had come to the conclusion, not without the most anxious consideration, that it would not be advisable to press the Motion to a division. Enough, however, had been elicited to lead to this result, that out of the discussion must come—it might be a little sooner or it might be a little later—very valuable results to the public service. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) had admitted that the Board might be improved in its construction; and this admission would not be thrown away. The iron-plated vessels were, it was true, untried, and little could therefore be said in their defence. But if other powers were making vast and costly experiments, experiments only though they were, in the construction of vessels of a novel description, but which perhaps would prove to be exceedingly formidable in a state of warfare, was it not our duty to proceed pari passu with them in such experiments? Some small experiments had been made of a similar kind in the Russian war; but the Russian artillery was not considered powerful enough to render the trials conclusive. Since that time artillery had been invented of extreme power, and the trial of their strength in warfare might not be a far distant event. We ought, then, to be prepared. He trusted, however, that the gallant officer would not press his Motion to a division.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he concurred in the hope that had been expressed by the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. He thought that the discussion would exercise a very beneficial effect on the Admiralty, and as there were four Committees sitting already it would be practically impossible to go into a full investigation of the question this Session. If the gallant Admiral would content himself for the present with the discussion which had taken place, and re-introduce his Motion at the beginning of the next Session, he (Sir James Elphinstone) would be happy to assist him to the extent of his power in an endeavour to obtain an investigation into the abuses which he was afraid existed in the Board of Admiralty. What he principally objected to in the Admiralty was, its entirely political complexion. The discontent which this cause produced in the navy was deep and well founded. Favoured individuals rose from one rank to another, and were qualified by continual employment for flags, while officers of the highest professional attainments remained in the lower grades of the service without any prospect of promotion. The system was quite different in the army, where if a man stuck to his profession, he eventually obtained promotion. The late Sir Henry Havelock was placed in almost a hopeless position in India. He had no means to purchase promotion; but he stuck to his duties, and advancement came at last. Nothing of the kind occurred in the navy. Again, it was a grave question whether the functions of the Admiralty ought not to be curtailed. The jurisdiction which it possessed over the tidal waters of the empire was not always exercised for the public good. The ships, too, which it constructed, were not built with a due regard to the stowage of dead weight; and their designs were not thrown open, as they ought to be, to the examination of those best qualified to judge of naval architecture. Almost the same remarks applied to their steam machinery. Steam machinery had risen to its present position in a few years; but it was introduced by officers not so well skilled in the science as they ought to have been. Then as to the wood department of the navy, he believed that we had only sufficient seasoned timber for two years' consumption; but the Admiralty seemed to look upon this state of things with a great degree of complacency. They had the teak forests of Burmah at their command, as well as a variety of other timber fitted for shipbuilding; but they took no steps to make these sources of supply available. The quantity of seasoned timber in the market at any one time was always very limited, and it was as difficult to procure more the moment they wanted it, unless they had laid in a large store beforehand, as it was to lay their hands upon 10,000 able seamen in any emergency. He thought they ought to have in store a supply which would be sufficient for at least ten years. What would be said of a gentleman who laid in only one year's store of claret in his cellars? The Comptroller of the Navy was the most important man in the Admiralty; and yet he had no seat at the Board, and it was said had no voice whatever in the construction of ships. So, the surveying department was not provided with proper vessels for the work to be done; and the management of the transport department ought to be taken away from the Admiralty. The House knew nothing more of the interior economy of the Admiralty than it did of the inside of the mosque at Mecca. There would be great difficulty in placing a naval man at the head of the Board as long as the political element remained attached to it. With four inquiries relative to the Admiralty, however, going on, he thought the most prudent course would be for his hon. Friend to withdraw his Motion, with the understanding that next Session an inquiry should take place.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, it is perfectly true that there is nothing connected with the naval service which does not depend upon the constitution of the Admiralty. Yet I cannot see how a great portion of the observations which have been made to-night can very much tend to enlighten the House upon that subject, and I very much doubt whether a Committee of fifteen Members of the House would be likely to form a sound opinion as to how the Board ought to be constituted. I think that, if inquiry is necessary, a Commission is far better than Committee; but I believe that those who have successively occupied the post of First Lord must know better than any other persons what defects exist, and what measures will most conduce to the efficient working of the system. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Norfolk has repeated a statement which he has made on more than one occasion—that the naval Lords were not consulted by me about the gunboats and about hauling them up at Haslar. With regard to the gunboats themselves, I do not recollect any statement being made to us that the contractors were not in possession of seasoned timber. My noble Friend says that one small builder represented that he had not sufficient, but no general representation to the same effect was made by the large builders. Nevertheless, if that had been the case, I should still have ordered the gunboats to be built of the best timber which the country could afford. It was indispensably necessary that the gunboats should be built within a limited time. I should not have hesitated a moment to authorize their construction of the best timber which could be procured; but I do not believe that any general representation was made by the contractors, with the exception which my noble Friend has mentioned, that they could not furnish timber adequately seasoned. My noble Friend has said truly that what the Admiralty complained of more particularly was the defective bolts, which was clearly a fraud upon the Admiralty, and what is worse, a crime of the gravest character, as it might have perilled the lives of the men who were placed in the gunboats. Let those who find so much fault with the building in the Government yards remember that these gunboats, turned out in such a state as they were, came from the private yards of the first shipbuilders in the kingdom. The hon. Member for Norfolk asked whether I consulted the naval Lords as to hauling up the boats at Haslar. I have stated before, not only that I did so, but that it was perfectly impossible orders could have been given for the purpose without consulting the Board. It involved expense, and it must therefore necessarily be done at a Board and by a Board order. I have not taken notice of assertions rashly made, without cognizance of the facts, but in this case not only I did not, but I could not give the order without the sanction of the Board. I did consult the Board, and they entirely concurred in the expediency of trying the experiment. Then we are told that hauling them up took away all chance of their lasting, and that if they had been left afloat there would have been no dry rot. But the first boats which showed symptoms of dry rot were two in the Mediterranean, which were never taken out of the water, and in which the dry rot appeared long before it appeared in those which were hauled up at Haslar. It is notorious that a vessel left on the stocks will last an indefinite time. There may be a difference if she has once been in the water, but as it was exceedingly desirable to clear Portsmouth Harbour, I was led, in concurrence with the Board, to try the experiment, and to direct sheds to be built, where a certain number of these gunboats might be drawn up. The experiment of hauling up had been tried, and succeeded with some yachts, which were habitually drawn up at Cowes, and there was no reason to anticipate any different result. It was also intended to take out some streaks of timber to let the air through, so that they might be the better preserved. The shipwright officer objected to take out the streaks of wood, and before any decision was arrived at, I was succeeded by the right hon. Baronet opposite. These are the reasons why that course was taken with the entire and full concurrence of the naval Lords of the Admiralty. The hon. Gentleman is mistaken in supposing that the First Lord takes the responsibility which is imputed to him without consultation with the members of the Board. The hon. Gentleman talks of promotions by the

Sir Charles Wood

First Lord. No doubt, he is personally responsible, but I can say most solemnly, that I never made one promotion or appointment without consultation, and the complete concurrence of the Board. I had to administer the Admiralty in time of war, and it is no doubt a much easier task to make appointments in time of war than in time of peace. I do not, therefore, claim any credit for myself which I am not ready to give to others who have filled the same office; but I declare on my honour as a gentleman that I never made a promotion or appointment in my life from any motive or belief other than that the recipient was as fit a man as could be found for the purpose, and I never made an appointment without the full concurrence of the Board. I say distinctly that there is an advantage, generally speaking, in having a civilian at the head of the Admiralty. I do not say that there are not many naval men perfectly fit and competent to take the post, but I entirely concur with my noble Friend, and I was glad to hear him say it, that naval men have necessarily friends or followers in the navy, and are apt to look with more favour on those whom they have seen and with whom they have served than upon others. It is quite natural and right that they should do so. The advantage of having a civilian at the head of the Admiralty is that he is able to hold the scales equally and upon the whole, as far as the navy at large is concerned, to make appointments more fairly than a naval man, who is liable to have his judgment warped by his feelings. A good deal has been said about matters not being brought before the Board. I am sorry to entirely differ from my hon. Friend who was Secretary to the Admiralty at the time I was First Lord. He may not have been present when questions of ship-building were discussed, and I quite agree that it is not a very convenient or easy mode of doing business to have very long discussions at the Board on matters of detail. The details were generally settled by the Surveyor of the Navy. The naval Lord who superintended that department was very frequently in communication with me, "in my room" if the hon. Member pleases, but no matter of importance could be settled without its being brought before the Board. The lines of every ship were not only brought before the Board but invariably approved and signed by two Lords and the Secretary. It was the same, the right hon. Baronet says, in his time, and I suppose in every First Lord's time, because all orders must issue from the Board. I think a great deal of misapprehension exists as to what fell from my noble Friend as to the necessity of giving an entirely naval character to the Board. I think it is of great advantage that there should be many naval Lords at the Board. But my noble Friend stated truly that a large proportion of business required no naval knowledge at all. A man of business and sense is just as qualified to buy beef and butter and to judge of the quality of clothing as if he had been to sea, and I remember at one Board at which I presided I kept an account of the naval matters considered, the result of which was that I found that nineteen out of twenty cases might just as well be decided by a civilian. Of course, ceteris paribus, it is of advantage also to have naval knowledge. Of the five junior Lords four are naval Lords, and looking to the amount of civil business it does not seem desirable to insist that the whole character of the Board should be exclusively naval. I do not think a Committee of the House the most convenient mode of investigating the constitution of the Board of Admiralty, and allow me to add that the multiplication of those Committees and Commissions does very seriously interfere with the business of the department. If members of departments, their officers and clerks, already pass too much time in examinations before these four or five Committees or Commissions on naval subjects, it is, I think, a very good reason against appointing another Committee. The necessity of attending all these Committees is a serious interruption to public business. As to the Controller of the Navy and the Accountant General having seats at the Board, you may depend upon it if these officials had to attend daily at the Board for three or four hours a day, it would be perfectly impossible for them to discharge their special duties. Add another naval Lord or lay Lord to the Board to attend to such business, to the accounts and such things, if you like, though I do not think it is at all necessary; but if you turn your executive officers into deliberative officers you will seriously interfere with the discharge of their duties. The person who is responsible for the discharge of the duties of First Lord is more interested in having an efficient Board than any one else possibly can be, and, with all respect to this House, I do not think that fifteen gentlemen selected out of it, without experience, can be half so fit to conduct an inquiry into the best mode of forming the Board as those who have had long experience of its working. I was five years Secretary of the Admiralty, and three, First Lord—I have been at the Treasury, at the Board of Control, and am now at the India Office, and I can conscientiously say that the transaction of business at the Admiralty is more rapid and satisfactory than at any other Board of which I have had experience.

LORD LOVAINE said, he hoped the Motion would not be pressed to a division, but if it were he should be compelled to vote against it. If for no other reason he should be compelled to do so because he observed those who were most disposed to comment on the shortcomings of the Admiralty while out of office were often obliged to recant when they got into office. He entirely concurred with the right hon. Gentleman as to the manner in which the business of the Admiralty was conducted, and also as to the inexpediency of requiring the Comptroller General and the Accountant General to attend the sittings of the Board. It might often happen that they would have to decide on matters which were entirely foreign to their departments, and on which they were, perhaps, not so well fitted to judge as those who now disposed of them. No doubt it would be an advantage to the Board if some of its members enjoyed a longer tenure of office, for the continual changes of the naval officers who sat at the Board was a great evil. So far as his experience went, it was by no means the rule to select the junior members of the Board solely with a reference to their political opinions, with the exception, perhaps, of a certain number, whose presence in the House was desirable, and whose absence had occasionally been felt as a great disadvantage. The strongest reason for granting a Committee of this kind would be that it would dispel many misapprehensions which were afloat with regard to the Board, arising entirely from ignorance. He was astonished to hear hon. Gentlemen recommend that the patronage of the Admiralty should be assimilated to that of the Horse Guards. Why, the cry in the House a little while ago was that the patronage of the Horse Guards should be assimilated to that of the Admiralty and exercised on the principle of selection. He trusted that the gallant Admiral would rest satisfied with the expression of opinion he had elicited from the House and withdraw his Motion.

SIR MICHAEL SEYMOUR said, there was a strong impression in the navy that a political bias had long existed at the Admiralty which was adverse to the efficient administration of the service, and the interests of the most deserving officers. The Admiralty was a ministry of five or six members, without individual responsibility, and liable to continual changes. In France the various Admiralty departments constituted a collective body, responsible to the Minister of Marine, who himself was solely responsible to the State for all acts done. Such matters as the organization of the fleet, the Works Department, provisioning of the fleet, and the selection of officers for promotion or employment were all considered by a Committee, on whose Report the Minister as a rule acted, though of course he had the right of overruling it if he thought fit; and the result of this system of administration was very satisfactory to the officers. He was bound to say in candour that he agreed with those who argued that it was preferable to have a distinguished civilian at the head of the Admiralty, but still it was most important that under him a naval opinion should have greater weight and be brought more to bear on matters connected with the navy than was now supposed to be the case. In this direction some inquiry might be very advantageous. He was not altogether disposed to admit that it was necessary that the Naval Lords should be in Parliament, and he could easily conceive that many officers, whose knowledge and experience would be most useful at the Board, would object to going there under the condition of being turned at the same time into political characters. He had great pleasure in bearing testimony, from his own experience, to the able and honest manner in which successive Boards of Admiralty had discharged their important and difficult duties. Where the state of business rendered it advisable, it might be well that the Comptroller of the Navy should attend the meetings of the Board; but otherwise he would be satisfied with its present constitution. He trusted that the discussion which had taken place might have the effect of enlightening the public mind with regard to naval affairs, and perhaps it might ultimately lead to the appointment of some such Committee as was desired. If the unfavourable impression of Admiralty political influence which prevailed in the service could be removed, a great object would have been achieved, and the effect would be to add to the zeal and gallantry of the members of the profession.

Lord Lovaine

ADMIRAL DUNCOMBE, in reply, said he could truthfully assert that nobody could have been more desirous than the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for India, when holding the post of First Lord of the Admiralty, to consult the interests of the service or to promote deserving officers. As a proof that he was not actuated in his selections by any political bias, he might state that on one occasion he had asked him to recommend a flag officer for a command. The noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty admitted that he spoke very much in the dark, and the forms of the House had not permitted him to show him the way to the light; but in introducing this Motion he had never suggested either that the First Lord should not be a civilian, or that promotions should be taken out of his hands and placed in those of the Board; for he knew that on most, if not on all occasions, the Board was consulted. It was merely on the supposition that the number of Lords of the Admiralty would not be increased that he had advocated the addition of the Comptroller of the Navy to the Board. He did not deny that points of detail, such as the noble Lord had referred to, might very well be managed by civilians; but it was a singular thing that for thirteen or fourteen years Sir Alexander Milne, now the commander on the West India station, was continued in office under different Administrations from the success with which he had conducted that department. It would ill become him to detain the House by insisting on a division, and as it was impossible that any practical result could follow in the present state of public business from the appointment of a Committee, he should withdraw his Motion, on the distinct understanding that he was to be allowed to renew it at an early period next Session. It only remained for him to disclaim all intention of injuring in any way the naval administration of this country.

Motion by leave withdrawn.

EUROPEAN FORCES—INDIA—LEAVE.

SIR CHARLES WOOD: I rise, pursuant to the notice I have given, to move for leave to introduce a Bill repealing the powers possessed by the Secretary of State for India to raise men in this country for the local service of Her Majesty in India.

The Bill I propose to introduce contains only one simple clause for this purpose ; and I have adopted this mode of bringing the question before the House, in order to test its opinion on the principle of the measure, without encumbering it with any details that might distract attention from the main question. In the execution of the measure a great number of details will have to be carefully considered. Indeed, if the House refers to papers now on the table, it will find among them a letter addressed to me from one of the ablest officers now serving in the Indian army, suggesting the necessity of appointing a Commission or Committee of experienced officers, to go into the numerous and minute details that will arise when the measure is brought into practical operation. I will therefore state generally the principle of the plan that I think must be adopted, and avoid entering into a statement of the details. I adopt this course also for another reason :—I stated earlier in the evening that the Council of India did not concur with the plan. But they have stated fairly and frankly, that if the decision of the House confirmed that of Her Majesty's Government, they would faithfully endeavour to carry that determination into effect. I did not think it fair to ask the Council of India to prepare any plan, or consider any plan, till that decision had been come to ; but I shall be most anxious to have the benefit of their advice on the details of any plan for carrying out the determination of Government and of Parliament. I think there can be no great difficulty in carrying a plan with this object into execution. Even among the papers on the table of the House there are no less than three detailed plans of the kind. Two of them are drawn up by officers of the Indian army, and one by an officer of the Queen's forces, now serving in India, Sir William Mansfield. I have received a fourth detailed plan, also drawn up by an officer of the Indian army ; and in principle all these four plans are much the same ; if they differ it is on points of detail. They, therefore, show a general concurrence of independent authorities, all intimately acquainted with the subject with which they deal.

Before going farther, I will state what the military forces in India have hitherto been. It is generally known that the India Company had in India three large armies—those of the three Presidencies, Bengal, Madras, and Bombay. Each of these consisted of Native regiments, comprising artillery, infantry, and cavalry. The Company have had besides these, from the earliest times, a number of European troops—the Company's troops, they were called—raised in Europe. They consisted of artillery and infantry. There have been also in India, for many years back, a considerable number of Queen's troops, which comprised only infantry and cavalry. The European infantry was therefore common to the Line and the local forces ; the European cavalry was exclusively that of the Queen's army ; the artillery was exclusively the Company's. Before the breaking out of the mutiny the Native armies amounted to near 250,000 ; but I need not refer further to them, I will confine myself to the Europeans. Without going very far back, I may state that in 1830, the Company's European forces consisted of artillery, and one regiment of infantry, in each Presidency. About 1840 a second, and in 1854 a third, European regiment was added in each Presidency. During the mutiny three regiments of infantry and five of cavalry were added in Bengal, but the infantry was not trained, and the cavalry regiments hardly formed. After the Sepoy mutiny, discontent arose in the local army, and a large proportion of it obtained their discharge. The Queen's troops in India have for many years been in the proportion of about two to one of the Company's European troops. In 1820 the Queen's troops were 20,000, those of the Company 10,000 ; in 1839 Queen's 17,000, Company's 8,500 ; and in 1852 the Queen's troops were 28,000 to 14,000 of the Company ; but during the mutiny the number of the Queen's troops was about 90,000, to 24,000 of the Company's European force. This number was the maximum which the Company's force ever reached ; but they were not all fit for service. After the discontent manifested by the Company's local troops, about 11,000 of them took their discharge ; and this force was reduced to about 12,000 men. Now, the only question on which I wish to take the opinion of the House is this,—whether we shall continue to maintain a separate European force for local service in India, or whether all the European troops in India shall form part of the Queen's general army. I must say that this question is one on which I long entertained the most serious doubts. I stated last Session that we were prepared to maintain to a certain extent a local army in India ; and it is only in consequence of events that have taken place since, and longer and more careful consideration, that my Colleagues and myself have arrived at the conclusion that it is not expedient to continue that separate local force. I wish to state, before I go further, what the chain of circumstances and arguments were by which we arrived at this conclusion,—not only to relieve ourselves from the appearance of inconsistency, but because the same arguments may weigh with others, and tend to induce the same conclusions.

When India was governed by the Company this question was not brought to my notice. The only military question connected with India which I had to decide was the addition of one regiment to the local force, which I assented to with the concurrence of Lord Hardinge; and the substitution of irregular for regular cavalry, which was under discussion with Lord Dalhousie, when I quitted the Board of Control. When my noble Friend (Lord Palmerston) introduced his Bill for transferring the government of India to the Crown, I was asked whether the disposal of the Indian army would not be an insuperable obstacle to the change. I answered him that, though it would be a difficulty, it formed no insuperable obstacle, as I thought the Native regiments might be officered by officers from the Queen's troops, placing them on an unattached list for Staff appointments. Before this question could be brought to a decision the matter was taken out of our hands by a change of Government. When in last June I was appointed to the office which I now have the honour to hold, I found that my noble Friend who preceded me had decided on maintaining a local army in India to the extent of two-fifths of the minimum European force in that country, and I am not ashamed to confess that I was extremely unwilling to disturb the decision in this respect at which my noble Friend had arrived. I well knew the single-mindedness with which he formed his conclusions on all subjects connected with India which came under his notice, and that he had carefully considered this particular question. I felt, therefore, the strongest anxiety to carry his views into effect. I may, however, remind the House that at that time the mutiny of the European troops in India had been only recently reported in this country, and that its more grave features had not been brought to our knowledge. It was under these circumstances that I made the announcement in August last to which I have referred, and I was not a little surprised to hear on that occasion the strong opinion expressed by the gallant Officer opposite (General Peel) against this course as I had understood that Lord Derby's Government had concurred in it. I then, as appears from the papers which have been laid before the House, submitted to a member of the Council of India, who came over to this country charged with the views of Lord Canning on the subject, and who certainly is one of the ablest advocates of the maintenance of a local army, the determination at which my noble friend who preceded me in office had arrived on the subject. I stated to Colonel Durand that that determination was to keep up the local army to the extent of two-fifths of the minimum European force in India. Now, it is desirable, as the House will not fail to perceive, that the amount of the local army should not be a varying, but a fixed amount, because any variation in the amount of force would be more easily made in the Queen's troops serving in India, who may be moved to any part of the world according as their services might be required. The force in India was then upwards of 90,000. I was, however, in hopes—though my hopes were not perhaps quite so sanguine on the point as those which others entertained—that the European force in India might be diminished to an extent which I do not at present deem expedient. I took the numbers which General Hancock in his Report suggested should be 60,000 men, and I asked Colonel Durand, assuming that to be the minimum number required for India, how he would dispose of 24,000, two-fifths of that number. As will be seen by his letter, which is amongst the papers on the table of the House, he said that it must be a mistake to take that number as two-fifths of all the force, and that any such arrangement should have excluded the artillery and engineers, and concluded by observing that there was no alternative between the adoption of Lord Canning's proposal, supported in the main by the Report of the Military Committee of the Indian Council, and a new Act, leaving it to the wisdom of Parliament, which would then assume the responsibility to devise whatever it might deem expedient. Now, Lord Canning's proposal was that there should be an army of 80,000 Europeans, two-thirds of which should be a local force. The Military Committee of the Council of India concurred substantially in that view, fixing the total at 78,000 instead of 80,000, so that I looked upon Lord Canning's proposal as being supported by the Report of the Military Committee. The local force, therefore, in accordance with the opinions of its principal advocates, ought not to amount to less than two-thirds of whatever number of European troops we maintained in India, whether that number were 40,000, the two-thirds of 60,000, or 53,000 some odd hundreds, the two-thirds of 80,000. It was also contended that a small local force would not occupy that equality of position as compared with troops of the Line which everybody seemed to regard as indispensable. The amount of local force to be maintained on the determination of my noble predecessor satisfied nobody. These views, I confess, took me somewhat by surprise, and tended very much to shake my confidence in the propriety of the determination which I had announced to the House. While the question was pending a succession of letters, extracts from which are on the table of the House, arrived from India, pointing out how much more grave and serious the conduct of the European troops who had mutinied was than had been supposed in the first instance. The mutiny began to assume the appearance not of being the work of young men who had just gone out to India, but of an organized combination among their older comrades, and this new aspect of affairs as represented by Lord Clyde and Sir William Mansfield, furnished ground for serious consideration.

Sir Charles Wood

In dealing with this subject, moreover, the question of expense had always presented one of the greatest difficulties. I myself was under the impression that the additional expense of Queen's troops would be very much greater than that of a local force. This, however, was a point with respect to which it was not easy to procure any impartial opinion, those who took opposite sides with respect to it being disposed to regard their own facts and figures as the only accurate data. I referred to the Registrar General under these circumstances, and he suggested a civilian not likely to be biassed by military views in order fairly to investigate the question. The Report of this gentleman has been laid upon the table, and the result is that the additional expense of maintaining Queen's troops is found to be much less than the Indian authorities supposed. Later in the course of the autumn, we received accounts of the number of men who took their discharge from the Indian army, and that in consequence that army was reduced from upwards of 24,000 to 12,000. The question, therefore, which we then had to consider was not whether we should maintain the Indian army, such as it was, but whether we should raise a new army—not to the extent of 24,000 men, for that number would not be satisfactory to the advocates of a local army—but to the extent of at least 40,000. It seems to me that after what has been reiterated by the advocates for maintaining a local army, we may dismiss altogether from our notice the proposal for maintaining a small local army in India, which is a course which everybody who pays regard to the efficiency of such a force seems to condemn. That was the question which we had to consider last June or July, but such is not the case at the present moment. Circumstances have altered within the ten or eleven months, and we are not therefore open to the charge of inconsistency, if we have now apparently come to a different decision from that at which we some time ago arrived. A small local army would be inefficient, a large one seemed to us to be dangerous, and we therefore came to the only possible conclusion, that a local army ought not to be maintained.

I have made this brief statement in order that the House may see the reasons by which our policy has been guided, and I shall now proceed to state more fully the grounds on which our decision is based. In doing so I think I may avail myself at the outset of an admission which was made in the discussion on the Motion of my hon. and gallant Friend behind me to the effect that à priori the argument is now in favour of our having only one army in India. During the period of the existence of the Company's government, there were many reasons which might be advanced in support of the maintenance of a Company's army. It was many years ago contended that it was necessary the army should belong to the governing power of the country, although even then many high authorities differed on the subject. Since, however, the transfer of power from the Company to the Queen has taken place, I think the force of argument lies entirely the other way. I dismiss altogether, for the reasons I have stated, the idea of a small local force. No person of authority advocates that there should be only one army in India, and that a local army. The question is between a large local army as well as troops of the Line, or only troops of the Line maintained in India. I would ask, in the first place, whether it is desirable to raise in the same country, and from the same class, two bodies of men for the same purpose, but ruled by different authorities and guided by different forms of military discipline. That is the first question which I call upon the advocates of the maintenance of a local army to answer in the affirmative, and if they cannot do so upon any reasonable grounds, then I contend the a priori argument is against the view which they take. If, then, they are not able to substantiate their view in this respect, they must either show that the local reasons are so strongly in favour of a double army as to overbalance the general disadvantages connected with such a system, or that it is impossible with justice to put an end to the existing army as it stands.

Now, I am prepared to admit that much ought to be conceded to the wishes of the Indian army, and that its interests ought to be carefully protected in dealing with this question. I should feel very differently if it were proposed simply to put an end to the Indian army; but the proposal is that they should be united to and form part of the Imperial army. I admit fully that nothing can be prouder than the recollections of the old Indian regiments of the three Presidencies; but we propose that they should form part of an army not less glorious than themselves, and on whose standards are emblazoned many of the battles from which they derive their own renown. Seringapatam and Delhi are not only on the standards of the Indian army, but on many of the standards of the English army. The victors of Arcot and Plassey would be associated with those of the Peninsula and Waterloo. What are the wishes and feelings of many of the Indian officers on this subject? I admit that the older officers are generally for the maintenance of the Indian army, but the greater part of the younger officers are in favour of amalgamation. Among the papers you will see statements to that effect. I would beg to call attention to the letters on the subject of Lord Elphinstone contained in these papers, because they contain the most reasonable and well-considered views on the whole question, without any prejudice of any kind. What does Lord Elphinstone say? I was constantly in communication with him on this subject, and in a letter to me Lord Elphinstone says:—

Sir Charles Wood

"With regard to the local army, I think that people in this country, with the exception of a few of the senior officers, are fast coming round to the view which I have always taken of the subject. If the local army has no exclusive privileges and advantages, it must of necessity sink into a secondary and inferior force. This conviction is now forcing itself upon the more intelligent of the local officers. They see that in amalgamation with the British army lies their only chance of continuing upon a footing of equality, or, perhaps, I should rather say, of maintaining the superior status which they have hitherto enjoyed."

The same observations are made by a very able and well-known Indian officer in this country. I asked him "What do the officers in the Indian army think of amalgamation?" He said, "Every officer above the rank of a major is for the continuance of the local army; of those under that rank nine-tenths are for amalgamation." It is not unnatural that the older officers should be attached to the proud recollections of the service with which they were connected; and, on the other hand, it is also natural that the younger and more active officers should be glad to have the chance of service in connection with their brothers in arms elsewhere than in India; and why should we damp that spirit from which the efficiency of our future army in India is to be derived?

I must now, Sir, perform what is certainly the most painful part of my duty to-night, which is to call the attention of the House to some of the extracts of the letters on the table, which I must say appear to me to furnish the strongest grounds for the course we are about to take. It would be exceedingly unbecoming in me, a civilian, to venture to give an opinion on the efficiency, or discipline, or conduct of a regiment or of an army; but those most competent to form such opinions have given them. Their opinions have influenced us, and I think they ought to influence this House. I shall give no opinion of my own; I shall simply read extracts from the letters which are before the House, containing the views of persons well acquainted with the circumstances, well acquainted with the facts, well able to form an opinion, and which will, I have no doubt, have great weight with this House. Of the gallantry, bravery, and endurance of the Indian army no one has ever expressed a doubt; but there does seem to be, I confess, a most unanimous concurrent testimony of all officers of the Queen's troops that the discipline of the Indian army is not what it ought to be. To a considerable extent this has been admitted by their own officers.

I do not mean by discipline being well set up, or smartness on parade; but I mean what has been so well expressed by Sir John Lawrence when he said:—

"While I admit that the tone and interior economy of a Royal regiment may on the average be somewhat superior to that of a local regiment, the difference is not so marked as may be supposed."

[Opposition cries of "Hear, hear!"]

All I seek to establish by that extract is that the interior economy of a Royal regiment is superior to that of a local regiment. But I was anxious to quote the words which so well express what I mean by the short expression of discipline. It may be said that the Queen's officers are partial witnesses; but when I find them saying that the discipline of a Queen's regiment remaining long in India deteriorates to a considerable extent, they may be admitted to be just to both services. What does that prove? It proves that there is some cause acting upon both local and English regiments to deteriorate the discipline of troops remaining long in India, and it is not difficult to assign a reason. I use the word discipline as the shortest. I mean by it the interior economy of a regiment and the relation subsisting between its officers and men. I believe it has been generally observed that a local colonial corps which cannot come under the general supervision of the higher military authorities is apt to degenerate more especially if they serve in a climate where exertion and energy are not likely to carry them on for a very long time, unless under the stimulus of war. Officers, after ten or fifteen years in India, are not so active and energetic as they might have been in a cool climate, or had they been in India for a shorter period. Sir James Outram, an experienced Indian officer, speaks of a Queen's regiment, after ten or fifteen years in India, being in the same state as a Company's regiment; and he speaks of the system of the Indian army being such that it is a wonder there is any discipline at all. That discipline in that army is sadly deficient, we have the direct testimony of Lord Elphinstone again. He speaks both of the system of Native and European forces. He says:—

"The same system, resulting in the total want of all influence over their men in the regimental officers, has led to both. The organization of the late Bengal army was as faulty as its discipline was lax."

There can not be a more impartial witness on this subject than Lord Clyde. He has served in India for a great part of his career, as well as in all parts of the world, and is a most competent authority on military matters. What does Lord Clyde say?—

"It is clear from what we have now seen that it is absolutely necessary not to trust to local corps, and that we can alone put faith in a discipline which is constantly renovated by return to England, and the presence of officers with their regiments who look on them as their homes."

In a letter to the Duke of Cambridge, Lord Clyde says:—

"As your Royal Highness knows, I have always been strongly of the opinion that it is impossible, as shown by practice and experience, to maintain discipline in a local corps, such as we expect in one of Her Majesty's regiments, but it did not occur to me that the loyalty of local corps might suffer."

Sir Hugh Rose, not a martinet soldier, goes at great length into the question, I will only read one paragraph; but the whole letter turns on the same point:—

"Nobody has mixed more with Indian officers than I have. I have never had a shadow of a difference with them because I was a Queen's officer and they were Company's or Indian officers. I know the state of their feeling. They admit to me that the disorganization and undiscipline of the Bengal army, and in a lesser degree of the Indian army in general, were the causes of the mutinies. They admit, especially since the mutinous conduct of the European Indian army in the discharge question, that amalgamation is necessary for the better discipline of the Indian army."

Such is the opinion of these high authorities. I am quite aware that there is much to palliate the conduct of the younger soldiers. But it is not true that the mutiny was confined to the younger soldiers. We thought at first that this had been so, but what says Lord Clyde upon the point?

"I beg leave again to draw your Royal Highness's attention to the fact of the passive participation of the non-commissioned officers and so called good men of the Bengal Artillery in the evil intentions of the younger and bolder men who were so near the commission of the worst crime."

Again he says:—

"Even in the old regiments the men have not confidence in their officers. And further in my mind I must accuse the old soldiers of the Bengal Artillery of having been the prime movers and ringleaders in all this bad business."

It is perfectly obvious from his letters that, while Lord Clyde did not attach much importance to the outbreak of the recently enlisted soldiers, the deepest possible impression was produced on his mind by the disaffection of the veterans of the Bengal army. He thought, in fact, that a just appreciation of the state of that army as it was disclosed during the summer, particularly in its older soldiers, was perfectly fatal to the maintenance of a local European corps. A much more serious subject of reflection, however, presents itself in connection with what then took place—namely, the power of combination possessed by an army permanently located in India with a separate interest from the rest of the Queen's troops. All history tells us of the danger that may result from a large body of men with arms in their hands having such a separate interest and a power of combining together; for that the combination which took place on the occasion to which I have referred was extensive and perfect is abundantly clear. I do not insist upon this with the view of dilating on the faults of the men who took part in the movement; but I do wish strongly to impress it upon the House as a warning for the future. And here I will read only one paragraph from Sir William Mansfield's letter:—

"I have observed in The Times and some Parliamentary speeches which arrived by the last mail a disposition to slur over and make little of the misconduct in the local European army in this country. I venture to impress on you the gravity and danger of the crisis which we have tided over, and that it was impossible to exceed in completeness and wickedness the combination which threatened us in May last. Such was the feeling throughout the Bengal Artillerymen that, though the old soldiers and non-commissioned officers were too wary to commit themselves to overt crime, not one of them in any part of the country came forward to warn their officers of what was impending; their combination and conspiracy in this respect being more thorough than that of the Sepoys themselves in 1857."

That suggests matter for very serious consideration, and the view which may be taken of it is forcibly expressed in a further extract from Lord Clyde's letter, which says:—

"Whatever may now be done, the recollection of this strike or mutiny will never die out in the Indian local army. It will very possibly affect Her Majesty's army also in a minor degree; but in the former—namely, the Indian local army—it will live for ever, and be a precedent to which the minds of the men will always revert when they are dissatisfied with their work or the regulations affecting them. I am, therefore, irresistibly led to the conclusion that henceforth it will be dangerous to the State to maintain a European local army. . . . I feel I should be wanting in my duty were I to remain silent, now that the strongest conviction has arisen in my mind that from henceforth we should have no local Europeans whatever."

Sir Charles Wood

Now, be it remembered that Sir William Mansfield was originally in favour of the maintenance of a local European army. He had stated that opinion very decidedly, but the result of what occurred on this unhappy occasion entirely converted him to the opposite view. This is explained at length in the correspondence, but, as I do not want to trouble the House with more quotations than are fairly due to the importance of the subject, I will read only one more extract penned by him. He says:—

"I reiterate that the experience of the last six months forbids us to entertain the idea of a local European army of any size, if we value the existence of the empire."

Sir Charles Trevelyan, who has taken the greatest possible interest in all military matters, says:—

"The Royal army is one which, under all the various contingencies to which an empire like ours in India is subject, is more to be depended upon for loyalty to the mother country."

As I said before, I do not wish to dwell on these circumstances with a view to exaggerate the misconduct of the men, but I think we should be wanting to ourselves if we did not take warning by what has happened, and did not adopt such measures as human foresight can suggest to prevent the recurrence of such combinations among our troops to demand from the State whatever they might claim as their right. What took place on that occasion ought, as General Mansfield expresses it, to be to us like "the handwriting on the wall," and ought to induce us to use all the precautions in our power against the possibility of its repetition. Now, Sir, I take it to be as clearly demonstrable as anything can be, that the danger of combination is far less in a moveable force which is constantly changing its situation, which is stationed in India at one time, in some other part of our dominions at another time, and which at regular intervals renovates itself by a return to its native country, than in a force permanently located in India. In the Queen's army, if discontent appears in a regiment it may be moved away almost in the ordinary course of duty, but if it appears in part of a force permanently stationed in the country, it may soon spread, may leaven the whole mass and imperil the stability of your empire. The conclusion, therefore, at which we have arrived from the correspondence is that, for the sake both of military efficiency and political safety, the army of India ought to be one and the same with the Queen's.

I certainly was a little struck at finding that in the Military Committee of the Indian Council it was urged that the misconduct of the local troops was a powerful reason for maintaining a mixed European force. I was not only astonished, but sorry to see such an argument used. One more dangerous and fatal could hardly have been advanced. That there are, and would continue to be, jealousies between the two corps I think no man can doubt who reads this correspondence. I have heard that the Queen's officers complain that, having to serve in India, and to go through the same hardships as the local army, they were excluded from the rewards which it enjoys; while, on the other hand, the Indian officers complain, and perhaps not unnaturally either, that they should be shouldered out of the monopoly of good things which they have hitherto possessed. Those jealousies are strongly stated both in Sir James Outram's Minute, and by Lord Clyde. Lord Elphinstone also mentions these jealousies, the differences which exist between the two forces being, in his opinion, one of the strongest grounds for their amalgamation. Out of these differences arises the double Staff. It is also impossible to select on all occasions the fittest man for a particular post, because he must be taken from the one corps, and not from the other. Lord Elphinstone points out, as clearly and conclusively as words can do, that nothing but making the two forces one can put an end to these feelings, which at present prejudice the interests of Her Majesty's service. He says:—

"There is but one way of setting the question at rest for ever, and that is, amalgamation. If it is not done at once, in the meantime mutual jealousies will go on increasing, and the difficulty of the inevitable final step will be increased."

Let us consider for a moment what is the real value of this argument for maintaining the distinction between the two services. It is that the safety of our Indian Empire depends on our being able to use one half of our European troops against the other! Heaven help us if we are driven to rely upon such a resource of safety as that! The argument seems to me utterly untenable, and if we are to trust to it it would be far better that we should quit India to-morrow. We have had that argument used on a former occasion in connection with a previous state of discontent that existed in the Madras army. Sir John

Malcolm, from whom I take the liberty of quoting a very short extract, thus deals with it. Speaking of the Indian army, he says:—

"They should be put upon a footing which would make them have an honourable pride in the service to which they belong. This they never can have (such is the nature of military feeling) while they consider themselves one shade even below another army with which they are constantly associated. There is, perhaps, no other efficient remedy for this great evil than the adoption of a measure by which the whole of that army which Great Britain employs in India should be consolidated into one. The distinctions which now exist are pregnant with every mischief to our rule. They are the source of constant irritation, and are calculated to produce an opposition of feeling among those whose complete union is the pillar of strength on which Great Britain must depend for the safety of her possessions in India. It has been suggested that such divisions might be useful, as they maintained a salutary check; but this limited and unwise suggestion can never merit a moment's attention. It is founded on a distrust of ourselves, which is quite incompatible with the permanent preservation of our Eastern possessions."

I think I could not in words express more clearly my own feelings and opinions on this subject.

These are the grounds on which we have come to the conclusion, that both our military efficiency and political safety in India, require the amalgamation of the European forces in India. I should not, however, fully discharge my task if I did not advert to the main arguments of those who advocate separate armies for India. The first argument, which has been put forward in two or three papers which are before the House, refers to the danger which must ensue to India if there should be any power in the Home Government of withdrawing troops from India to England. I think that argument is without foundation. It must be for the Central Government to decide where the wants of the empire are greatest, and where the strength of the empire ought to be concentrated. During the Crimean war it might be necessary that the forces of the country should be concentrated in Europe. During the China war they were properly diverted from that country for the defence of our Indian Empire. If the Home Government are not to be trusted with the decision and the discretion of saying where the forces of the empire ought to be stationed, they are not fit to hold the position of rulers. The risk is said to be in withdrawing such a force as will endanger the safety of India, and we are told that the safety of India was endangered by the troops that were kept from India in consequence of the Crimean war. Now I have ascertained that the force in India in 1857 was less than the force in 1854 by 1,600 men only. But what remedy against this danger is provided by the advocates of a local force? Their proposal is that one-third of the force should be Queen's troops, as to whom the Government are to have absolute power of withdrawal. Take the proportion of 40,000 and 20,000 which has been proposed. The Government at home are to have the power of withdrawing 20,000 men, and we are told that the withdrawal a force of 1,600 will endanger the safety of our Indian Empire. The argument is perfectly absurd, even if the Government are not to be trusted with the power of looking to the general safety of the empire.

The next argument is that the power of the Governor General will be destroyed by the removal of the local European army. I am at a loss to see how this position is proved. There is in one of the papers a long enumeration of duties in reference to the army said to be discharged by the Governor General, but which it seems to me to be impossible for the Governor General to perform, and which would be far better discharged by the Adjutant General or the Quartermaster General. The Governor General ought to have, locally and temporally, the whole power that the Government at home possess, and surely with this power it cannot be said that his authority or position are impaired.

The next argument is the greater expense of the Queen's service. I confess that on the first consideration of the matter, I thought the excess of expense of the Queen's troops much greater than, upon investigation, it appears to be. Depend upon it, also, the most efficient force will be the cheapest in the end; and I do not think we ought to be deterred by the greater expense of the plan proposed, if, on other accounts, we think it good. From the calculations which he made, Mr. Hammack states that if the whole of the existing local force were converted into Queen's troops, the increased cost would be about £114,000 a year. If we assume the whole European force at 80,000, the substitution of local troops, to the extent of two-fifths, as proposed by Lord Stanley, would make a saving of about £184,000. A saving of under £200,000 would, however, as I think, be a very trifling consideration, in an expenditure of at least £14,000,000, if it is to be weighed against considerations of safety or efficiency. I believe that the expenditure may be very much reduced by changes in the system of depôts, reliefs, and the double staff; and I confess I think there is no proof that the change proposed would ultimately entail an increased expense of £200,000.

It is further objected that the whole expenditure for India would depend upon the will of the authorities at home. No expense, however, can be incurred for India, except by the consent of the Secretary of State and the Council for India; and that is as complete a check as can be devised for the control of the expenditure. The question of expense turns mainly on the comparative health and efficiency of troops permanently stationed in India, and of troops frequently relieved. The returns certainly at first sight seem to show that the health of the Indian troops is the best. Mr. Hammack, however, considers the returns very imperfect; and the conclusion is certainly at variance with well known facts and opinions. Returns contained in Mr. Hammack's Report show that the health of civilians deteriorates according to length of residence in India. Mr. Martin, the highest medical authority in the Indian service, says that length of residence in India, so far from conferring any advantage on the English constitution in the way of acclimatization, surely and gradually leads to physical degradation. The general assumption is that English regiments, on landing, have so much sickness that they rapidly lose their men. This is not, however, borne out by the facts. Lord Elphinstone says:

"Last year there was a considerable excess in the average both of sickness and mortality in the Company's army, though the great majority of the Queen's troops had only just arrived."

Mr. Hammack, in summing up the arguments, comes to the conclusion that the most beneficial results will follow from the practice of more frequent reliefs. It is perfectly well known that men come home invalided from India, who are quite competent to serve in a temperate climate. Men who are young and able-bodied, because they can no longer serve in India, are placed upon the pension list; so that the dead weight of the Indian army is greater than that of any army in the world. Men come home invalided after a short service in India, who, under a system of reliefs, might serve many years in this country, whereby the Indian exchequer might be relieved from the payment of their pensions for many years before they now come upon it. I do not think, therefore, that the arguments against abolishing the local force, drawn from even the possibility of a slight increase of cost, ought to have such weight as to induce us to pause.

Sir Charles Wood

I come now, however, to a consideration which led me to doubt for a considerable time as to the course which was best to be taken. I mean the argument that, if the local European force is amalgamated with the Queen's troops, we shall not be able to obtain that supply of officers for service in India, which the wants of that country imperatively require. If I thought it impossible to provide a suitable supply of officers I should hesitate in the course I am now taking. Before entering particularly into this subject, however, I wish to make one or two observations. The House must remember that the union of the local with the European army, does not necessarily imply any change in the mode of officering the Native army. I think it ought, but it does not necessarily follow that it should. It has been the custom never to remove an officer from a Native regiment till he has reached the rank of lieutenant-colonel; and it is quite possible, therefore, that the Native army should continue to be officered as it now is. I do not think that is the way it should be officered. I only wish to point out to the House, that if there were no other means of providing officers for the Indian service, there would be no difficulty in continuing the present system of officering the Native army, and selecting from those corps officers for Staff employment. Indeed, for some time to come the regular regiments in Bengal, and the armies of Bombay and Madras, must probably be maintained very much on their present footing.

Another observation I wish to make is one suggested by an old Indian of great experience—that of late years there has taken place a great change in the character of Indian officers. They are not so entirely devoted to India as their scene of service as they formerly were, when they used to go on leave only to the Cape of Good Hope and return to India again; a practice which led the officer to regard India very much as his home. The more rapid and easy communication with England now enables officers to come home instead of going, as heretofore, only to the Cape; and this circumstance has tended very much to diminish the difference between the officers of the local army and those of the Line. The former are not so exclusively Indian as they once were.

But what are the services for which these officers are required? They are principally on what is called Staff employment, and that in India has a very large significance. It includes diplomatic service, employment as collectors, magistrates, and judges, service in the Commissariat and Ordnance departments, in the Pay Office and in public works and, indeed, in every conceivable mode of employment. So far as the civil service is concerned, I think the supply from the army is a very valuable one; but the efficiency of the army is impaired by the removal of officers from their regiments. So far as the civil service is concerned it would be better to provide for it in some other way than to ruin the army. But even as applicable to all Staff employment the present system is by universal admission the worst that could be adopted for the army. The officers are taken from their regiments and employed in the discharge of civil duties, perhaps for many years, and then return to the command of their regiments when they have ceased to have any practical knowledge of military matters. I will only trouble the House with one quotation from the opinions of both Queen's and Indian officers on this subject, though they all concur in condemning it. Sir Patrick Grant says:—

“The efficiency of regiments, in my opinion, is most injuriously affected by the number of officers taken from corps for Staff employment. Either regiments are drained of their best and most deserving officers, or patronage is not dispensed with reference to superior merit. . . . European officers now fix their whole thoughts on devising means of getting away to Staff and other detached employment; anything rather than regimental duty is the universal feeling. The consequences of this craving are utter indifference, not to say positive dislike, towards their men, and the engendering of a reckless, discontented disposition, which is, I doubt not, communicated to the soldiers.”

I need read no more to prove the vice of the present practice. Whether the local army be maintained or not it is indispensably necessary to put an end to this system, and provide officers for the civil service in some way which would not impair the efficiency of the regiments. This may, I think, be most conveniently effected by the formation of a staff corps, from which officers could be chosen for such employment.

There is another point on which I wish to state my opinion. I have arrived at the conviction that the whole of the Native army should be under what is called the irregular system—a term which does not, however, mean what the words seem to imply, for the regiment would be under the most careful superintendence and exact military regulations. Lord Elphinstone, Sir John Lawrence, and other distinguished Indian authorities are of opinion that the Native army, cavalry, and infantry, should be placed on the irregular system. The Commission on the organization and the Military Committee of the Indian Council have recommended that all the Native cavalry, and part of the infantry should be so formed. In point of fact this is now the case as to the greater part of the army in Bengal, and the whole of the forces going to China are organized on the irregular system. Lord Elphinstone says :—

“The best regiments in Bengal were the irregular cavalry, and the same holds good throughout India. I would apply this system to the whole Native army, infantry as well as cavalry.”

Sir Henry Frere, after recommending it strongly, proceeds as follows :—

“The essential difference between the two bodies is not the being subject to—or exempt from rule generally. Both are subject to rules of their own, and the difference is in the nature of the rule, which is often stricter and more imperative in the irregular than in the regular corps; but the unwritten rules of common sense applied according to the judgment of a single selected officer, to which the so-called irregular is subject, appears to me much better adapted for the government of Native troops than written rules intended to ensure uniformity of system and conformity to the English army, which have lately governed the regular Indian army; therefore, I would advocate the general adoption of the former system.”

Under this system I believe that the discipline is more effective than it otherwise would be, and it affords the opportunity of employing Natives of a higher description in your army than can be found in any other mode of service. There is another advantage to be especially looked at in the present state of Indian finance, and that is, that it is cheaper. Then comes the question, how is the unattached Staff Corps to which I have referred to be formed? Sir John Lawrence, Brigadier Chamberlain, and Colonel Edwards in their Paper on the Indian Army, suggest a mode of doing so by the formation of colleges in India, and a certain amount of training. I will only quote the concluding paragraph relating to the subject. “By such a system a well selected, highly trained, and efficient Staff would be secured for the irregular regiments.” Other modes have been suggested, but in whatever way this may be done the selection should be made from young men in regiments in India. Whatever Indian appointments there are they should be eligible for them, and the Native troops should be officered from that corps. It is obviously a matter of indifference whether they are taken from a local force and also Line, or from the Line only, the selection in either case resting with the Indian Government. Then comes the next question—is it likely that the Line will furnish an adequate supply of those officers? Lord Canning, in a Minute which I have laid upon the table to-night, expresses a strong opinion that they will not. His opinion, however, is contrary to that of many others well able to judge on such a point. The arguments against our expectations of getting a sufficient supply of officers from the Line are founded on a state of things in which those officers have not been in a position to obtain those appointments. It is only recently that Staff appointments have been thrown open to officers in the Queen's service, and therefore it is not fair to argue that young men will not in future be found to do that which hitherto they have not had any opportunity of doing. Upon this point Sir Charles Trevelyan says—

Sir Charles Wood

“But if, instead of this, an Indian career were opened to Line officers, and it were arranged that a certain period of regimental service in India, with a certain proficiency in military science and the Native languages, would qualify for transfer to the local Staff corps, young men would crowd into the Line regiments serving in India in order to push their fortunes in that country.”

Sir Patrick Grant says the same—

“Under this system the European officers would look upon their regiments as their homes; to be attached to a Native corps would be considered one of the prizes of the service; and the permanent association between officers and men that must ensue would, more than anything, tend to restore the old feeling of mutual respect and attachment which, in the early days of British power in India, united the Native soldier and his European officers.”

Lord Elphinstone takes a similar view. He says—

“I am convinced that it would be a wholesome stimulus to exertion; and that, in the room of one young officer of merit withdrawn from his regiment for the Indian Staff list, you would have two or three qualifying themselves, not only for selection to this list, but for the active duties of their profession.”

He goes on to say—

“If the question of local or Line troops turns upon whether the Line can supply a sufficient number of officers, qualified for the various duties now taken by the officers of the Indian army, I have no doubt that the decision will be in favour of the Line. Wherever an opening has been made for officers of the Line, they have eagerly prepared themselves, by studying the Native languages, to compete with the Company's officers."

He further says—

"I have just received an answer to an inquiry I made as to the number of officers in the Queen's Regiment here (the 81st), who are studying Hindostani. I find that, besides one officer who is in England, and who is said to be a very good Hindostani scholar, three of those present with the regiment have passed the examination in the vernacular, and two more have lately begun to study. This in a regiment which has hardly been a year in the country, and with hardly any inducements to officers to take the trouble of acquiring a new language."

Sir William Mansfield says—

"We should have one homogeneous service, which would present a much wider field of selection for the instruments of Indian civil and military administration than we had under the old system, and I believe that the fear that we should lose our means of preserving to India a class of gentlemen properly educated for it, would be found to be a vain and futile one."

Colonel Norman in the same sense says—

"It would be found, I am persuaded, that a list of this description would be composed of good, hard-working officers; and that the evil anticipated by some, that we should not have a body of officers who had made up their minds to serve in India, would never be felt. On the contrary, I believe the Staff would be better supplied than at present."

What I contemplate then is that we should have a body of officers so raised, so trained, and so employed by the Indian Government rising in rank after a certain number of years' service, and devoted to an Indian career. That is the ultimate state of things which I hope to arrive at, but which cannot be attained for some years, as the existing Indian officers have prior claim to service on the Staff. The officers of the late Bengal army are to a great extent at present so employed, and it is only as vacancies occur that openings for officers of the Line will present themselves. This interval will afford ample time to ascertain whether or not the officers of the Line will furnish a sufficient number of candidates. If the supply from that source should not be adequate, there will be ample time for us to take other means for procuring the requisite supply of officers. This employment on the Staff is the answer to the fears which have been expressed, that there is any intention to break faith with the Indian officers. Those fears are unfounded, as such an idea has never been entertained. It would be most unjust, most ungenerous, and most unwise to break faith with those officers. Let me show how our measures would affect different classes of officers. Take the case of an European regiment in the Company's service. All the existing officers of that regiment will rise by regimental seniority until they arrive at the usual period of rising by general seniority. All the new officers in that regiment will come in as Queen's officers, available for general service. Every soldier in that regiment has entered for ten years, and at the end of that time will be entered for general service, as will all men who are raised for them henceforward. If the regiment remains in India for ten years, the probability is that few officers and none of the men will have any claim to be continued on Indian allowances. After about that time the regiment will be available for general service. With regard to these regiments, we propose to try whether a system which is much advocated by many Gentlemen in this House will be successful or not. We do not propose to introduce the system of purchase there. An officer entering will rise by seniority to the rank of captain, and thence to the grades of major and lieutenant-colonel, partly by selection and partly by seniority. I do not myself entertain that objection to the purchase system which is felt by some, but I will not enter into the subject now. The real difficulty, however, as regards Indian officers does not occur in European regiments or in the amalgamation of the European troops. The difficulty arises from the number of officers of the Native army whose regiments have been disbanded. There were seventy-four regiments of regular Native infantry in the Bengal army, but only fifteen now remain. No one will propose to create anew the Bengal army as it existed before the mutiny. These officers can not claim it as a right that the Indian army should be maintained on its former footing and to its former extent in order that their pay and privileges should be preserved to them unchanged. Nor can they claim that an European army should be formed with a sole view to their employment. The arrangement which we propose, as it seems to me, violates no right to which they can lay legitimate claim, and it is just the course proposed by Sir Patrick Grant in reference to the Madras army, when he suggested the reduction of twelve regiments. There will be no difficulty in forming a Staff corps and officering the irregular regiments from this corps. A check has been given to retirements from the uncertainty which has prevailed. I think measures should be taken to encourage it in the elder officers, and if some facility be offered to that end, I believe it will lead to the retirement of many, and that ultimately we are more likely to want officers than to have more than we need. Then I have heard that a great many officers would be glad to change their positions for a similar rank in the Line. Every officer of the Indian army will, if he chooses, have the power of exchanging into the Line, and will be eligible for command in any part of the world. Thus the general plan will be, that the European regiments will form part of the Queen's army, the existing officers retaining their positions, rising by seniority, as they do now; that officers will enter them for general service, rising by seniority to the rank of captain, and afterwards by selection to the rank of major and lieutenant-colonel; that the existing officers of the Indian army will be employed either as they are now in the regular regiments, or in various situations on the Staff; and that ultimately vacancies in the Staff corps will be filled up by candidates selected from the Queen's general army. That is an outline of the scheme for the organization of the Indian army. But I wish to place before the House the alternative, which is a matter for serious consideration. We are called upon to maintain a local army of at least 40,000 men. The number of local troops at this moment I will assume to be about 15,000. The question, therefore, is not one of maintaining an existing establishment, but of raising at least 25,000 men in addition, and of training them in this country for service in India. Now, how is that to be done? Lord Canning's last Minute proposes twenty-four additional regiments for Bengal alone. It is admitted that new regiments cannot and ought not to be formed in India. That experiment has been tried, and failed. We must then form, drill, and train in this country for the service of Bengal alone twenty-four European regiments. What will the advocates of economy say to this? In the meantime we are to maintain the same number of Queen's troops in India. And then, when these new and raw troops are trained and drilled, I suppose the old experienced soldiers of the Line regiments, which we have kept in India for the time, are to be disbanded. I ask the House seriously to consider this question. If we adopt the views I have stated we shall be put to the expense, trouble, and delay of raising these men, and of training them in England for a certain number of years, paying out of the Indian revenue for the double force of Queen's troops now forming part of the garrison of India, and the force trained in this country which is to form the future garrison. I do not think that anybody will entertain such a project on the score either of economy or efficiency. If we are to calculate on two-thirds of 80,000 men, I should have to add some 15,000 men more. The Indian officers of Native regiments, avowedly incapable of forming European troops, would have to be brought home to officer them, and Queen's officers be borrowed to train both officers and men. I entreat hon. Gentlemen to consider what such a proceeding would entail upon this country and upon India. I must say that I do not think that when this proposal is seriously considered, it can be entertained by the House. Hitherto I have said nothing as to the authorities on one side or the other, but I must beg the House not to be led away by the notion that this is a mere question between Indian and English authorities. The highest Indian authorities are extraordinarily divided on the point. Lord Ellenborough, who has paid great attention to it, is strongly in favour of an Indian army. Lord Elphinstone, who has had more experience in India than almost anybody, who has been Governor of two Presidencies, whose conduct throughout the whole of the Indian mutiny has met with universal approbation, and who has shown himself most competent to deal with Indian questions, is in favour of the amalgamation. Lord Canning has sent home a strong Minute against amalgamation. Sir Charles Trevelyan, who, with all his faults, knows a great deal about India, and has paid great attention to all military questions there, expresses an equally strong opinion the other way. There are no two men who are better acquainted with India than Sir George Clerk and Sir John Lawrence, and they express directly opposite opinions. Sir Archdale Wilson, the conqueror of Delhi, goes one way; Sir James Outram, the conqueror of Lucknow, goes the other way. Sir Robert Vivian is strongly in favour of a local army; Sir Patrick Grant, the Commander in Chief at Madras, is in favour of amalgamation. Going back to the past, we find that Sir

Sir Charles Wood

Thomas Munro was favourable to a local army, while Sir John Malcolm was against it. Mountstuart Elphinstone was in favour of a local army; Sir Charles Metcalfe thought there ought to be one army only. I have quoted half-a-dozen authorities on each side, and of the most eminent modern statesmen and soldiers, differing completely on this subject. I must maintain, therefore, that the arguments I have endeavoured to lay before the House are not overborne by the overpowering weight of Indian officers. Lord Cornwallis was strongly in favour of one army, and that in the time of the Company's rule. He could not carry out his views, the India Company being too strong for him, and overpowering the opinion of one of the most experienced of our statesmen and soldiers. I was surprised the other day to hear the Duke of Wellington quoted as an authority for a Native army. Now, in 1812, Lord Melville wrote to the Duke of Wellington, then in Spain, and asked his opinion on this subject. I need not state how great was his experience of Indian matters, and how entirely he was influenced by the sole consideration of the good of his country. The Duke of Wellington wrote to Lord Melville, in answer, to this effect:—

"I will not miss this opportunity of stating to you my opinion, — first, that the European army in the East Indies ought to be the King's; secondly, that the three armies (that is, the armies of the three Presidencies) ought to continue separate and distinct; thirdly, that the Native army ought to be the Company's, if the Company should continue to be the Sovereign of the territory; fifthly, it is my opinion that all authority, civil and military, must be vested by the law in the Governor in Council. The law must recognize no other authority in the State. The Company may, and ought to, instruct the Governor in Council—first, to leave all matters of discipline solely and exclusively to the Commander-in-Chief, and to interfere in them in no manner, excepting when the safety of the State should require it; secondly, that all recommendations to military appointments, such as the Staff officers of the army to commissions, promotions in the army of persons—civil or military—to fill the departments of the army, and the inferior commands, should be made by the Commander-in-chief to the Governor in Council. The Governor in Council should be obliged to record his reasons for dissent. Thirdly, the recommendations to superior commands, such as divisions of the army, should be with the Commander-in-chief when the holders of these commands exercise no civil authority or political function; and that, in the case of a nomination to a higher command being vested exclusively in the Governor in Council, without the recommendation of the Commander-in-chief, the Governor should be directed to consult with the Commander-in-chief in making the selection. It would be very desirable to leave a latitude by law to the Governor in Council to promote officers for meritorious services, at the recommendation of the Commander-in-chief, out of the usual regular routine, as well as to pass over officers guilty of misconduct. This might be done by giving the Governor in Council the power to promote such officers, by brevet in the first instance, who should succeed to the first vacancies in the rank to which they should have been promoted in the regiment to which they should belong."

I have read the whole of that opinion, and it will be observed that the three main conditions which, in the Duke of Wellington's opinion, should be carried into effect are, that the European army in India should be the Queen's, that the armies of the three Presidencies should be distinct, and that the supreme authority of the Governor General should be recognized.

These are the essential parts of the scheme which I propose. I must deny also that this is exclusively an Indian question, and I maintain that both on Indian and on Imperial grounds the course which ought to be pursued is that upon which the Government has resolved. It is quite true that the mutiny of the Sepoys is over, and that tranquillity is restored; but I confess that there are still many grounds for solicitude. The confidence of all classes which once prevailed is shaken, and, what is still more alarming, I am afraid that there is considerable estrangement between the races. Therefore it is essential, in the first place, to put on a footing which cannot be shaken our military superiority. The rebellion was put down by the unparalleled constancy and bravery of our fellow countrymen, both in the Civil and Military Service, and of the European forces, and we have vindicated and established our superiority; but I hold that it must be maintained so complete and so evident that none shall question the efficiency of our arms. I am far from meaning that we should not endeavour to make use of every means of conciliation. We are bound to show the Natives that we are their friends and benefactors, and that they would lose by a change. I believe that such a course of proceeding is essential to the maintenance of our power in India. I am anxious not to place everything upon mere force, or upon the authority of the Government, but to depend mainly upon measures of improvement and upon the influence of reason. Still, to be able to act in this way the Natives of India must feel, and we must feel, that we are not to be shaken in our military supremacy. The Englishman must feel that he is so safe that he has nothing to fear, for fear and jealousy are always cruel. The Natives must feel that it is useless to plot and conspire against us. Thus and thus alone, after what has happened, can we place ourselves in such a position that we may be enabled to extend those blessings to India which I believe it is our destiny to confer. But I believe also that we must pursue this course not only for Indian, but also for Imperial reasons; for any evil which falls on India must be felt severely in this country. In the last mutiny how much English blood was shed, and what a great strain India became upon the resources of England! It is upon England in case of emergency that the pressure must come; therefore, it is only fair, right, and just that we should put our army in India in a state of the greatest possible discipline and efficiency, and constitute it in such a manner as to prevent, as far as human foresight can do so, the possibility of the occurrence of a calamity far more alarming than a Sepoy mutiny. I hope the House will concur in the plan which is now proposed by the Government, and I beg to move for leave to bring in a Bill to repeal so much of the Act of the 22 and 23 Vict., c. 27, as enables the Secretary of State for India to raise men for Her Majesty's local European forces in India.

Motion made, and Question proposed,—

“That leave be given to bring in a Bill to repeal so much of the Act of the twenty-second and twenty-third Victoria, chapter twenty-seven, as enables the Secretary of State for India to raise men for Her Majesty's Local European Forces in India.”

Mr. DANBY SEYMOUR moved the adjournment of the debate.

Debate adjourned till Thursday, 21st June.

House adjourned at
One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Wednesday, June 13, 1860.

The House met for the transaction of judicial business.

House adjourned at Half-past Eleven o'clock, A.M., till To-morrow, at a Quarter before Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, June 13, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1° Sale of Gas Act Amendment.

2° Local Boards of Health, &c. ; Local Government Supplemental ; Lands Clauses Consolidation Act (1845) Amendment ; Friendly Societies Act Amendment.

MINES REGULATION AND INSPECTION BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clause 1 (No Boy under twelve years of age to be employed in Mines.)

MR. PAGET said, he rose to move that the age be fixed at thirteen years instead of twelve. The first clause provided, that no boy under twelve years of age should be allowed to work in mines, except under conditions set forth in the second clause. The second clause enacted that no boy between the age of ten and twelve years be employed in a mine or colliery until the owner had first obtained a certificate under the hand of a competent schoolmaster that such boy was able to read and write. It also required that another certificate should be produced every month showing that they had attended school for not less than twenty hours during the month immediately preceding. In his opinion there would be considerable difficulty in working this scheme, because the certificate of a competent schoolmaster was a very uncertain expression, which might mean anything or nothing. If the section meant that a boy should be able to read and write tolerably well from dictation, the number of children who would be able to produce such certificate of their ability would be very small indeed. From a population possessing the ordinary means of school learning, he had ascertained by examinations, during several years, that the number of children able to read tolerably was not fifteen out of forty-six, which number would be considerably reduced if writing from dictation was required from a boy before he received his certificate. He thought he could show that the system which he proposed would be much more beneficial to the employer than that under the Bill. He proposed that any boy above ten years old should be allowed to work in mines on condition that his attendance at school up to his thirteenth year should be equal to forty hours in a month, the attendance being given not on consecutive days, and not during the evening. From his own experience, he could state that that would give them a very fair amount of education. He had found that children did very little good at school when they were jaded and worn after a hard day's work, and by the plan he suggested they would have some relaxation from their underground toil, and would receive instruction under such conditions as would render it really profitable. In factories the age to which the education of children was continued was thirteen, and the system had met with a decided success. He had opposed the Factory Bill at the time of its introduction, on the ground that it was an undue interference between masters and employed, but he was now convinced from the experience he had had of its working that its educational clauses had conferred great benefit on the operatives, both mentally, morally, and physically, and he had never met with any person who did not concur in that statement. Great advantage had been reaped by the working classes from the education which had thus been forced upon them, and there was, therefore, fair ground for extending the same system to other trades and manufactures. There was nothing in the circumstances of mining labour which rendered education less necessary to those engaged in it. By the plan he proposed the children would have occasional relief from toil, and would be subjected to wholesome influence, and employers, as experience showed in all such cases, would find them in their work more intelligent, alert, and active.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 20, to leave out the word "twelve," and insert the word "thirteen," — instead thereof.

MR. CLIVE said, the limit of age fixed in the Bill had been adopted upon the almost unanimous recommendation of the Inspectors of Mines. It was thought undesirable to interfere more than was absolutely necessary between the employers and employed. If the age, as proposed, were fixed at twelve, it would deprive the owners, it was alleged, of much valuable labour, and of course the limit of thirteen years would operate still more injuriously. His hon. Friend said this provision had worked very well in regard to factories; but Sir John Kincaid, one of the inspectors, declared that in Scotland children under thirteen years of age were virtually excluded from employment in factories by the enforcement of the educational clauses of the Factory Act. Moreover, from what he knew of mining labour he felt pretty sure that, if children were compelled to absent themselves from work for two days a week, and those not consecutive days, it was equivalent to saying that they should not go down the mines at all, and the whole system would be thrown into confusion. For these reasons he could not assent to the Amendment.

MR. LIDDELL said, he rose to oppose the Amendment. He had an Amendment on the paper to leave out altogether the restrictive Clauses 1, 2, and 3 of the Bill. The first clause was a prohibitory clause as far as children under twelve years were concerned. The second clause was in effect a relaxation of that prohibition under certain conditions, those conditions being either that a boy should be able to read and write, or that while so employed he should attend school two days every week. The third clause was merely a penalty clause. In offering opposition to those clauses he felt he should render himself liable to a charge of antagonism to the moral welfare of the working classes. He, however, considered that a compulsory enactment of that kind would materially affect these efforts of those who were strenuously labouring for the promotion of education in the working classes, and would, on the other hand, tend to disgust the working classes with that education which it was their duty and desire to promote and encourage. It was unfair to apply such a restrictive system as that contemplated by the Bill to any one particular employment. It was unfair to the employer, and it was equally unfair to the employed. On the one hand, it tended to increase the rate of wages on the employers in the special business affected; while, on the other hand, it lessened wages in other employments to which the restrictive system was not applied; because large numbers of children, on being discharged from the mines would flock to those other employments where their labour could be availed of, and would flood the market to which they were compelled to resort. With what reason could they say to the owner of a colliery, "You shall not employ children under twelve years of age," while the owner of the factory next door could employ as many as he pleased, even although it was in the unwholesome manufacture of chemicals. The Committee should remember, too, that they were legislating for the poor, and although much was said of the cupidity of parents in the working classes, they should recollect that the sum which would be earned by a child of ten years old in these districts often made the difference between comfort and discomfort in a poor man's household. He would illustrate the case by the calamity which had befallen the fifty or sixty women who by one fell stroke had been deprived of their partners in life by the recent disastrous colliery explosion. Would it be fair or humane to tell those bereaved widows that the law would not permit their children being employed in mines or factories, because they had not received a certain education up to twelve or thirteen years of age. In a report of Mr. Redgrave it appeared that, out of 499 children certified, only 123 had received their education under the factory system, while all the rest had been educated independently of it. That proved that the working classes were beginning to send their children to school voluntarily, and that the desultory education which these children obtained under the provisions of the various Acts regulating their labour was very unsatisfactory. The result of the evidence was not such as to justify the application of this partial system to other branches of trade. Ever since he had had the honour of a seat in that House he had been the advocate of a system of voluntary education as one conformable with the institutions of the country. They were told that the working classes of this country were averse to education. He believed that to be a very great mistake, except to a very partial extent. It was quite natural that a working man should like to have his child earning money; but the best means of inducing the working classes to send their children to schools would be to have good schools—schools where practical and useful systems prevailed; and as under any mode of supervision the maintenance of such systems must greatly depend upon local co-operation, he did not think they were likely to improve the condition of the schools by enactments which would tend to relieve the owners of property from a sense of moral obligation resting on themselves. His objection to the compulsory system was that it would tend to check the voluntary efforts of owners and others who at present exerted themselves very much to forward the cause of education. He had received representations from persons who feared that the effect of such a scheme would make persons give up their customs of subscribing for the maintenance of local schools. They should remember too that they had invited a neighbouring Power to compete with them in certain manufactures, and had even agreed to furnish them for years to come with the raw material. If they desired, therefore, to compete successfully with France they must not hamper themselves with unnecessary restrictions. If they wanted an illustration of the effects of their legislation they had it in the Emigrant Acts, which had deprived the British shipping interest of a source of profit, and had handed over thousands of the persons who emigrated from this country to the tender mercies of the owners and captains of foreign ships. Of all questions in which to interfere the internal economy and regulation of mines was the most difficult and dangerous. Let them not, by carrying their interference too far, relieve the managers and owners from a sense of the responsibility which they ought to have. If the Committee attempted what they were unable to perform he very much feared they would but produce greater evils than those they endeavoured to remove.

Mr. Liddell

MR. ADDERLEY said, he thought that, instead of rejecting the clauses, it would be better to postpone them, in order that they might be re-considered. He agreed with the hon. Member who last spoke that partial legislation of this kind was mischievous and unjust; but, instead of that being an argument for refusing to legislate further, he looked upon it as argument for covering the whole field of labour with legislation of this kind. The statute book was in a very anomalous state in regard to this subject. They had the Coal Mines Act of 1842 expiring in the present year, the Factory Act of 1844, the Print Works Act, an Act dealing partially with the silk trade, and this year the Legislature proposed to deal with three other branches—namely, the bleaching trade, the lace-making trade, and the mining trade. He thought such legislation, step by step, unjust and mischievous. It gave a monopoly of labour of a certain class to the unrestricted as against the restricted trades. He had heard from employers in Birmingham that those children who had received education very soon made up, by their superior intelligence, for the time during which they had been withdrawn from work. The system ought to be made general. If they did not do so they perpetrated an injustice to those trades who were brought under its operation; and held out a direct inducement to those who did not now come within its provision, to refrain from making voluntary attempts to educate the children in their neighbourhood, lest their so doing might destroy their monopoly in their labour. Gentlemen connected with the coal and iron districts had gone so far as to say that if the operation of the Bill were rendered general, they would no longer have any opposition to offer; but the so-called "voluntary educationists" of the House viewed it with disfavour, as infringing the principle for which they contended. This, however, was a mistake, as employers need only be subjected to an alternative—not to employ children under twelve years old who could neither read nor write, unless they gave a guarantee that they should have the opportunity of learning to do so. It must be remembered that £1,000,000 was voted by the House annually towards national education. Did not that give them a right to see that at least, a minimum was done in the way of national education, and that there should be some elementary result from so large an expenditure? He, for one, should not support the annual Vote if it did not at least produce the small result of ensuring that every child of twelve years of age should be able to read and write. That was very little to ask in return for a subsidy of £1,000,000 a year. There was no manner of interference by the provisions of a Bill to effect the object which he sought. It did not stipulate for any particular system or any particular machinery. It merely asked for a result. It proposed to do away with all that was inquisitorial in the Factory Acts, and in that way it was an important improvement in our legislation on these subjects. As soon as they attached to the employment of children everywhere some necessary attention to their elementary instruction, all the evil effects of unequal pressure of restriction would be at once removed. They did not want to say to the employers that they should not employ the children, but they said they should employ them in a manner that was concurrent with what Parliament had decided to be the national system and requirements of education. It was said that they would be throwing on the employer the obligation of the parent, but it was not so. The House stood in the place of the parent of the child, where parental care was wholly absent or negligent, or was in partnership with the parent in the education of the child, where the parent took his share by largely subsidizing it, and therefore possessed, at least to some extent, the parental right to insist upon this arrangement on the part of the child. Words had been suggested by his hon. Friend (Sir Stafford Northcote) which would ensure that the employer should not be brought under the penalties of the law till he had absolutely refused to allow a wholly uneducated child any time for his use of existing means of education and put himself into actual and gratuitous hostility with the child's interests. The law would fail to apply until the employer had been applied to and, having the means at hand, had refused to conform to the provisions of the Act. He was happy to say that he was borne out in his views in this matter by Her Majesty's inspectors of schools, who had presented a memorial to Her Majesty's Government on the subject. He thought the question was, whether they should go back and repeal the educational clauses of the Factory Act, or advance and cover with similar provisions equally the whole field of employment. He thought, therefore, that they should postpone the clauses before the House, and see whether they could not carry the principle in a general form, in a Bill by itself for the purpose, such as he had himself already introduced in readiness, should the House see fit to adopt it in substitution for these Clauses.

MR. BUXTON said, if the principle which it was sought to apply by this measure were a good one, it ought to be extended universally, and not confined to persons engaged in particular manufactures. But the argument of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Adderley) was, that the system having failed, it ought to be extended. That seemed to be his conclusion; but he (Mr. Buxton) thought the logical conclusion from the premisses upon which he had argued was, that the system should be abandoned altogether. The school inspectors had declared in the strongest manner that the effect of the present system, instead of improving the education of children, had been to stop up the channel of employment to which the efforts of the Legislature had been applied, and to widen other channels, in which consequently the supply of labour had increased. He believed that the attempt of the House to promote education by Legislative interference between employers and employed was a mistake, and that, instead of following up their steps, they ought rather to retrace them. Not content with leaving the growth of education to the increasing intelligence of parents, and to the demand for educated in lieu of ignorant persons, Parliament sought to promote the advance of knowledge by imposing criminal penalties on employers; they did not apply punishment to the parents, who were responsible in the eyes of God and man for bringing up their children properly, but to persons who were only artificially connected with them by purchasing their labour in the market. But if the Bill passed and was followed by that measure which had been sketched out by the right hon. Gentleman, what machinery existed for carrying out the provisions? Mr. Norris, in his pamphlet, admitted that it was impossible to maintain an army of inspectors throughout the country, and that, to a great extent, dependence must be placed on the voluntary obedience of employers to the law. The result, of course, was, that the law would only be binding on the scrupulous and high-minded, and would be infringed by all who were not distinguished by those qualities. Instead of being generally respected and obeyed, the law would only be enforced in cases where some informer entertained a spite against a particular employer.

MR. FRANK CROSSLEY said, that, although an advocate of voluntary education, he could not shut his eyes to the benefits which had resulted under the Factory Act from compulsory instruction, which was not, however, afforded at the Government expense, and therefore did not interfere with the voluntary principle so far as the cost was concerned. But the owners of coal districts in the West Riding of Yorkshire complained that the Bill, if passed in its present shape, would amount to confiscation of their property, as the boys they required for the purpose of going down into coal-pits were hardy, dreadnought boys, of a different class from those who had been trained in schools. He was in favour of the word "thirteen" being substituted for the word "twelve." In the factories, children worked in relays in the morning and afternoon, but there was a difficulty about doing that in coal-pits, which might be avoided by the proposition of the hon. Member for Nottingham, and certain times might be set apart for the education of the children. It was for the coal-owners to say whether they would employ three boys where they now employed two. If so, two boys could always be in the pit, and one at school; each boy could be employed four days in the week and be two days in the week at school. If they did not go into the coal-pit when they were boys, they would never go there at all, because when a man got another trade he would not give up his employment to go down into a coal-pit.

Mr. Buxton

MR. CLIVE said, he feared the Committee was wandering somewhat from the point under discussion; and as a large number of gentlemen connected with coal mines were then present in London, and were most anxious that the subject should be decided that day, it would give rise to much dissatisfaction if six o'clock arrived without their having attained any practical decision. An enactment was already in force which provided that no child under ten years of age should be employed in mines. The Motion of the hon. Member for Nottingham proposed to extend that age to thirteen years; and if so, he saw no reason why any objection should be raised against the clauses which required that they should be capable of reading and writing at that age. The mortality among children between the ages of ten and fifteen years employed in mines was very great, the proportion being 22 per cent as against the general mortality of 11½ per cent. From the extent of that mortality, therefore, as well as from the number of accidents which were constantly occurring, it was highly desirable that some alteration in the state of the law should take place. The object of the measure was to induce persons in the districts where education was least advanced to follow the example which had been well set in Scotland and in the north of England. In his Report, Mr. Rodgrave said that the proposition that children should produce a certificate of being able to read and write was a marked improvement; and Sir John Kincaid concurred in that view. The system which he proposed in the Bill had been actually at work in Scotland, and he held in his hand the report of a Mr. Alexander, a mine inspector, in which he stated that in Scotland boys were not allowed to work underground until able to read and write; in one place that had been the case for more than twenty years, and the arrangements up to the present time had worked most satisfactorily. He trusted that the Committee would not withhold its assent from the clauses proposed by the Government.

MR. TAYLOR said, that as an employer of some thousands of miners, he objected to the clause requiring so large a number of hours to be consumed in education. It would involve great loss both to the masters and the children. At present a sufficient number of boys could hardly be obtained. Though the labour of boys in coal mines was not severe, he felt bound to state that he thought ten years was too young an age to take a boy down into a mine. A boy of eleven might be permitted to work; but he objected to the compulsory provision proposed with regard to education.

MR. MITFORD said, he should support the clause under discussion, as a step in the right direction. Its principle had been affirmed by former legislation. State interference with the parental control of children was often objected to. Still, it had been recognized as a principle of legislation that the State might step in and compel a parent to do his duty towards his child or cause it to be done in its own way if the parent would not discharge it himself. The practice of vaccination had been enforced as a remedy against small pox, and if parents were required to attend to the bodily wants of their children, he saw no reason whatever why education should not, if necessary, be enforced as a remedy against the more frightful evil of ignorance and immorality. According to reports on education England was much behind the continental nations in this respect. In France, Austria, and Prussia it was difficult to find a child of twelve who could not read or write. In our prisons and reformatories 30 or 40 per cent of the inmates could neither read nor write, fifty or sixty could do so only imperfectly. To show that the working classes appreciated the advantage of schools, he referred to a petition presented by the workmen in Mr. Akroyd's factory, in which they expressed their hope that others would be enabled to enjoy the same advantages they had derived from the schools established by that gentleman. Many might say that by this education they would give children nothing but the power of reading and writing; that it only enabled a child to educate itself. But even knowing how to read and write gave a child a better chance in the world than that of the child who had not such knowledge.

MR. SLANEY said, he approved the Bill of the Government; if they asked too much, they would get nothing. The measure was a practical one, and the balance of testimony from the mine inspectors was in favour of it. It was not a Bill of compulsion on the children so much as protection to them. No class of children in the kingdom were in a more wretched condition than those who worked in mines. The restrictions of the Factory Acts had proved very beneficial, and he believed at some future period the House would extend the principle of these clauses, and give them a general application.

MR. AYRTON said, it was extremely important that the Committee should understand the actual question before it. The question was, whether the children under thirteen were to be given up to the uncontrolled discretion of their parents and employers, and whether before that age they were to be subject to a certain protection, so as to prevent what was considered to be a gross abuse of their infantile and unprotected condition. The nature of that protection was the subject of the next clause. At present the question was as to the age to which it should be continued. For his own part he advocated the higher age of thirteen. Inspectors of mines having directed their investigation to the subject had some of them recommended the still more advanced age of fourteen, and even fifteen. The question was one of religion, morality, and duty, against mere money. It would cost the mine-owners more to deal more tenderly with the children in their employment; but the children ought to be protected, on the principle the Legislature had already adopted in the Factory Act. The Court of Chancery protected children in the higher ranks even against parental control; in the case of the poor the House of Commons ought to perform the like office of guardian.

MR. HENLEY said, he would address himself strictly to the clause in question, which was whether the words twelve or thirteen should be inserted in the Bill. What was the principle of the Factory Act? He understood the principle to be that it was inconsistent with the health of children under thirteen to make them parts of a system of labour carried on by machinery; it was, therefore, provided that they should be employed only a certain number of hours a week, and that in the other part of the week they should attend school. But the limitation of the present Bill was advocated on the dangers of the employment, and the greater mortality of the children engaged in it. That mortality, however, was reckoned on the ages between ten and fifteen—not from ten to twelve. But where was the consistency of taking half the limit? Why was not the Committee told what was the percentage of mortality between ten and eleven, eleven and twelve, and so on year by year up to fifteen? Then the House would have had some useful information as a guide in determining this somewhat difficult question. It had been argued that it was the duty of parents to clothe, feed, and vaccinate their children; he wondered it had not been contended that the law compelled them to begot children as well. Now, when his hon. Friend below him (Mr. Mitford) entreated the Committee to put a stop to the moral contagion which filled our gaols and reformatories, he was surprised to hear of the remedy proposed. What did the Factory Act provide? Why, that the children should go to schools where the religious element in the education was most likely to put an end to the immorality that was said to prevail. But what did the present Bill? It sanctioned the application of the secular element as a remedy against moral contagion. Was that a step in the right direction? He had some doubt about it. With regard to the question as to whether the age should be twelve or thirteen, he preferred twelve. If, however, the age was to be advanced from ten to twelve, because the work in mines was unhealthy or the children exposed to danger, he could not, for the life and soul of him, understand why that condition should be relaxed if the children could read and write. He could understand the Government when they said that because working in mines was dangerous and unhealthy, therefore children should not be allowed to work in them under twelve years of age. But why a child might be exposed to that danger and to that unhealthiness merely because he was able to read and write, that he could not understand. That went beyond his comprehension. Again, he could not exactly see why a parent might not take his child to a mine as well as let him drive a plough at an early age. However, he did not pretend to be able to decide whether the age of restriction should be twelve or thirteen. Probably the Government were able to determine that point; and he should, therefore, vote for the proposition of the Government—the age of twelve.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he thought the Committee was in that position in which Committees were frequently found; it had three courses before it—two extremes and a mean. It would be most convenient to dispose of the two extremes before coming to the medium course, which he thought would be the best to adopt. One extreme was that of the hon. Member for Northumberland (Mr. Liddell) who objected not only to the provisions of this Bill, but to those of the existing law. He contended that there ought not to be any distinction between coal-mining and any other kind of industry; that there ought to be no restriction on the employment of children in coal mines. It was sufficient to say that that argument would compel the repeal of the Factory Act, the benefits of which had been tested by experience. The opposite extreme is that proposed by the right hon. Member for Staffordshire (Mr. Adderley); he goes with the Bill to the extent of these clauses, but thinks they do not go far enough, and would include them in some more general enactment. No one doubts the right hon. Member's sincerity. Formerly, when any extensive change in an existing institution was proposed, one mode of defending it was to say that the institution, if not quite perfect, was singularly good, and that all change was to be deprecated. But now, when a moderate change was proposed, it was a common mode of opposition to say that the proposal was a half-measure, that it would satisfy nobody, and that it would be better to wait for a more comprehensive measure, by which more extensive objects would be realized. That was a mode of argument often adopted, and not always in the good faith of his right hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire. He (Sir George Lewis) believed, if the Government withdrew these clauses, all change would be indefinitely postponed, the clauses would be lost, the right hon. Gentleman's own Bill would not be passed, and nothing would be done. The third course was a limited alteration in the present state of things. He thought the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) had not been quite fair on the relation this Bill bore to the Factory Acts. The extent to which the proposal of the Government went was merely to add two years to the period during which the unconditional employment of children in mines might be prevented, and if the Committee were to sanction that proposal, which he hoped they would, they would not thereby be precluded from advancing the age hereafter from 12 to either 13 or 14 years, if experience should prove such a course to be advisable. Considering, however, the large interests and vast capital involved, he would advise the Committee to begin with the more limited proposal.

Mr. Henley

MR. CAYLEY said, it was easier to give advice than to act on it, for both the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary and the hon. Under Secretary, while they deprecated discussion on the general question, had themselves gone into it fully. He should oppose the Amendment.

COLONEL LINDSAY said, he could bear testimony, from personal knowledge, to the healthy condition of the children employed in the mines.

MR. PAGET said, he was compelled to decline to withdraw his Amendment.

Question put, "That the word 'twelve' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided: — Ayes 178, Noes 71: Majority 107.

MR. KINNAIRD then moved the following Amendment:

"After the 31st day of December, 1860, it shall not be lawful for any person whatever to employ, keep, or allow to remain in any colliery or ironstone mine, any boy above the age of ten years, and under the age of fourteen, for a longer time than eight hours in any one day."

In doing this, he would take occasion to say that the greatest improvement in the health of the children employed in the factories had, according to the report of the medical inspectors, been effected, since the hours of labour were shortened in those establishments. It must also be borne in mind that a boy, up to the age of fourteen, must be looked upon in the light of a child, who had, inasmuch as he was not a free agent, a claim to be protected by the State against a system, which must be injurious to his bodily as well as his mental powers. The argument, that to use legislative influence for the promotion of this object, was unduly to interfere with the rights of labour, had, he contended, long ago been triumphantly disposed of; and it was the province of the Government of the country, he maintained, to provide, as far as possible, that its citizens should not at a tender age be rendered feeble for life by excessive exertion, and thereby to lessen the risk of their becoming eventually dependent upon the public funds for support. The competition for employment in England was so fierce, that, unless the law stepped in to protect the weak against the strong, the former must be, in a great measure, sacrificed. Entertaining these views, he had much satisfaction in submitting his Amendment for the adoption of the Committee.

MR. CLIVE said, he felt compelled to oppose the Motion. According to the reports of the Inspectors of Mines, the health of the children employed in them contrasted not unfavourably with that of those who worked above ground. The chief cause of the higher mortality arose from their liability to accidents through carelessness.

MR. PEASE said, he also must oppose the Motion; though he wished to express his full appreciation of the object which it was sought by its means to effect.

MR. AYRTON suggested that it was irregular to propose the Amendment at the present stage of the proceedings.

MR. PAGET said, he proposed to provide for the object of the hon. Gentleman, but at a different stage and in another manner.

MR. KINNAIRD thereupon withdrew it until the proper moment for bringing it forward should have arrived.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he wished to move the omission of the proviso at the end of the clause, the operation of which Amendment would be to preclude the employment of children under twelve years of age in mines. He thought that would get rid of a great many vexatious provisions in the Bill, while, with regard to the dangers of the employment, he could not help thinking that a child of twelve years of age, who could neither read nor write, was better able to take care of his life and limbs, than a child of ten, who could do both. Besides, the ability of the child to read and write was to be certified by a competent schoolmaster, but who was to be the judge of such competency. The whole conditions were vexatious; and it would be far better to provide that no boy, under any circumstances, should be employed under twelve years of age.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the policy of the clause was obvious. It was not so prohibitory as an absolute prohibition; but its object was to assimilate the Bill to the Factory Act. He thought the fact that there were Inspectors of Mines was a sufficient answer to the difficulties suggested by the noble Lord of carrying out the conditions the clause imposed.

MR. CAYLEY said, he had no doubt the noble Lord had proposed his Amendment out of regard to the interests of the working men; but he could state that there was a deputation from the working miners in the very neighbourhood of the House. He had been at the pains to consult them, and they entirely repudiated the Amendment of the noble Lord as an undue interference with the rights of labour.

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, it had been assumed all through the debate that the mining children were worse than others, and required the special protection of the Legislature. He denied that such was the case. As a proof he might refer to an interesting report of Mr. Fletcher, who had been specially appointed to investigate the amount of the criminal population in different employments, and in the Metropolitan districts. It appeared that the number of committals per 1,000 amounted in the Metropolitan districts to 22½, in the iron districts 1 to 18, in the agricultural districts to 14, in the cotton districts to 12, in the silk districts to 8, and the number in the exclusively mining districts in Durham, Northumberland, and Cornwall amounted to only 6 in every 1000. He was himself familiar with this population, both while at their work in the mines and while in their schools, and he was never struck either by their unhealthiness or by their ignorance. He was certainly opposed to the employment of children under ten years of age, but he hoped the House would not go further. The hon. Member for the West Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. F. Crossley) spoke of the children employed in mines as fitted by their peculiar smallness to do the work required of them. He (Mr. Bruce) never yet saw a child employed in a mine in an oppressive or unhealthy way. They were generally employed in opening and shutting doors; a certain number were employed in conducting horses, and large numbers went down into the pit with their fathers, and assisted them in loading the coal. He thought they were more likely to obtain the results which they all wished for—namely, an improved education for children—by constantly holding up to the parents the standard of education required from them, than by endeavouring to force them by any compulsory mode of education. The Factory Act having been appealed to, he must be permitted to say that great injury would be inflicted on those children and their parents if any similar legislation was enforced. The effect of such legislation was only to discourage the employment of children. He was opposed to the Bill because it was partial in its application, and because it would operate most unjustly on one portion of her Majesty's subjects.

MR. KENDALL said, he objected to the Bill, as he thought they were not justified in interfering with the right of parents to send their boys to work. He had been twenty years Chairman of a Poor Law Union, and had often been obliged to refuse relief to able-bodied miners with large families; but he could not see the justice of refusing relief in such cases if the Legislature interfered, and thus virtually said to them, "We refuse to relieve you, but we claim the right of interfering with your ways and means of keeping house and supporting your family."

Mr. Cayley

COLONEL LINDSAY said, he would at all times support the cause of education, morality, and religion; but why should the Bill not be applied generally to the whole population? Why restrict its application to one trade only? Miners did not wish to be an exception to the general rule, but he did not see why the education clause should be applied to them exclusively. The complaint in Lancashire was that they had not men, women, boys, or girls enough for the employment of the county. In the district in which he resided, the colliers would suffer very considerably if their hours of labour were reduced by this Bill, and therefore he should vote for the Amendment.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he represented a large mining district, and the iron and coal miners had delegated some of their number to attend in London to watch their interests under this Bill in Parliament. He had the best means of knowing that the miners approved the Bill as it stood, and he therefore hoped that the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. SPOONER said, he hoped his right hon. Friend the Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Adderley) would bring in his Bill making the educational restriction on the age of children for employment general. He would support that proposal, but he must oppose this partial measure as unjust and injurious to the mining population, who were better instructed, better conducted, and more moral than those who were employed either in the silk or cotton trade.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On the Question that the Clause stand part of the Bill.

MR. LIDDELL said, he should oppose the adoption of the clause. The effect of it would be to throw out of employment many thousands of children who were getting fair wages and assisting their fa-miles, while it would also, without notice, deprive mine owners of the valuable labour of these young persons. The restriction sought to be imposed by the clause was most vexatious and unjust.

Lord ADOLPHUS VANE TEMPEST observed that it would be well for the Committee to consider whether in adopting a system of compulsory legislation for one particular class, they were not likely to injure the cause of education by stopping voluntary effort.

Mr. FRANK CROSSLEY inquired whether the Secretary of State for the Home Department intended to maintain the first two portions of the clause.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he thought them fair and wholesome provisions. As at present advised he considered it desirable to retain them.

Mr. RIDLEY observed that a petition had been presented from 14,000 mining operatives and others whose sons were employed in mines, and they strongly objected to the restrictions imposed by this clause, as likely to interfere with the voluntary exertions of mining proprietors to educate the children in their employ.

Mr. VIVIAN said, he dissented from any measure which had for its object the compulsory education of any class of persons. He thought the labour of the mining districts would be much decreased if the clause should be agreed to.

Major HAMILTON said, he considered the Committee ought to be guided by the opinion of the miners themselves. The miners in his district were satisfied with the Bill. He denied that it was a compulsory education clause as described by hon. Members.

Question put, "That Clause 1 stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 180; Noes 91: Majority 89.

Clause 2 (Exception for Boys between Ten and Twelve who have Certificates as to Education and School Attendance).

Mr. KINNAIRD said, he would then move the insertion of words limiting the time during which boys between ten and twelve years of age might be employed in collieries to a maximum of eight hours per diem. That was quite as long as it was reasonable to confine children of tender years in mines; and the regulation he proposed could easily be carried out by a system of relays without prejudice to the employers.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line

10, after the word "Colliery" to insert the words "for any period not exceeding eight hours a day."

Mr. AYRTON said, he should be glad to hear how long the coal-owners desired to keep young children continuously at work under ground. Was the limit that would satisfy them eight, ten, or twelve hours a day, or was it nearer to sixteen? How would any hon. Member of that House like his child to be employed even eight hours out of the twenty-four in the depths of a mine? There would be no difficulty in working mines under the proposed restrictions of children's labour, if the proprietors would only get rid of the present vicious system, by which the miners spent what was called their "drunken Monday" in idleness and immorality, and then had to make up for it by excessive labour on other days. The work, instead of being thus intermittently and irregularly pursued, should be more equally distributed over the whole week. In certain parts of Yorkshire an improvement had been insisted upon by the men themselves in this respect, and the greatest advantage had resulted from the change. The statistics adduced by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil (Mr. H. A. Bruce) as to the condition of the mining districts were most fallacious, because the whole idle and criminal class in the Metropolis had been compared with the persons engaged in a particular branch of industry; but, even if the moral condition of London was very bad, that was no reason why these young children should not be protected against the cupidity, not only of their employers, but even of their own unnatural parents, who often compelled them, for the sake of obtaining their wages, to work far longer than reason or humanity would justify. He trusted they would soon get rid of those miserable doctrines of political economy which led hon. Gentlemen to complain of the interference with the infant labour market, as if these young children were mere animals, to be turned to account like the "negro commodity" in America. The coal-owners, who made enormous fortunes out of the industry of their work-people, ought not to grudge the small pecuniary sacrifice required to enable these children to be brought up in a manner conformable with health, decency, and morality.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he hoped that the opinions he had expressed in regard to the protection of these children had indicated pretty clearly what were the inclinations of the Government. This was, however, essentially a question of degree, and he regretted that he could not accede to the Amendment of his hon. Friend, which crossed the line that could be drawn with safety in this matter. The propriety of extending the limitation of the hours of children's labour contained in the Factory Act to mines had been referred to the mining inspectors, twelve in number; and these officers were unanimously of opinion that it would not be prudent to make that alteration. One of the inspectors stated that the time employed in changing the hands was great, and the risk of injury would be much increased by such a regulation, not to mention the distances which had to be travelled under ground. The difference between the circumstances attending labour in mines and that carried on in factories rendered it difficult, if not impracticable, to apply the same system to both. He trusted, therefore, that the Committee would adhere to the clause as it stood.

MR. H. A. BRUCE denied that his statistics of the condition of the mining population were vitiated by the fallacy imputed to them by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets. That hon. Gentleman had asked how long it was desired that these children should work. That point ought to be left to be decided by the humanity of the masters and the feelings of the workmen themselves. No doubt everybody would wish to see the hours of labour reduced if it could be done, to eight per day; but that was wholly impracticable. It would be injurious to the workpeople themselves and would throw a great number of children loose upon the streets.

MR. FARRER maintained, in spite of the reflections of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton), that the mining proprietors of the northern counties were as much distinguished by liberality and consideration for those in their service as any other class of English gentlemen.

COLONEL LINDSAY said, it was very desirable that the work in coal mines should be more regular; but it was not in the power of the proprietors, unless they were possessed of enormous capital, which was the case with very few, to make it so. Indeed, the men themselves sometimes assumed the position of masters, and would not allow the hours of work to be made regular.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he thought it was incumbent on the Government to say that some limitation should be made of the hours of labour to which these poor children were subjected, because at present, working, as they did, from six in the morning until seven in the evening, positively deprived them of seeing the light of day for eight months in the year. He might add that the parents of the boys had assented to this Amendment.
Sir George Lewis

MR. FRANK CROSSLEY said, if it were possible to work by a system of relays he should support the proposition to limit the labour of the children to eight hours; but that was not possible. He thought, if it could be accomplished, the best plan would be for the children to work in the mines four days and go to school two days. He was willing to attribute the best intentions to the hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Kinnaid), in introducing his Amendment, but he was of opinion that the Bill would work best by allowing mine-owners and miners to arrange among themselves with regard to the hours of labour.

MR. WEMYSS said, there were many practical difficulties surrounding the subject. As an owner of mines he could state that it was impossible to make the men work six days a week; and the consequence was that, at the latter part of the week, they were obliged to have recourse to excessive work to make up their losses. He thought the Bill as it stood would prove advantageous to the men and boys. There was nothing arduous or unhealthy in the boys' occupations. He should oppose the Amendment as impracticable.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, the simple question was, did the Amendment fix the right number of hours during which children should work. He thought it did, and therefore he should support it. All the Committee had to do was to fix the number of hours, leaving it to the men and the employers to carry it out by arrangement between themselves, and he understood that this had been done in Yorkshire.

MR. KINNAIRD, in reply, said that the argument that mine work was a very healthy occupation was strangely belied by the Register General's reports, which showed that the mortality among the class of children who were engaged in it was 22 per cent, being double the rate of the mortality among other classes of children. That could only be attributed to the number of hours during which they were engaged, and the only remedy he could think of was to limit the hours of labour. He might add that one of the inspectors of mines had recommended that boys under fourteen years of age should not be employed in mines for more than eight hours a day.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 77; Noes 146: Majority 69.

House resumed; Committee report Progress; to sit again on Friday, 22nd June, at Twelve o'clock.

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, June 14, 1860.

MINUTES.] Sat First in Parliament—The Earl of Strafford (Baron Strafford) after the Death of his Father.

PUBLIC BILLS.—1st Councillors of Burghs and Burgesses (Scotland).

2nd Fisheries (Scotland).

Royal Assent.—Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences; Sir John Barnard's Act, &c., Repeal; Malicious Injuries to Property Act Amendment.

DISTURBANCES IN NEW ZEALAND.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON, referring to the accounts which had recently appeared in the newspapers with respect to the disturbances in the northern island of New Zealand, asked the noble Duke the Secretary for the Colonies, Whether any despatches had been received by the Government on the subject.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE regretted to say that it was not in his power to assert the incorrectness of the accounts which had appeared in the newspapers relative to the insurrection in New Zealand. The noble Earl was probably aware that the mail, via Southampton, had not yet arrived. He had, however, received a despatch from the Governor of New Zealand, via Marseilles, which, so far as it went, corroborated the accounts contained in the newspapers of yesterday and the preceding day. The extent of the insurrection appeared to be somewhat doubtful, but on the arrival of the mail at Southampton, no doubt further despatches would be received by the Colonial Office. No doubt despatches would be received by the Horse Guards by that opportunity, none having been received by that Department through Marseilles. Until those despatches arrived it was impossible to say what measures the Government would find it expedient to take; he would, however, immediately put himself in communication with the Commander-in-Chief and with the Secretary of State for War on the subject. He was glad to state that everything that was possible in the nature of local effort had been made. Three vessels of war had been despatched to New Zealand from our Australian Colonies. He had reason to believe from a private letter that the Pelorus had proceeded from Melbourne with 600 men on board, and that another of Her Majesty's ships had left Sydney for New Zealand with a similar reinforcement. He could not suffer the opportunity to pass without expressing the admiration he felt at the conduct of the Volunteers in these Colonies. This newly-formed force, which was extending as widely in our Colonies as in this country, had offered to embark for New Zealand, and leave their homes and families, if called upon, to put down the insurrection. In all our Colonies, in North America, Australia, and elsewhere, a desire for self-defence, and to act as Englishmen were now doing, was manifested. Standing there as Secretary of State for the Colonies he was bound to bear testimony to the zeal and alacrity with which the Volunteers had come forward in this distant part of the globe, and their readiness to leave their homes and their ordinary occupations upon a great public emergency in order to re-establish peace and security.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he should be glad to know the date of the last despatch received by the noble Duke.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, his last despatch from the Governor General of New Zealand was dated March 31. The private letter apprizing him of the reinforcements from Melbourne and Sydney was dated April 18.

REDUCTION OF THE WINE DUTIES.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.—QUESTIONS.

LORD MONTEAGLE moved for

"Account showing the Amount of Drawback paid, or which will be payable, on Foreign Wines by reason of the Reduction of the Duty on Wines by the Commercial Treaty, distinguishing French, Spanish, Portuguese, and other Foreign Wines."

The noble Lord said, he believed there would be no objection to the Return, but he took the opportunity of asking two

P

Questions, of which he had also given notice. It was generally known that the wine trade between this country and Spain and Portugal, was very much larger than that with France; and probably it would in future be still larger relatively if the consumption of foreign wine were generally increased by the reduction of duty, for the wines of the Peninsula were stronger and more familiar to the palates of Englishmen, than the light wines of France. In 1857 the importation of Spanish and Portuguese wines was 5,080,000 gallons; while of French wine it was only 622,000 gallons. Yet, so far as the House was informed, the reduction of duty on this enormous quantity of Peninsular wine was made by England without obtaining, or even seeking any equivalent concession. He wished to know whether any negotiations were pending or were proposed with a view to induce the Spanish and Portuguese Governments to make corresponding reductions in their tariffs against us, to compensate for the great advantages which their wine-growers would derive from the recent changes in the wine duties. In 1856 the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, in a debate upon a Motion for a reduction of the wine duties, said:—

“That he would state, with argumentative reasons, his grounds for opposing the Motion. We should, to a considerable extent, rely for revenue upon import duties, as well as on taxes on internal consumption . . . In 1810, when the duty was 13s. 8d. on French, and 9s. 8d. on Portugal, wines, was the year of greatest revenue—the duty produced £2,786,000. Notwithstanding the reduction to an uniform duty of 5s. 9d., the consumption of 1854 was only 6,775,000 gallons, and the revenue only £1,914,000. Thus, notwithstanding the great increase of population and reduction of duty, the consumption and revenue have diminished since the early years of the century . . . I believe it is in vain to expect that any considerable quantity of the weaker wines of the Continent will be consumed in this country . . . Inquiries have been instituted to ascertain whether there were any means of imposing an ad valorem duty on wine. None has been as yet contrived. The only means by which the inferior wines of the Continent could be admitted would be to lower the duty on wines, so as to make them a substitute for spirits and beer, and subject these latter to an unfair competition.”

The question of revenue was important; since the introduction of the Budget, from changes in the duties made or acquiesced in by the Government we had lost £171,000 by the wine duties, and £110,000 by the changes in the warehousing system, it became necessary to consider whether, if we sustained such losses in dealing only with revenue of no more than hundreds of thousands, whether we might not sustain still greater losses when we dealt with articles which brought in £15,000,000 or £16,000,000 annually to the revenue. He alluded to the duties on malt, hops, and British spirits, which could not fail to be affected if a large increase in the consumption of foreign wines took place. He, therefore, wished to know whether any information had been obtained or calculation made of the losses which might be sustained upon British spirits, malt, and hops, in consequence of the reduction of the duties on foreign wines. Upon that point he would quote some observations of the present Home Secretary, who had expressed a fear that a lowering of wine duties would tend to diminish the revenue from other articles of consumption. Sir George Lewis, in 1856, said:—

“It would, undoubtedly, be advantageous if, consistently with the demands of the revenue, it were in our power to reduce the duties on wine. But, looking to the great amount of our revenue, which is derived from beer and spirits, and remembering that if the duty on wine, which is already a moderate duty, were still further reduced, it would interfere with the consumption of other fermented liquors, I think the revenue would suffer more than the demands of the public service will permit.”

These inquiries were important at the present moment, for the present state of things could only be taken as provisional, because important circumstances had occurred since the plans of the Government had first been explained in February last, and to increase greatly the probable amount of our expenditure. He need only draw their Lordships' attention to the question of national defences, for which an enormous sum was stated to be required under circumstances of deep exigency; and he could not help remarking that though the Report of the Commission was signed in February last, it was not communicated to Parliament though urgently pressed for, until nearly the middle of June. That paper of itself, if there were nothing else, would be quite sufficient to show that every effort, by a careful maintenance of the revenue, as well as by the most effectual economy, ought to be made to meet the augmenting necessities of the country. His questions were, Whether any Negotiations are pending or proposed in respect to Alteration of Duty consequent upon the Reduction of the Import of Duties on Spanish and Portuguese Wines: and Whether any Information has been obtained, or Calculation has been made, showing the Losses which may be sustained on British Spirits, Malt or Hops, by reason of the Reduction of Duties on Foreign Wines?

Lord Montagu

EARL GRANVILLE said, there would be no objection to the production of the Returns moved for, but expressed a hope that the noble Lord would postpone the Motion for the present. With regard to the question whether negotiations were pending, or proposed, in respect to alterations of duty consequent upon the reduction of import duties on Spanish and Portuguese wines, he would observe that when the French Treaty was first discussed in that House, the Government were reproached with taking a retrograde step, and were charged with resorting to the system of reciprocity treaties. The Government gave reasons why they considered the case an exceptional one, believing that, by means of the Treaty, France would be enabled to reduce her duties, and that benefit would be conferred on this country. The Government, however, never intended, certainly, to take such a backward step as to postpone their intended alterations until they obtained the assent of every country to a reduction of duties. With regard to Portugal, communications had taken place with a view of inducing her to reduce her tariff; but though those communications had not yet been successful, one important point had been gained. There existed certain fiscal restrictions in respect to the wines of that country, the abolition of which would be of the greatest importance to the trade, and the Portuguese Government had agreed to effect that abolition, and had brought in a Bill for that purpose. With regard to Spain, the Government had not entered yet into official communications on the subject, but he believed that that country was not actuated by any inimical feeling. With respect to the last Question, it was impossible to give a categorical answer. The amount of loss likely to be sustained must be matter of opinion, and all he could say was that it was not believed that the reduction of the wine duties would interfere with the produce of the duties on malt, hops, and British spirits. If, however, wine should be substituted in any degree for malt liquor, then the substitute would have to pay a higher duty. With regard to spirits, it was not clear that foreign spirits might not interfere with the duty on British spirits; but that was as broad as it was long, as the duty was equal in either case. With regard to the Report of the Fortification Commission, it was true that their Report had been completed and signed some months since; but the delay in its presentation was owing to its having been referred to the Committee on the National Defences, and the Government received the final Report only a fortnight ago.

Lord MONTEAGLE intimated that he would postpone his Motion.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

TUSCANY.—THE YACHT "MEDINA."

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY asked the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, What had been done in the case of the captain and crew of the English vessel that had been ill-used by the officers of the Tuscan Government. It was quite evident that these English subjects, although the Tuscan Government had passed into the hands of the Sardinians, had a right to compensation, and he believed it had been insisted on by Her Majesty's Government, and the Sardinian Government must feel it to be their duty to take on themselves all the liabilities that previously existed in connection with the Tuscan Government. When he asked the question some time since, it was intimated that the Government had urged the matter on the attention of the Sardinian Government; but he had received a letter that morning from the ill-used men, complaining that they had lost everything they had to depend upon, and that they were only kept from the workhouse in consequence of the charity of friends where they were, at Plymouth. They complained that they had had no compensation, and could not obtain any. He wished his noble Friend would inform the House what steps had been taken, and what chance there was of compensation being given by the Sardinian Government.

LORD WODEHOUSE said, the Government had communicated on the matter with the Sardinian Government, arguing that the case was one for compensation. The Sardinian Government had replied that they were not satisfied with the representations that had been made, and that the matter should be further inquired into. Since then the two Governments had agreed to refer the matter to two impartial persons, and from what he had heard he had no doubt that they would come to a speedy decision.

BERWICK-UPON-TWEED ELECTION.

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THEREON.

EARL GRANVILLE moved,—

"To agree with the Commons in the Address to Her Majesty, and to fill the Blank with ('Lords Spiritual and Temporal and'); agreed to; and a Message sent to the Commons to acquaint them that the Lords had agreed to the Address, and had filled up the Blank: The Lord Steward and The Lord Chamberlain of the Household to attend Her Majesty with the Address on the Part of this House: The Lord Steward to wait upon Her Majesty humbly to know what Time Her Majesty will please to appoint to be attended with the said Address."

House adjourned at a Quarter past Six o'clock, till To-morrow,
Half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, June 14, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Tenison's Charity; Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment (No. 2).

2^o Phoenix Park; Husband and Wife Relation Law Amendment (Scotland).

THE BREHON-LAW COMMISSION.

ROYAL IRISH ACADEMY.

QUESTION.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the labours of the Brehon Law Commission are yet brought to a close, and if not, when it is supposed they may be; whether it is not a fact that the work commenced in 1852 was to have been completed in three years from that date; and whether the gentlemen engaged on it are remunerated by annual salary, or by a contract for a certain sum? He would also beg to ask, whether the Royal Irish Academy, to which Parliament makes an annual Grant, is open to the public for consultation and for reference to its literary contents; for reading and extracting, as in the British Museum; and, if not, what is the reason why the same system of free reference, reading, and extraction, is not adopted in the Irish as in the English Institutions?

MR. CARDWELL said, the transcription of the Brehon laws was completed, and it was confidently expected that the translation would be completed in the course of the present year. The opinion entertained at the commencement was, that the work would be completed in seven years, and notwithstanding that the work grew in its progress, he was happy to say that the expectation would be realized. The gentlemen engaged upon the work, who were selected for their special knowledge of the Irish language, were paid a very moderate remuneration, and their duties had been very faithfully performed. The Commission was composed of some of the most eminent men in Ireland, and it was due to Dr. Graves, who had acted gratuitously, as Secretary to the Commission, and rendered most valuable service, to mention his name. With regard to the second question, he was informed that the Royal Irish Academy was open not only to members, but to all persons recommended by a member, or known to the librarian; in short, every respectable person was freely invited to it. With regard to transcription, there were certain regulations adopted. If a perfectly unrestricted power of transcribing manuscripts were given, ancient and interesting manuscripts would be subject to addition and alteration, and it was, therefore, necessary to make some rules. Any person known to the Council might transcribe for himself; or if he did not desire to do so, he might employ the person authorized by the Council; or if he selected another scribe, the latter must have the approval of the Council.

Lord Wodehouse

On Motion that the House go into Committee of Supply.

THE NAVAL RESERVE.

Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. LINDSAY said, he rose to move the Resolution of which he had given notice:—

"That with a view to greater efficiency in war, and less expenditure in peace, it is the opinion of this House that more prompt and effective measures should be adopted to complete the reserves of Marines and Seamen for Her Majesty's Navy."

The number of the Naval Reserve, it had been generally agreed, should not be less than 70,000; but this proposal was very far from having been carried out. First, the Report of the Royal Commission recommended that there should be at all times a reserve of 5,000 Marines in addition to those that were enrolled at that time. Out of that number only 2,000 had been enrolled, and it was therefore 3,000 short. It was also recommended that there should be in the home ports a reserve of 4,000 seamen. Of these not a single man had been enrolled. It was recommended that the Coastguard should be increased to 12,000; only 6,800 had been entered, including officers, boys, and landsmen. Of short-service pensioners only 169 had been entered of the 3,000 recommended. Of the Naval Volunteers from the Merchant Service only 1,100 had been enrolled. The Commission recommended that the numbers of the Naval Volunteers should be 20,000; and he (Mr. Lindsay) thought there ought to be no less than 30,000; but there was only, by the last Return, 1,100 enrolled. The whole number enrolled of every kind was very far short, indeed, of the lowest estimate of what the Royal Commission considered necessary for the protection of the country. Every hon. Member in the House would agree that it was necessary to maintain the fleet in an efficient state, and at as small an expense as possible. At the present moment they were spending on the navy in the time of peace about £13,000,000 annually. They were doing so for two reasons: first, because there was no reserve; and, as the country must be prepared for war, they were compelled to keep a large fleet in commission always cruising about, as they could not otherwise obtain sailors at a short notice. This large fleet induced France to suppose this country had some intention of attacking it. It was a preposterous idea, but it had an effect on the Government of France and compelled it also to increase its naval force; which again reacted on this country. England spent more money because France did the same; and because France was spending money England spent more money also. But what this country was compelled to do arose to a great extent from the want of a Naval Reserve. The question then arose, had the Admiralty done all in its power to bring this reserve up to the proper number? It ought to be brought up to it on the ground of economy. With such a reserve it would not be necessary to keep a large fleet always cruising about. The bounties and retaining fees offered by the Admiralty had not drawn a sufficient number of men from the merchant service. The country was spending £1,000,000 a year to officers on the reserved and retired list of the Royal Navy; and yet if they were to raise reserves to the full extent recommended, they had not got officers sufficient to command them. They were still scarce of active young efficient officers. If, however, they were to look to the merchant service, where quite as strict an examination was undergone as in the Royal Navy, and perhaps stricter, they would have no difficulty in obtaining the number of officers required, from that service, to command the reserve, and for a very small retaining fee indeed. Money was not so much an object with them as the position they would gain at home and abroad by being recognized as officers of the reserve; and they would all be recruiting officers for the Royal Navy. The consequence would be that we should, instead of having obtained only 1,100 men, have in all probability secured by this time the services of 20,000. As it was, the state of the retired list was such, the amount of money which it cost the country so serious, and the dissatisfaction among the officers so great, that Her Majesty's Government had been obliged to stop the supply; that is to say, instead of having eight or ten midshipmen as formerly in a line-of-battle ship, we now had only from two to four. The effect was, that the supply of young officers in ships of war was short, and that being so, they were obliged to fill the places of those junior officers by other men competent to perform the duties. Under these circumstances, he would recommend that a higher grade of petty officers in the Royal Navy should be established to perform the duty of midshipmen. That would also act as a further inducement to seamen in the merchant service to join the navy. He wished to say one word in regard to the Articles of War in the navy. It was, in his opinion, most expedient that the Articles of War should be revised, so that men might not be precluded from entering the navy by a dread of the punishment to which they might under the operation of those Articles be subjected, and the ends of justice be defeated by the fact that owing to their severity, the officers durst not, in many instances, carry them into execution. As to the question of flogging, he should only say that while he was not prepared to advocate its complete abolition, inasmuch as it was, perhaps, necessary in order to uphold discipline, he should wish to see it maintained with some symbol of justice; the seamen, instead of being subjected to summary chastisement, being afforded the privilege of a trial as was the case with the soldier. Having made these observations with no intention of stopping the Supplies, but simply with the view of bringing the important matter to which he had referred under the serious consideration of the House, he should beg to leave to move the Resolution of which he had given notice.

Amendment proposed,

"To leave out from the word 'That' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'with a view to greater efficiency in war and less expenditure in peace. It is the opinion of this House that more prompt and effective measures should be adopted to complete the reserves of Marines and Seamen for Her Majesty's Navy.'"

MR. LIDDELL said, he wished, before the noble Lord the Secretary for the Admiralty rose to reply to the speech of the hon. Member for Sunderland, to call his attention for a moment to a subject which was quite germane to the question before the House. He referred to the subject of school ships, with regard to the non-establishment of which considerable disappointment was felt throughout the country. Now, he should remind the noble Lord that the raising of a Naval Reserve had been recommended as only a temporary measure, and had been resorted to simply for the purpose of creating a supply of men for the Navy until the period had arrived when a permanent supply might be secured through the medium of school ships. It was, nevertheless, he believed, the fact that there was only one of those ships in existence, and that vessel had been stationed, or was about to be stationed, at Southampton. He should like, under those circumstances, to know why a larger number of school ships had not been put into requisition and why it was that the application of Liverpool to have one of them placed there had been overlooked? He was also anxious to ascertain from the noble Lord whether any communication had passed between the Admiralty and the Board of Trade in which the co-operation of the former was solicited in the working of the scheme to which he was alluding? He believed that the fault lay in the lowliness of the Exchequer, and that there might be some difficulty in getting the money; but he (Mr. Liddell) could not too strongly urge upon the House the necessity and importance of making a beginning of that great scheme which had been recommended by the Commissioners for Manning the Navy. They were spending millions of money in building and altering their ships, but they had not men to man them, and money could not obtain them. He had it upon indisputable authority that the supply of seamen every year was becoming more and more scarce, and neither by money nor money's worth could they obtain them. The establishment of the system of school ships, however, would do much to break down the barrier which now existed between the naval and the merchant service, and speaking from his own experience he felt assured that the Government would meet with the co-operation of the inhabitants of our seaport towns in carrying it into effect.

Mr. Lindsay

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: In reply to my hon. Friend who has just addressed the House, I have to state that several communications have passed between the Admiralty and the Board of Trade on the subject of school ships. There are two classes of those ships—the ships exclusively for the Royal Navy, and what may be termed mixed school ships for the navy and merchant service combined. I am now speaking of mixed school ships, and my hon. Friend is, I may add, misinformed, if he supposes we have established any of those vessels at Southampton. The Commission having recommended that there should be 2,000 boys trained in school ships for the navy, the steamship Eagle will be, I believe, located at Southampton in furtherance of that object. I can, however, assure my hon. Friend that her Majesty's Government are extremely anxious not to stand still in this matter, but we think it the wisest course to wait and see how the school ships for the Royal Navy will succeed, before we commence the mixed system. It is a question of time. I am not at all surprised that those connected with the shipping interest, and, indeed, all who are concerned for the welfare of the navy, should be most anxious to have this scheme of school ships fully carried out. We are just as anxious as they can be; but surely the Government must be allowed some sort of discretion as to the rate at which we must proceed, always having regard to the economy of the public money, for as yet the cost of these school ships cannot be ascertained with precision. My hon. Friend may depend upon it this subject is not at all lost sight of by the Admiralty or the Board of Trade. It is only part, and a great deal must depend on the amount expended on other parts of the scheme of the Royal Commission. With regard to the Naval Reserve, for instance, a very large expense has been incurred in fitting out ships and batteries; and, although the numbers enrolled do not come up to anything like 20,000, yet we are making very fair progress. I can inform the House—if we only chose to lower the qualification—if we chose to enter into the Naval Reserve force, men who were not first-rate seamen, we could make great show in a short time. But it has been the policy of the Government, and I think it a very wise and sound policy, that we should not enter in it any but first-rate seamen. To prove that they are first-rate seamen who are entered in the reserve it is sufficient to state how anxious shipowners are in entering men to get what are called reserve men into their ships. The officers of the Great Eastern, for instance, in preparing for the Transatlantic voyage, have shown the greatest anxiety to get as many men as possible belonging to the Naval Reserve, knowing that they are first-rate seamen. My hon. Friend (Mr. Lindsay) made a very fair statement, and I am very much disposed to agree with a good deal that he said. There is but a shade of difference between us, and that is in regard to the merchant service officers. Nobody is more aware than I am, that, in the event of war, we must count on the young officers of the merchant service. That I think nobody will doubt for one moment; but my hon. Friend wishes that they should be entered at once into the reserve force, with an honorary rank. That is no doubt a very taking view of the matter. I should certainly be very much disposed to concur with my hon. Friend when he says we should have already enrolled 20,000—he mentioned 20,000, but the number recommended was 30,000—had we allowed the officers to join. But much as I should desire to see the merchant service officers employed if an emergency should arise, I cannot say they should be appealed to join the reserve merely with the view of influencing the men to enter. I think my hon. Friend hardly does the officers of the merchant service justice in this respect. I believe they are all exerting themselves very much to induce their men to enter this service. But I am bound to say, if the merchant service officers were to be entered with the title of officers of the navy, we should probably very soon have them coming for pay as well as honorary rank. That becomes a question of pounds, shillings, and pence—a mere question of expenditure. But as such it is a very serious question. So much for the first recommendation of my hon.

Friend. His second recommendation was in regard to petty officers. He said if our petty officers were placed on a respectable footing, it would be a great inducement for merchant men to join the navy; but he must be aware that we have what are called chief petty officers, who are a superior class of men, receive very good pay, and form a link between warrant officers and the petty officers and the ship's company. Then my hon. Friend referred to what he considered the cruelty of our Articles of War, which he said alarmed merchant seamen from entering the navy. I was in hopes I should before this have been enabled to propose a Bill with a view to amend our naval code; but I can now inform my hon. Friend and the House that the Duke of Somerset is about to lay on the table in "another place" a Bill for the improvement of the Articles of War in the Royal Navy. I think my hon. Friend's observations were very much confined to these points. With regard to the present state of the navy, I may state that we are entering able seamen wherever we can get them. We might take second class ordinary seamen on board our ships from the merchant service, but I believe the Admiralty are perfectly right in not taking all-comers indiscriminately into the navy. I believe one cause of the late unfortunate occurrences which took place in some of our ships was the great admixture of the lower class of merchant seamen, being utterly unused to anything like discipline, not having been brought up in the navy, and having no interest in common with it. In many instances the disturbances were, in fact, traced to the action of these seamen. For the same reasons the desertions have increased. I do not wish to say a word against the merchant seamen as a body. I believe good merchant seamen are as good men as we could get; but the Admiralty, I repeat, are, I think, quite right in not lowering the qualification prescribed, and entering any but first-rate seamen into the Naval Reserve, or into the navy itself. Although we might swell the numerical force, and greatly increase the expenditure, I do not think it would tend to render the navy more efficient. We might fill our ships up quicker, but I believe it would be bad policy, for we should be introducing into the navy a class of men who really are not likely to do credit to the service. We have at the present moment nearly 9,000 boys in the navy. Only conceive of what value these boys—who will, no doubt, mostly turn out first-rate seamen—must in a short time prove in the navy. You will have so many young men brought up in the service and attached to it; and, if the public will only wait patiently, they will see the navy in a short time on the most satisfactory footing in that respect. I may state to the House, indeed, I have done so before, but I will repeat, as the Member for Southwark will probably allude to the subject, what is the state of our home or reserve force at the present period. In the Coastguard, including Coastguard ships, we have 6,642 men and officers. The Naval Reserve, or volunteer force, now amounts to 1,105 men. The Royal Naval Coast Volunteers are 7,070, and the Marines on shore amount to 6,084. These different bodies of men I have enumerated amount altogether to 23,831. We are enlisting Marines as fast as we can, recruiting parties being out in all directions. We are as anxious to enlist Marines as my hon. Friend or any one can possibly be. In addition to the large force at sea, we have got fitting out a line-of-battle ship, the St. George, and it is satisfactory to state, that although that ship has been in commission only for a very few days, she is already more than half-manned. We have also fitting out the Bacchante, the Hecate, the Barracouta, the Geyser, the Torch, and the Bloodhound. There are a great number of seamen in the Royal harbours, including the men in the flag ships and harbour ships at Portsmouth and Plymouth, who will be perfectly available in the event of any unfortunate emergency. I must say, in conclusion, that I think it would be much more convenient to the House that I should reserve myself to answer the observations which hon. Gentlemen deem it their duty to make instead of having to speak early in these debates. The hon. and gallant Admiral the Member for Southwark (Sir Charles Napier) usually prefers to wait till after I have addressed the House, when I have no opportunity of replying to his remarks. I am obliged to rise, and when I have spoken the hon. and gallant Member gets up and takes me to task for what I have said. I will only add that no exertions shall be spared on the part of the Admiralty to ensure an efficient navy and Naval Reserve.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT: To the question at issue, what will secure the seamen whom we already possess, and what will win others to the naval service? I would answer, four conditions;—the encouragement to continuous service, the incentive to emulation, the advance of wages commensurate with the seaman's increase in science, and a liberal pension at the expiration of a given period of faithful duty. Our present languid supply is the consequence of our past indiscriminating and irrational treatment of the indifferent and deserving seaman alike. At present, after a service of ten years, all seamen are entitled to a retirement on 6*d.* a day. I would induce them then to enter the reserve to an addition of £6 or upwards to this existing pension of £9; and the boon would bind these men to remain faithful to their own country instead of transferring their energy, vigour, and proficiency to another land. Let me repeat and press the suggestion upon the Admiralty, speaking as I do from long experience, from considerations matured by intimate acquaintance with a sailor's habits and ways of thought, that to recruit our navy efficiently we must invite the lad of 14 to 16 years of age, then docile and open to strong impressions, when the excitement, change, and novelty of a life at sea would present the most persuasive attractions, and he would easily adapt himself to the routine of order, regularity, cleanliness, and drill in gunnery and seamanship. The hardy youth, born and bred in our seaports, was the class from which the seaman sprang. Let training ships be stationed at Portsmouth, Plymouth, Chatham, Woolwich, and Deptford, under the command of officers of skill, judgment, and prudence, who would render the naval service attractive, and enter boys to the number of 3,000 to 4,000 a year, and I will pledge my professional character to the result—the formation of an efficient navy within a few years. It is of no avail to equip the most imposing array of our floating bulwarks, unless they are alive from stem to stern with first-rate practical officers and efficient crews, adepts in seamanship and gunnery. To secure this paramount object—to answer the country's just expectations, it is indispensable to hold out certain reward to the meritorious officers and seamen who exhibited zeal and proficiency in the discharge of their duties. Infuse this spirit into the navy, and the supremacy of England will be disputed only to secure for her an era of new triumphs.

Lord Clarence Paget

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty complained that he always waited, until he had spoken, to bring him to account. The fact was, he had been in the habit of speaking early in the debates until experience taught him that it was necessary to wait for the noble Lord, because the noble Lord had a very clever way of parrying what fell from other hon. Members with respect to his department, and leading the House away from the questions that were addressed to him. He did not think the noble Lord had given a satisfactory reply to the very able speech of his hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland. His hon. Friend complained with great justice that the recommendations of the Manning Commission had not been carried into execution. He had shown that the Manning Commission recommended a reserve of 30,000, not counting the 5,000 additional Marines which they suggested should be raised, or the 5,000 men for other stations. Now, they had it on the authority of the noble Lord himself, that after scraping together all he could get from different resources, the whole number of the reserve amounted only to 23,000 men, and if he would read the Report of the Commissioners he would find that he had included certain classes who ought not to be comprised in his estimate. We had not made the addition to the Marines which was recommended by the Commission, but had only increased that body by 2,000. The Commissioners gave their opinion that the reliefs at the home ports and the Coastguard ought to be speedily raised, but the Admiralty had not speedily raised either the one or the other. The restrictions upon the Coastguard were a great deal too high, too great a length of service being required. The Commissioners recommended that this force should consist of 12,000, and although a year had elapsed since they made this suggestion, we had now no more than 6,800. The state of affairs on the Continent was not very promising, and if matters grew worse, how were we to obtain the men necessary for manning the fleet? The Commissioners also recommended that there should be 4,000 seamen in the different ports, in addition to those in the guard-ships and flag-ships, and the men scattered in various places; but not a single one of those 4,000 men had been raised. There was no use trifling or practising concealment in this matter. Of the total number of 6,800 Coastguard men only 3,181 belonged to the class called "fleet men." He supposed that we should obtain the 20,000 Naval Volunteers some time or other; but as his hon. Friend had asked with great propriety, Suppose you had obtained and had occasion to call out your Royal Naval Volunteers, where would you get officers to command them? You will then find it absolutely necessary to come to the mercantile service. Well, why not come to that service now, assign Volunteers their rank, and give some slight decoration—say, an "arrow," embroidered on their collar. When they went to sea in the splendid fleets of our merchant seamen, that decoration would proclaim to all on board, "I am a Royal Volunteer Officer—why have you not Royal Volunteer Seamen?" But the Admiralty would do nothing of the kind out of the absurd jealousy they entertained of the merchant service. The noble Lord said these officers would ask for pay. He did not see how they could do so unless they were employed; and he insisted that the plan of his hon. Friend was a plain and sensible one, showing a thorough knowledge of the merchant service, while the noble Lord as plainly showed he did not know how to deal with them. Then they were told that it was the influx of men from the merchant service that had caused the late disturbances on board the fleet. Why, ever since he had been in the service there had been a constant influx of men from the merchant service, and very glad were they to get them. They used to get them from all kinds of craft during the last war—aye, and worse than that—convicts, "Lord Mayor's men" as they were called. It was because he wished to save the navy from being flooded, in periods of emergency, with such worthless, disreputable characters, with the sweepings of the streets and gaols, that he urged the maintenance of a disciplined reserve force, which they could call to the aid of the regular navy in time of war. If that were once properly done, there would be no need for those fortifications that were now so much talked of. But what was their condition? If war were to break out the next day they would require 120,000 seamen; and he would ask, where were they to be got? The noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty had expressed his disapproval of the bounty system adopted by the late Board of Admiralty, but he would ask what else was to have been done? Ships were lying three and four, and even five, months in harbour after they were commissioned for want of men; the bounty was offered, and the late Board was able to man ten sail of the line. Of course, a proportion of these deserted; that had always been the case; but if the Government instituted an efficient system of police and punishment, desertion would soon cease in the British navy. The noble Lord said the Admiralty were now engaged preparing new laws. But how long were they to take in the preparation? The task was not a difficult one if the Board would only set about it in earnest; two or three officers would in a very few days make all the corrections that were needed. Now, he had made the matter more plain. He told them that the navy was at this moment between 7,000 and 8,000 seamen below the Vote of the House of Commons. He insisted that the Government ought to follow the example of their predecessors, and offer bounty to recruits until they had made up the proper complement of men, and then, if they thought proper, they might discontinue it. His hon. Friend recommended a higher grade of petty officers. He had over and over again stated that there was not a sufficient distinction made between the petty officers and the seamen. The only way to raise their position was to raise their pay, and the Admiralty ought to insist on the Chancellor of the Exchequer giving them money for that purpose. At present all that the best men on board a ship had to look forward to was the rank of boatswain, gunner, and carpenter. As to rising beyond these there was not the smallest chance. If a warrant officer did a gallant action in the war, he had a chance to get a commission; but since the peace that had been a rare event. Various things had been done for the benefit of seamen. The Royal Commission had recommended the establishment of a Seamen's Fund; but was there any prospect of that recommendation being carried out? Then, why were savings banks not established? It had been promised that savings banks should be established in the different ports, though nothing had been done: but he contended there ought to be a savings bank on board every ship. There was another thing of which he had often spoken privately. There was no one to take care of the seamen's money on board ship. The seamen had no safe place to put their money; some stowed it in their bags, and some in their hammocks, where there was great danger of being robbed. How easy would it be for the paymaster to take charge of the money and keep a running account with the men. He might be told the paymaster had too much to do; then give him an assistant. That, it would be said, was expensive; but if it was necessary to the efficiency of the navy, expense ought not to stand in the way. The noble Lord apologised for the short supply of school ships by saying the batteries were not ready. What did they want with batteries? They wanted ships. Then the noble Lord said there was a difficulty in the merchant service of getting men. But he was informed by a gallant friend, the Great Eastern had no difficulty in getting petty officers with twelve years' service from the Royal Navy; and the great steam companies—the Peninsular and Oriental Company, for instance—could get their choice of men while the British navy was in want of them. All the great steam companies readily got the men they required; and there was no reason why the navy should not obtain them also, if they took the right course. The reason was that the service was unpopular. It was a disgrace to the country that it should be so, and the Admiralty ought to devise some means to correct the evil. As to entering boys of sixteen or eighteen years of age, he was aware that they would cost a great deal before they would be efficient seamen, but, as they had been cobbling, God knew how long, without succeeding in obtaining a sufficient number of men, they ought to take boys, however expensive it might be. The effect would not be felt immediately, and besides that, they ought at once, seeing the state of affairs in Sicily, and the confusion throughout the world, to take steps to obtain a proper reserve. He believed that the expenditure of large sums of money in fortifications would be entirely and totally useless. A man like Napoleon Buonaparte, with an army of 600,000 men, would not be such a blockhead as to attempt to land men where the fortifications were placed. He would go a little to the east or a little to the west, and he would find plenty of places where there were no fortifications. When England commanded the seas she defied the whole world, and the British way—the only way—to defend this country was to maintain a well-manned and a well-disciplined navy.

Sir Charles Napier

MR. BENTINCK said, it appeared to him that the whole purport of the Motion of his hon. Friend was to imply, or rather to assert, that the Board of Admiralty had not done the utmost in their power to carry out the recommendations of the Manning Commission; and he was bound to add that if that was the object of the Motion it was one in which he entirely concurred. He did not think that the Board of Admiralty had exerted themselves to the utmost to give effect to those recommendations; and he further believed that they had consequently neglected an important duty. But the question then arose, upon whom was the principal blame in that matter to rest? Now he was not prepared to throw all the blame upon the Board of Admiralty. He admitted that they were the body directly responsible, but it should be remembered that they had great difficulties to contend with. He believed that the real blame laid with that House. The indifference of the House of Commons to the importance of the question was the cause of the absence of the necessary exertions on the part of the Board of Admiralty. That Board had, like all other public departments, to deal with that most inconvenient personage a Chancellor of the Exchequer, who seldom allowed his mind to wander beyond figures, was indifferent to the requirements of the country, and was ready to starve every branch of the Government in order that he might reduce his Estimates to the lowest possible amount. He did not deny that the Board of Admiralty ought to insist on obtaining the sums required for the efficiency of the service over which they presided; but it was rather too much to expect from any particular set of gentlemen that they should break up the Government with which they were connected by coming to a quarrel with the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Under these circumstances the blame must be charged upon the House of Commons. Let some paltry discussion be raised involving the advent to office of one party or another, when it was of little consequence what the decision might be, they saw 500 or 600 Members coming down to the House, and taking the most eager interest in the result of the division, whereas during a discussion on the state of the navy the benches were almost deserted. The inference was that the House of Commons were perfectly indifferent upon the subject. He felt persuaded, however, that until the House should put a pressure upon the Admiralty, the present wretched system of conducting the naval service would continue. That system was based upon the principle of a penny-wise and pound-foolish economy, and the benefit of £13,000,000 expenditure was lost, when £1,000,000 more would make the defence of the country complete. It was a question purely of pounds, shillings, and pence, and all discussion of details was a mere waste of time. The great steam-packet companies obtained as many men as they wanted, as his hon. and gallant Friend had stated, because they chose to pay for them, and it was a disgrace to this country that it should experience the slightest difficulty or delay in procuring the men it required for its navy. Let the Government pursue one or other of two courses. Let them either say, "we disagree with the recommendations of the Manning Commission, and we are not prepared to carry them into effect," or let them resolve on carrying them out by incurring the necessary expenditure. There was one other point to which he wished to advert. He entirely agreed with his hon. and gallant Friend in his condemnation of the proposal to defend this country by fortifications. He regarded it as utter insanity. He believed that for all practical purposes the money to be so expended might as well be thrown into the middle of the sea. It was impossible, in his opinion, to doubt that one-half of that money employed in raising and maintaining an efficient Channel fleet would do more good than all the brick and mortar or all the stone work that could ever be erected.

MR. WHITBREAD said, that he wished to correct a misapprehension as to what had fallen from the noble Lord at the head of the Admiralty. The noble Lord had stated nothing about the difficulty experienced by the merchant service in obtaining men for their ships, but that they were anxious to get the men who had joined the Royal Naval Reserve, and adduced the fact to show that they were first-rate seamen. He might also add with regard to savings banks on board ships, if the gallant Admiral meant the reception of the seamen's money and the payment of interest, there was no such institution; but if he meant that, instead of placing their money in their chests and hammocks, sailors ought to have a place of safe deposit, there was what was called the second chest, into which savings were received by the paymaster, and the men were pressed by their officers to place their money there for safety. As to raising the number of Coast-guard it might be done at once, but it must not be forgotten that it would take away the best men and half ruin the fleet. By lowering the qualification for the Coast-guard and for the Reserve numbers might be added, but they would not have men to be depended upon, and they would not have first-rate sailors.

ADMIRAL DUNCOMBE said, he believed that the immediate subject then under consideration was the manning of the fleet. The Admiralty were accused of not having made sufficient exertions to ensure the due accomplishment of that object. It should, however, be borne in mind that able seamen, of whom alone a reserve ought to be composed, were very difficult to get. Only that day week he was on board the Great Eastern, and one of the officers told him that, although they expected to have to go to sea in forty-eight hours, they were seventy-eight able-seamen short; that they did not know where to get them, and they thought of endeavouring to obtain them ultimately in America. It was true that men had been readily obtained for the St. George and the Bacchante, but as one of those vessels was to convey his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales to Canada, and the other was to be the ship of Prince Alfred, the facility with which they were manned could not be considered a fair example of the ease with which men could be obtained for the navy. He was delighted to hear that the articles of war were to be revised, as he believed that such a revision would tend more than any other step which could be taken to make the naval service popular. The maintenance of discipline on board ships was of the greatest importance, but punishment should be commensurate with offences; it should also be certain, and it was impossible to carry out the extreme penalties provided in the present articles of war. He entirely approved of the recommendation of the Commissioners that a large number of boys should be trained for the Royal Navy. He wished they had 15,000 or 20,000 of those boys, for he believed that their services would hereafter be productive of the greatest advantages. It was on the education and training of boys that in future years they must rely for a supply of sailors.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, that the House was about to be asked for Votes upon account of the Civil Service Estimates; a practice to which he entertained the strongest objection, because when the money was obtained nothing more was heard of the Estimates until so late a period of the Session, that there was no opportunity of fairly discussing and considering them. It was quite true, as was stated by the noble Lord the Member for the City of London the other night, that in the years 1851, 1853, 1854, 1855, and 1856, money was voted upon account of these Estimates, the consideration of which was not commenced until the months of July or August. But what had been the result of the adoption of that course? Why, these Estimates had increased from year to year to a very considerable extent. In 1851 they amounted to £3,900,000, in 1853 to £4,800,000, in 1854 to £6,600,000, and in 1856 to £7,235,000, and he thought it was full time for the House to look into that expenditure. The proper course would be for the Government, instead of asking for Votes on account, to take those Votes upon which the balances were running short, and let them be fairly discussed and their amounts voted. The first item for which money was wanted on account was the salaries of the First Lord, the Lords and the Secretary of the Treasury, who were the persons responsible for the delay of these Estimates, and who ought, in his opinion, not to receive their money until they had fulfilled their duties to that House. The most important, perhaps, of all the Votes was, however, that for public education, which had run up in amount in a greater degree than any of the others; and if they agreed to these Votes on account, they would hear nothing more with regard to the subject of them until a late period of the Session, when it would be impossible to bring them under discussion. There were also Votes for the Commissioners of Works, for the convict establishments at home, and for the consular service; all of which ought to be fully discussed, but for the consideration of which the House would obtain no sufficient opportunity if it now consented to give Votes upon account. It had been said that the Estimates could not be submitted to the House earlier because there was before it a great and urgent constitutional question, and those who agreed with him had been accused of wishing to impede the progress of business. Such an accusation was unjust, because the Reform Bill was pressed upon the House in opposition to the wishes of all but a small section of its Members. He should not oppose the Motion that the Speaker should leave the chair, but he should take the sense of the Committee upon the first Vote on account that was asked for.

Mr. Whitbread

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

PROPERTY AND INCOME TAX.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. WHALLEY said, he rose pursuant to notice to call attention to the present mode of assessing the property and income tax, with a view to the more equitable assessment thereof. He would remind the House that from the establishment of this impost there had been general, wide-spread, and most deeply-felt dissatisfaction, in consequence of the mode in which it was assessed, and with reference to the principle of assessment. The subject had been repeatedly brought under the attention of the House, and in 1852 its importance had been recognized by the appointment of a Committee to consider it. It appeared that the subject was beyond the power of the Committee, because they referred it back to the House for its decision. He brought forward the question in the hope that the Government would render any further steps on the part of independent Members unnecessary, by stating what course they intended to pursue in respect to it. His object on that occasion was not to invite the House to discuss the present mode of assessment, or to inquire whether it could be improved, and if so by what means, but from the belief that, for the public interest, the Government should state at that period of the Session the course they intended to pursue in the next Session on the arrival of the time for renewing the tax. The first question was whether the present system of assessment was a just one. Now, without reviving all the arguments commonly urged upon this point, he would say that common sense revolted against persons engaged in trades and professions paying on their precarious incomes the same amount that was obtained from fixed incomes derived from real property. If the Government intended to persist in that system it was absolutely essential that they should mitigate the sense of injustice which persons employed in trades and professions must feel in contributing an equal rate, or something like an equal rate with the land, by making it clear and intelligible to the people of the country that it was essential to retain the assessment on its present footing, and that it could not be altered with any degree of consideration for the public service. In that case, unfair and unjust as it might be, those who suffered from the injustice would be ready to pay their quota with much greater readiness. Upon this point, however, the country was entirely without information, although he believed that the Government had at its command ample materials for the re-adjustment of the tax, and that it could be re-adjusted without causing any of those divisions between different classes of the community, or of the jealousies between landed and trade interests, which appeared to constitute the great difficulty in approaching the question. In 1853, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer declared that he sympathized with the feeling that the income tax bore more heavily on trade and professions, on skill and industry, than upon property; but in 1856 the right hon. Gentleman, the present Home Secretary, expressed totally different views. That right hon. Gentleman said, that in imposing a tax of this sort the State ought not to look to property but to income, and that the ability of each person to pay should be measured by the annual income he possessed. When the re-imposition of the tax was proposed, the members of trades and professions should know which of those views was approved of by the Government. In quoting the opinion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he omitted to say that the right hon. Gentleman expressed his full and entire conviction that the sympathy he felt could not be practically carried out, and that a reconstruction of the tax could not take place without producing evils far greater than any good that could be effected by a change in the system. Well, if that could be shown, the country might be satisfied; but in his opinion the system could be altered without difficulty and without injury. At that time the right hon. Gentleman regarded the tax as a temporary one; but looking upon it, as they must now do, as a permanent arrangement, did there not exist materials by which, without any conflict of party, and without any serious conflict between opposing interests, the system could be changed so as to put an end to the prevalent dissatisfaction? Not only was the assessment inquisitorial and unjust, but it had the most prejudicial influence on the morality of the country, in leading persons to make false returns of their incomes. If it was possible to devise a remedy, it was most essential to adopt it when the property and income tax was about to be made the permanent source of revenue. In 1840 Parliament passed an Act releasing from its liability to the poor rate visible property, as stock in trade, amounting to £16,000,000 a year, and which might be said to be property of an analogous character to that which came under Schedule D of the Property Tax Act. It was true that by usage this class of property was exempt from liability to the poor rate; but in the year he had mentioned the exemption was confirmed by Act of Parliament, and the burden transferred to the land. That Act was originally passed for two or three years, he forgot which, but since then it had been continually renewed without objection on the part of the owners of real property, by whom its justice had been previously practically recognized. When the Bill of 1840 was under discussion the present Lord Chancellor, then a Member of the House of Commons, said it was most inquisitorial to attempt to tax stock in trade; but how much more inquisitorial must it be to tax property such as was assessed under Schedule D, and which was not even, as stock in trade was, "visible" property, but property that was invisible. He submitted that in the course taken with regard to the liability of visible personal property to the poor rate, they might find a means for the satisfactory adjustment of the income tax in respect to incomes derived from trades and professions. With the permission of the House, he would read a letter from Mr. George Coode, who had a perfect knowledge of the subject, and who stated that the materials were in the power of the Government, not only for ascertaining the bearing and operation of the tax, but for setting it free from the objections that unnecessarily aggravated its unpopularity. Mr. Coode also stated that those materials would never come before a Parliamentary Committee; and that no Government department would never work them up; but that there must be a department to make an exposition of them if they were ever to be reduced to a satisfactory condition. The difficulty of dealing with Schedule D, therefore, was purely imaginary; a deep and general dissatisfaction was felt with regard both to the principle and details of this tax, and it was the duty, therefore, of the Government either to take some means to correct its evils, or to show that it was a perfectly fair and just tax. They had ample means at their disposal for either one purpose or the other. The great question which had lately arisen between the two Houses had had its origin mainly in the opinion expressed in "another place" that they were no longer equal to the administration of those functions which were supposed to attach specially to that House. As regards the property and income tax, there might be some ground for the feeling that the House had not fulfilled its duty; but, whether that be so or not, they should have an authoritative statement on the subject. Although they might not satisfy the House of Lords that they were able to discharge the duty that properly belonged to them, it was the more important, as it seemed to him, to show that they had done all they could to render themselves worthy of the high trust, in regard to taxation of the country, which that House had ever enjoyed, and which he trusted it would insist upon retaining.

Mr. Whalley

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, he firmly believed that the time had come when the feeling of the people on this subject could no longer be trifled with, especially as there never was a time when there was less reason for regarding the income tax as a temporary impost than that moment. At the beginning of the Session it might have been thought possible that the tax might be got rid of in a year or two, but the China war and the state of Europe, which rendered it necessary for them to spend large sums on armaments and fortifications, were sufficient to put an end to all such hopes. The Committee of 1851 and 1852 made an attempt to grapple with the tax, which proved a failure; but still he thought that their labours ought not to be altogether thrown away, and he suggested that some compromise should be come to upon the subject. He therefore hoped that Her Majesty's Government would give them some information upon it.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, there was a very strong impression in various parts of the country that there was unfairness in the imposition of this tax. That unfairness had been submitted to because there had been a constant hope that in two or three years the tax would be taken off. That hope had now departed, and he thought the country ought now to have an assurance that the Government, and especially the Finance Minister, would grapple with the subject.

MR. WESTHEAD said, he represented a very ancient city, in which were many members of the legal and clerical professions, and they considered that this tax was most unfairly levied. It was generally hoped that this tax, after what had been shown as to its injustice, would have been brought to an end; but the prospect before them was very gloomy, and he was afraid that the burden must long remain as an incubus upon the industry of the country in various forms. He had had opportunities within his own experience of perceiving how unequally the burden affected different members of the community. One was the case of a merchant who had paid the tax upon a large income for many years, but in the panic of 1857-58 the whole of his property was swept away. In the case of another merchant, he invested a short period before that panic £120,000 in land, and he retained that property now. The incomes from trade and that from land were both taxed, but it was quite unfair to tax them upon the same principle as was done in that case. A man who gave his best efforts to the support of his family, and did his best to maintain them on his income, ought not to be taxed like himself (Mr. Westhead) and others who had property which, if they died the next day, would descend to their children. The country had been content to bear these inequalities upon the assurances of various Chancellors of the Exchequer that the tax should soon come to an end. That hope was now vain; and he gave notice that in a future Session he should use all his influence to prevent its re-imposition.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I think this subject is one so important, and involves so many public interests, that it would not be respectful to my hon. Friend who raised the discussion if I were to allow you, Sir, to leave the chair without saying one word with regard to what has fallen from him. Now, Sir, there is one consideration that ought always to be borne in mind in a discussion as to the mode of assessing the income tax. It is not always so vividly present to the minds of those who enter into that discussion as it might be. I am far from mentioning it as a consideration decisive of the question, but it certainly is one very material to the question, and it is this—that when we are considering the re-adjustment of the income tax, with the idea of affording great relief to particular persons on whom we may think it presses too heavily, we do not always remember that the relief of one is, in point of fact, an additional burden on another. I have, indeed, known the case of a Member of Parliament who was assailed, I think, in the same town which he had canvassed, with complaints of the burdens of the income tax on those who come under Schedule D, on which he said that nothing could be clearer than the claims of those who were assessed under Schedule D to relief. He afterwards became a county Member, and when he canvassed that county he was assailed with complaints of the unjust and unequal pressure of the income tax on those who come under Schedule A. He replied in like manner, and yielding to the same impulse of benevolence, said that nothing in his judgment was clearer than that relief ought to be given to those assessed under Schedule A. He was afterwards pressed with the case of the fundholder—he considered the case of persons receiving salaries from the Government who are assessed under Schedule C to belong to D; and thus he disposed of three Schedules: he was pressed, as I have said, with regard to the only remaining Schedule, which was the case of the fundholders, and he said nothing could be more invidious than to make them exceptions to the enjoyment of that relief which had been extended to Schedule C. That is, no doubt, a most agreeable method of handling a thorny question. It was most consolatory to the feelings of those classes who were addressed in turn in honied accents by the Gentleman who had that happy knack of dealing with an unpleasant subject. But the end of that method is, that if all get relief from the existing standard, then the standard of the whole tax must be raised in order to replace the Exchequer in the same position that it occupied before. With regard to the fault of the income tax, its inequality, there are certain parts of the inequalities of it common to it as to most other taxes levied in this country, although they may be more prominent in the case of the income tax. There are other inequalities—other disadvantages—which I myself have always strongly felt—and perhaps with regard to some of them, at least, I feel more strongly than most Members of this House—many inequalities and faults peculiar to this tax. There is a peculiar sense—a belief of the inequality attaching to the imposition of this tax. Now, I gather from what has been said by the hon. Gentleman who raised this discussion that he has no intention at the present moment of moving for a Parliamentary Inquiry into the subject. I confess I think that in so doing he exercises a wise discretion. I am very far from saying that it is the duty of the Government to oppose a further prosecution of the Inquiry into the assessment of the income tax, if at any time it should be the general desire of the House to institute that Inquiry, and not only to institute that Inquiry, but to prosecute it with earnestness, and energy proportionate to the extreme difficulty of the subject. I do not feel authorized to shut the door against a general desire of the House, but I must confess as an individual, and I believe on the part of my Colleagues, that in saying this we have done all in our power. The hon. Baronet (Sir Francis Goldsmid) who appeals to me in the office I hold, said he hoped the question would receive at the hands of the Government, and especially the Finance Minister, before he proposes another Budget, an attentive and careful examination. Now, it does happen that at a former period it became my duty, in my own behalf, in the same office I have now the honour to fill, and likewise on behalf, to a considerable degree, of the same Colleagues, to examine this question. Nor was I alone in the examination, because several Members of the Cabinet of the Earl of Aberdeen, including all those who had paid the greatest attention to the subject of finance, were good enough to associate themselves with me for the purpose of testing and sifting it to the best of our ability. At that period nothing was more obvious than that it was to the interest of the Government to come to some arrangement if possible for the adjustment of this tax. A strong disposition had been shown by those who then formed, as now, the Opposition party, to give their countenance to the reconstruction of the tax. I do not mention that now as a matter of praise or blame, but simply as an important historical fact. While that was the case with regard to the Conservative party, undoubtedly a large portion of the Liberal party were, in the abstract, favourable to the same opinion. Therefore there was the clearest interest on the part of the Government to have proposed a plan for the purpose, if we had found ourselves able to arrive at the means of constructing such a plan consistently with justice. It is very difficult to assert, with confidence, a negative on most subjects, and particularly on the subject of politics, and most of all on the subject of taxation. We did come to the conclusion, however, that it was not practicable to form any system of readjustment of the income tax with reference to the distinction between permanent and terminable income, without inflicting a greater amount of injustice than that which it would cure. I am bound to take notice—I am bound to remind those who have taken part in this debate, because it is a material part of the case, that even in the commencement of the examination of it, we find ourselves confronted by this fact—that whereas, on the whole, those who are assessed under Schedule D pay on less than their real income—I do not speak now of the cases of fraud, though I fear they are not unfrequent, but I speak of the liberal arrangements made by the law, which, I think, legitimately have on the whole that effect—while those assessed under Schedule D pay on less than their real income, in almost every case—I believe I may say every case without exception—those who pay under Schedule A pay on more than the real amount of their income. Therefore, I think that if at this moment we institute a severe critical analysis of the tax, and pursue that to its farthest stage, we shall find that the tax presses more heavily on those assessed under Schedule A than any other. That is clear with reference to all property assessed under Schedule A, but one description of property—I think I may say all property; but I am not quite sure how the case stands with regard to the returns of mines. But speaking of the great branches under Schedule A, there is no doubt of the truth of the statement I have made. With respect to one large branch of that property—namely, house property, I may say with regard to certain classes of it at least, that if there be a special claim to be singled out from all the rest for relief, the strongest is the claim which may be urged by the owner of a certain species of house property. I only mention that as a material, but not as a decisive consideration, to be borne in mind by those who take an interest in this subject. It was my fate, in 1853, for a space of two mortal hours, to occupy the time of this House,—whether fruitfully or fruitlessly, I do not know,—in stating in great detail, and in giving a full development to the reasons that had actuated the Government in the conclusions at which they had arrived. There was then a strong sense, and there is still a considerable sense of the inequality of the pressure of the tax, as well as of its general severity, yet I am bound to say, on the whole, since that time the public have been more impressed with a sense of the difficulty of any practical reconstruction of it than they were at an earlier period. That result I entirely attribute to the labours of the Select Committee, and to the fact that that Committee, having been appointed with the notion that a reconstruction of the tax, as practicable, and probably easy, might be accomplished, were—such was the general effect which the evidence brought before them left on their minds—led to the conviction that if such a reconstruction was not hopeless, it was, at all events, a work of extreme difficulty. Nay more, there were one or two highly intelligent Members of this House, who entered upon the inquiry in that Committee, in the firm belief of the practicability of the reconstruction of the tax, who concluded their labours in the full persuasion that its reconstruction was impossible. I think the hon. Gentleman who brought forward this question, will, therefore, see that it would be paltering with the House and the country, if I were to pretend, on the part either of myself, or, I believe I may say, any one of my colleagues, that we see our way to any plan for the readjustment of the income tax. It cannot, of course, be denied that there are many questions of a more limited character than the complete reconstruction of the tax, which, nevertheless, are of great importance, which may, perhaps, form the subject of useful inquiry; and with respect to which I am by no means disposed to say that improvements might not be effected. But what I am desirous of impressing upon my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Whalley) now is, that while I am aware there are very sanguine ideas entertained out of doors on this subject, I cannot give to those who entertain them any encouragement; and that, while I feel myself perfectly unable to give to those ideas practical effect, I should be unwilling to stand in the way of men, who, bringing a greater amount of ability to bear upon the question, may deem themselves capable of devising a scheme to accomplish this object. With that explanation, frankly owning to my hon. Friend that he exercises a sound judgment in not asking the House to go into an inquiry on this subject, I beg to conclude the brief remarks I have offered to the House.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. WHALLEY, in explanation, stated that he had neither proposed nor suggested a revision of Schedule D merely, but such an inquiry into the whole of the schedules as would satisfy the just requirements of the country.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that as it was clear that the income tax must be permanent, he hoped that means would be devised to make it bear as light as possible. It might be extremely difficult to readjust the tax, yet there were some of its more aggravated inequalities which might be easily redressed. In the course of last year, for instance, the right hon. Gentleman had greatly aggravated the inequality of the income tax by throwing the annual payment on the half-year. The class of long annuitants in this way were compelled to pay the whole year's tax on the half-year's income in October. The consequence was that they paid on a quarter's income that they had never received. That was a remarkable instance of the injustice of that House. The quarter he referred to was from the 10th of January to the 5th of April. He had been applied to by some of these long annuitants to appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for restitution, and he had told them to appeal to him themselves; but he was afraid they would not succeed, as he never knew a Chancellor of the Exchequer to make restitution of anything. He (Sir Henry Willoughby) had done all he could. He had last year divided the House on the subject, but only thirty-seven Gentlemen followed him.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

House in Committee.

MR. LAING said, he rose to move that a Vote of £654,000 be granted to Her Majesty on account for the purpose of defraying certain expenses for the Civil Service. In doing so, he would take occasion to say that it was by no means the wish or the intention of the Government to have recourse to the practice of taking Votes on account, or to lay down any new system with respect to the voting of the Estimates. The present Vote was proposed under exceptional circumstances, inasmuch as, while a certain amount was immediately wanted for the Civil Service, it was not thought expedient, nor probably would it be the wish of the House, that the discussion on the Estimates for that Service should be at once proceeded with, to the exclusion of those for the army and the navy, the debate on the organization of the Indian army, and other important subjects which claimed immediate attention. The amount, he might add, for which he asked on the present occasion was only sufficient to tide the Government over salaries and other payments due next month, and by no means so large as to preclude the House from exercising to its fullest extent their judgment with respect to Civil Service Estimates as a whole, the discussion on which the Government did not wish to postpone a single day beyond the time necessary for the despatch of more important business. It had been said that those Estimates were in a state of constant and rapid expansion, but it would be found that when the whole of the items of the revenue—class 7—were before the House—which would be the case in a few days—they did not exceed the amount which had been stated by his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in February last, and that upon the whole of the Civil Service Estimates there was a diminution, as compared with last year, of at least £320,000.

1. Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £854,000, be granted to Her Majesty, on account, for or towards defraying the Charge of certain Civil Services, to the 31st day of March 1861."

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he had great objection to the system of voting sums on account, but seeing the difficult position in which the Government were placed, as they had no means of going on without these Votes, he should not offer any opposition to that before the Committee. He wished, however, to know how long the present Vote would enable the Government to go on?

MR. LAING said, that the Votes had been taken to carry the public service over the payment of the quarterly salaries due at the commencement of July. The Government, if these votes of credit were granted, would have to come to the House again for money about the middle of July.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, the Committee must be convinced that, if the Votes on account were granted, there would be an end to all discussion on the Civil Service Estimates. They all knew that by the middle of July the House was in a state of dissolution, and no reduction could then be made in the Votes. He should, therefore, offer a few observations on the first item, the Vote for the Treasury, and, as the Gentlemen representing that department had not done their work this year, and had not got these Votes discussed and passed, they were not entitled to their salaries. The subject was one of importance, as a very unsatisfactory mode of conducting business at the Treasury had recently sprung up, and some fresh organization of that department was much wanted. Formerly the Lords of the Treasury sat as a Board. Everything went before them, and their sanction as a body was required. But of late years he understood the business was transacted by the Secretary and the Chief Clerk of the department. More important matters were arranged between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary, and then the clerk wrote the determination that had been come to in the name of "my Lords," although "my Lords" knew nothing of the matter. The Lords of the Treasury ought to be really active and responsible officers. The inquiry before the Packet Contracts Committee showed the necessity of bringing the business of the Treasury into one focus, so that one department might know what another was doing. The Lords of the Treasury were very active in and about that House, and hon. Members were sure to find one at the door, but they were less entitled to their salaries this year than ever, because on two or three occasions they had been active in counting out the House, and preventing it from proceeding with the business before it. He would move as an Amendment that the Vote of £15,000 for the Treasury be postponed until the whole Vote for the Treasury was before the Committee.

Mr. Laing

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member could not move the postponement of a Vote.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he would move, then, that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £15,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £639,000, be granted to Her Majesty, on account, for or towards defraying the Charge of certain Civil Services, to the 31st day of March 1861."

MR. BENTINCK said, it was absurd to suppose that the House could properly discuss the Estimates if they were put off to a late period of the Session. The Civil Service Estimates were those upon which their only hope rested with regard to economy. It would be impossible to economise on the Army and Navy Votes, the only fault of which was that instead of being too high they were too low. The increase in the Civil Service Estimates during the last six or seven years was out of proportion to the apparent requirements of the country. The House would do well to make it imperative upon the Government to lay the Estimates before the House at an early period of the Session. If a Resolution of that kind were passed, marking the sense of the Committee upon the delay which had occurred, they would do more towards economising the finances of the country than had been done by any previous House of Commons. The difficulty in which the Government now found themselves was one of their own creation. Still, he did not see that any good would result from refusing this Vote on account; but if the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Augustus Smith) chose to divide the Committee upon it he would go into the lobby with him.

MR. BAXTER said, he thought the suggestion of the hon. Member (Mr. Bentinck) for an earlier production of the Civil Service Estimates was a good one, and he trusted it would engage the attention of the Committee up-stairs, and form one of their recommendations. As, however, it was not through any fault of the Government that the present delay had occurred, he trusted the hon. Member for Truro would not press his Amendment.

MR. SPOONER said, he wished to know whether any part of the money voted would be applied to the Art and Science Department Vote of £94,000, and the Vote of £34,000 for works and repairs about the Palace of Westminster. It was his intention to move a considerable reduction in both these Votes.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he hoped it was not intended to postpone the consideration of the Estimates till the middle of July, because what had happened before might happen again, and when very few Members were present, except those behind the Treasury bench, many very important Votes might be taken.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he could assure the House that there was no intention to postpone unnecessarily the discussion of these Estimates. All that his hon. Friend asked was that there should be a Vote on account to meet the wants of the service up to a particular period. It was desirable to go on as soon as possible with the Navy and Army Estimates, as those related to services of great magnitude and importance to the country; but as soon as those Estimates were gone through, which he hoped would be next week, the House would be able to discuss in the fullest manner all the items of the Miscellaneous Estimates.

MR. BRISCOE said, the statement of the noble Lord would give great satisfaction, as the impression might have gone abroad that the Government had no desire to give the House an opportunity of fully considering these Estimates.

COLONEL SYKES said, he thought they could not conscientiously refuse this Vote, as the Treasury was at a very low ebb. The state of the public business had given the Government an excuse for asking Votes on account that Session; but he considered the principle of such Votes to be highly objectionable. He was glad to hear the noble Lord say that ample opportunities would be given for discussing the Estimates.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he wished to ask whether any architect had been appointed as the successor of Sir Charles Barry; and also whether any considerable works were to be undertaken with reference to the Houses of Parliament during the ensuing year?

MR. LAING said, it was not intended to apply any portion of the money then asked to the expenditure upon the Houses of Parliament, the money already taken for that purpose not being yet exhausted. A sum of £12,000 would be appropriated on account of the arts and sciences, the total Vote for which was £94,000.

MR. CHILDERS said, the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary had, a few evenings ago, spoken of the consideration of the Miscellaneous Estimates as business that might be put off without much detriment, and that on an average of years the reductions made in them were very trifling. That was not a position in which the Civil Service Estimates, which were growing in importance every year, ought to stand. It had also been said that the principle of voting on account ought to be acted on by the House, and that it should be the rule—not the exception. When that was laid down as a rule, it was high time for the House to look into the question. He thought that they should act on the principle of no money being spent till it was appropriated, and in order to carry out that principle, the commencement of the financial year should be on the 1st of July, instead of the 1st of April. It was his intention to bring the latter proposition more prominently before the House on a future day.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he agreed with the hon. Member opposite (Mr. A. Smith) that a reorganization of the Treasury was required. That had been shown by the evidence given before the Public Moneys, Miscellaneous Expenditure, and other Committees, for the way in which it had been thereby proved that the Treasury transacted their business was far from satisfactory. The Lords of the Treasury were all very able gentlemen, and he could not understand why more use was not made of them in departments where their ability might be of service. He thought the financial secretary of the day exercised too much power. A remarkable instance of the unlimited exercise of power in that direction occurred when Mr. Wilson was financial secretary, for during that period he alone, without consulting any single functionary, or the Treasury, entered into a most important contract, involving the outlay of £185,000, of which 92,000 had to be paid by one of our colonies. That contract had given great dissatisfaction in the colony, for it had proved to be a complete failure; and Mr. Wilson had avowed that though my Lords were stated to have done this and to have done that, no one but himself had had the least share in the matter. That was a very wrong mode of conducting public business, and Her Majesty's Government and the Treasury should look to it, and be made responsible for all the transactions that took place. He thought the hon. Gentleman had done good service in calling attention to the subject.

MR. A. SMITH said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY.—NAVY ESTIMATES.

(2.) £444,049, New Works in Naval Establishments.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he should be glad to hear whether the Board of Admiralty had taken into their consideration the pressure that existed for the extension of the dockyards at Chatham. The late Board of Admiralty had given the subject their most anxious consideration, but did not come to any final conclusion upon it. He was disposed to think that there ought to be a large expenditure upon the Chatham dockyards. It was most important to have the naval establishments well strengthened particularly upon that part of our coast. They could not do justice to our naval forces without largely increasing our dockyard accommodation there. He wished to know whether the Board of Admiralty had come to any conclusive opinion upon the subject.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that the Board had given much attention to the case of the Chatham dockyards. They had found upon inquiry as to their rights over St. Mary's Creek, which formed a sort of highway for small vessels between Chatham and Gillingham that there was an opposition on the part of the Corporation of Rochester and Chatham against their taking possession of it. In carrying on the works at St. Mary's Island it would be necessary to shut up St. Mary's Creek, and the Admiralty proposed to introduce a Bill for the shutting up of that creek. In the meantime they were doing what they could to arrest encroachments from the sea on the outer part of the island, which would be so much gained. It was not, however, proposed in the present year to go beyond the works already in progress.

Sir Henry Willoughby

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he had heard the answer of the noble Lord with very great satisfaction, and he hoped the Admiralty would continue to bear the matter in mind.

COLONEL SYKES said he wished to call attention to the expense of gas used in the various dockyards. There was an item of £350 for gas at Deptford, another of £842 for gas at Woolwich, £900 for Chatham, £600 for Sheerness, and £1,000 for Portsmouth. Now, when the sum charged for gas in one yard amounted to £1,000 a year, it became a question whether it might not be more economical to manufacture it. He was led to put this question, as a sum was now to be taken for gasworks at Deptford.

MR. WHITBREAD said, they had manufactured gas for themselves at Pembroke at a cost of 2s. 7d. per 1,000 feet; but when they could get pure gas from a company at 3s., they did not think it advisable to incur the expense of gasworks. The rate at Deptford, however, was high, and in this Vote there was an item of £300 for gasworks there. With regard to Portsmouth, the question was under consideration. They wanted, further, to see how they got on at Deptford and Pembroke before embarking in larger works.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH commented upon the enormous sums placed upon the Estimates, comprising all sorts of matters, without the necessary information as to what items they belonged. He also complained that with regard to Keyham, and also to Woolwich, large Votes were taken for the purchase of land, and cost of erection of buildings, without distinguishing the cost of the land from the cost of the buildings. He asked whether there was any objection on the part of the Admiralty to give a return specifying all the land purchased in connection with the dockyards, with the quantities and the prices paid, and extending back some two years.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the land alluded to in the Votes had been, generally, long since purchased; but all the details of the great works were kept on the Votes year after year until the whole were completed. The only new item was that of £6,000 for the purchase of the Quadrangle at Keyham. At Woolwich there was an item of £10,250 for the final completion of the infirmary. That building had cost a good deal more than the original Estimate, but this Vote would make it ready for the reception of patients.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, the noble Lord had not as yet touched upon an old and long-standing question in respect to Keyham—namely, the purchase of what was called the St. Aubyn's Estate adjoining. He wished to know whether any decision upon this point had as yet been come to. There was an item of £25,000 for additional barrack accommodation at Plymouth, which required explanation. The Supplementary Estimate for the purchase of an estate and for the further extension of this barrack accommodation involved an expenditure of £51,000.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, with regard to St. Aubyn's Estate, the Admiralty had made over and over again an offer for the purchase of it, but it was refused, and they had no intention at present to purchase any land in that quarter. The Marine Barracks at Plymouth were in a very unsatisfactory condition, and their enlargement was absolutely necessary for the accommodation of a force which had greatly increased. The adjoining premises were therefore to be purchased.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: How many additional men will they accommodate?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: We have only purchased the land. We have not yet got plans.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, the outlay now going on at the Bermudas, which figured in the Estimates at £150,000, called for a searching inquiry on the part of the Government, with a view to the removal of abuses.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, that £96,000 had already been voted for the Bermudas, where the dockyard works were begun as far back as 1812 or 1813. Was it possible that this expenditure had been going on ever since then? Stabling for twenty horses had been provided for the superintendent of an island much too small to afford exercising ground for such a stud.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that works had been in progress at the Bermudas for a great number of years; but the present Estimate related to works that had been going on only for seven or eight. A storehouse was being built, the accommodation in the dockyard increased, and an additional house outside it erected.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER inquired whether the Government had any intention of carrying out the plan for concentrating all the Admiralty departments at Whitehall.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET admitted that it would be desirable to bring all the departments connected with the navy under one roof, but to do so would involve much expense, and he was not aware of any intention at present to propose an Estimate for that purpose.

MR. CHILDEERS said, he wished to refer to the Vote for Gibraltar, where he found it stated that in consequence of the insufficient supply of convict labour recourse had necessarily been had to hired labour. He would suggest to the Government whether, instead of sending convicts to Western Australia, they should not send them to Gibraltar, where they could be made useful. He also wished for some explanation respecting a Vote for the Corodino tank at Malta. The Vote was £12,737, and an additional sum of £5,605, which appeared to be a larger sum than ought to be required. Another Vote of £2,000 for a coal wharf at Trincomalee also needed explanation, as he could not see why that outlay should be made just now.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET explained that at Gibraltar the army works were extending, and the first demand upon convict labour belonged to them. The Admiralty were, therefore, obliged to have recourse to hired labour. He did not know whether those works would go on increasing, but, if they did not, there was plenty of work for convicts at Gibraltar, such as lengthening the mole and other works. The outlay for the tank at Malta was large, but excavations in that island were always expensive and uncertain, owing to the porous nature of the rock. The item for a coal wharf at Trincomalee was a consequence of our warlike operations in the East, and it was obviously necessary for us to provide a depôt for coals for the use of our steamers in those seas.

MR. J. L. RICARDO said, he observed a sum of money put down for increased barrack accommodation. He had that day been studying a document which had just been laid before Parliament, the contents of which had made his hair stand on end, both at the danger we were in if an invasion took place, and at the enormous expense—some £12,000,000—which would be necessary to make us safe. The Commissioners upon National Defences, among other things, recommended fortifications of the dockyards, which included large barrack accommodation. He therefore thought it would be as well to defer the present Vote, as all money now applied would be thrown away if the recommendations of the Commissioners should be adopted.

MR. CHILDERS said, he would ask the noble Lord, after the satisfactory answer he had given to his former question, whether the Admiralty would undertake to bring the question before the Government of the removal of the convict establishment in Western Australia to Gibraltar, in consequence of the scarcity of convict labour at the latter place.

MR. LYGON said, he would draw attention to the item of £25,000 for building cottages for the Coastguard. He observed that a Return recently made showed that each cottage cost £220, which he thought was more than should be the cost of buildings of that nature.

MR. WHITBREAD said, with reference to the question concerning Gibraltar, if there should be more works at that place than the present supply of convicts could perform, probably the Board of Admiralty would communicate with another department on the subject. With respect to cottages for the Coastguard, he admitted the cost was large, but it must be remembered that they had to be built in a most substantial manner in places often remote from towns and difficult of access. The plan, however, had recently been slightly altered, and the last tenders sent in were at a lower price than formerly.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that his impression, when he was at the head of the Admiralty, was that the expenditure for the Coastguard cottages was rather large. He was, therefore, glad to hear from the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Whitbread) that the Board would do all in their power to keep it down. The marginal observation in the Estimates respecting the Admiralty having been unable to obtain a sufficiency of convict labour at Gibraltar raised this very important question—were the finances of this country to be subjected to those expenses for hired labour when we were incurring such an enormous expenditure per head for sending out convicts to Western Australia? If the demand for convict labour still continued at Gibraltar it was high time for the Admiralty to communicate with the Home Office, and he therefore hoped that the noble and gallant Lord would give the subject his serious attention.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that undoubtedly, if the large works now going on at Gibraltar were to continue, it would be the duty of the Government seriously to consider the question of securing more convict labour; but that would be attended with considerable expense in the way of providing additional convict accommodation. The subject was, however, a very important one, and should receive due attention. Indeed, his hon. Friend (Mr. Whitbread) had asked Admiral Martin to make inquiries into the matter when he arrived at Gibraltar. In his own opinion the work was only of a temporary character.

MR. J. L. RICARDO asked whether the expenditure upon barracks proposed by the Admiralty would be independent of the expenditure on fortifications recommended by the Commissioners on the National Defences. He wished to know also whether a supplementary Estimate would be brought forward in the present year founded on the Report of this Commission.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET could not hold out any hope that the recommendations of the Commissioners would bring about any reduction in the present Estimates with respect to barracks. As to the other question, he was not prepared to answer it. The Secretary for War would make his own statement on the subject.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER asked what was the largest ship that could get into Sheerness basin at all times of the tide, and whether it was necessary to remove her guns and stores before going in. He wished to know, also, whether the Admiralty expected to deepen the passage into Portsmouth harbour so that a three-decker could sail in and out with her guns on board. At present, if an enemy were at Spithead and our ships inside the harbour, they could not get out to drive the enemy away. That was not a state of things which ought to continue. Would the noble Lord inform him to what extent the Mole of Gibraltar had been lengthened, and how many ships could lie within the Mole protected from the gales which prevailed there?

Mr. J. L. Ricardo

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, it was intended to carry out the Mole at Gibraltar 200 feet beyond the 1,000 feet originally intended. It would, therefore, be 1,200 feet longer, and he believed about 400 feet were still unfinished. With regard to Portsmouth Harbour, he feared he could give no positive assurance that such a depth would ever be attained as would enable a three-decker to sail out at all times of the tide. Dredging was being carried on, but he was sorry to say that shingle of the same nature as that on the top of the Spit had found its way again into the Channel, thereby showing that continual dredging would be necessary. The great dredging works now going on at Spithead were expected to be completed this autumn. The gallant Admiral had asked whether the basin at Sheerness would admit a very heavy ship. It would not, for it was impossible to make it deep enough for that.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER observed that in case of war Sheerness would be a very important place, and perhaps the noble Lord would ascertain whether it would be possible to deepen the basin sufficiently.

COLONEL SYKES said, that as the unhappy Chinese war was about to begin temporary provision must be made in the shape of coal stores in the Eastern seas, but the sheds and stores mentioned in the Estimates appeared to be intended for a permanent purpose. He wished to know whether the Estimates of these items were made on the authority of competent judges, so that the noble Lord could rely on the necessity of expending such amounts.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT inquired what was the breadth of the Mole at Gibraltar.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he could not state exactly, but he knew it had a good broad platform with a high parapet, and was a very convenient mole. With regard to the coalsheds and stores, the Estimates went through a process of weeding very considerable in the aggregate, and there was scarcely one which was not cut down before it was submitted to the House. It was economy to keep up good stores of coals, because in the Indian and Chinese seas coals must always be in use, and it was idle to suppose that they would not be required every year.

Vote agreed to; as was also

(3.) £73,000 (Medicines, Medical Stores).

(4.) £92,750 (Naval Miscellaneous Services).

MR. W. WILLIAMS complained that a variety of divers matters were put together, so that it was impossible to know whether the charges were right or wrong.

MR. LYGON said, the sailors' homes and other similar institutions had been of the greatest benefit to the men employed in the service, and therefore he hoped that in future years a larger sum would be placed in the Estimates than at present. £1,600 was all that was now devoted for these purposes.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT asked how it was that there was such a large increase in the sum required for passage money. In 1859-60 £12,000 was voted; and for 1860-61 £30,000 was required.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said the increase was in consequence of the passages out to China of the military officers and others.

COLONEL SYKES said, he could not but express his regret at finding certain sums set down under the name of rewards "for the destruction of pirates." It was desirable that the rewards given to officers and seamen on account of their bravery should be stated under some other description, rather than be described as bestowed for the destruction of human life. There was an item of £7,773 for "compensation for damage done by Her Majesty's ships," and he wanted to know how it was that they committed this damage.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, with regard to the item mentioned as destruction of pirates, in former years it was called head money. In estimating the sum to be awarded, the Admiralty took into consideration the amount of the service, and the number of lives lost among their own men, and the strength of the enemy, and after the Admiralty had made an estimate it was submitted to the Treasury, and was again gone into. The terms employed might seem a little harsh, but the sums voted were rewards rather for the destruction of vessels than the destruction of human lives. With regard to the damages for collisions, the hon. and gallant Member knew that when the Admiralty went before a jury they were sure to give a verdict against the Admiralty. If any misfortune arose, it was by far the cheaper way to compensate the owners than to go to law. There was recently great damage done to the Hastings, and for which the Admiralty ought to claim compensation, but they felt that they would not be able to get a jury to give them anything.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he wished to ask the noble Lord whether it was the intention of the Admiralty to recommend any change in the rule in reference to the granting of gratuities and pensions for wounds so as to assimilate the rule to the one in force for the army. The manner in which compensation was assessed to officers wounded in the navy was most unjust. It was a rule not to grant compensation unless the wound was equal to the loss of a limb. Now it was impossible for parents, or persons going into the navy, to know what the rule was. The sum now asked for gratuities and compensation was ridiculously small, being only £2,000. Again, no provision was made for ruptured men. They were discharged from the service, and, as they could not get employment, they had to go into the union workhouses. How could the Admiralty expect to obtain men for the navy when they were thus treated.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he could give no distinct promise on the subject; but he would bring the matter under the consideration of the Lords of the Admiralty, and he was sure that they would be ready to give the navy a fair share of any advantages which might result to the army from any modification of the Royal warrant with respect to pensions and gratuities.

MR. LINDSAY said, that he wished for an explanation on two or three points. There was an item of £2,340 damages for the rejection of 541 tierces of salt pork at Deptford. That sum was more than the value of the pork. Then there was an item of £7,638 by loss on exchange in sending money to India. Surely there ought to be no loss, seeing that several great banking establishments were sustained upon the profits they made in transmitting money to India. There was, further, a sum set down of £2,400 paid to the Bank of England for the transmission of money to our out-ports. At what rate was the Bank of England paid for such services?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, with regard to the last question the Admiralty paid 2s. per cent on money transmitted by the Bank of England to all the dockyards, except Pembroke, and in that case they paid 4s. per cent. He was not aware that any other bank would do it cheaper. He thought it was a fair charge, and they could not expect the Bank to do the work for nothing. The loss of £7,638 upon remittances to India was sustained in the year 1858-59, and it arose in consequence of the Admiralty having done an act of justice to those officers who were on distant stations. Formerly, officers had to draw bills at their stations, and get them discounted, which caused a great loss, and was much felt by the poorer officers. The Government had fixed a price for the rupee, and if the exchange was favourable to them they made a profit; if not, there was a loss, as in the present instance. As to the first question, he could not answer it, as the case occurred before he was in office. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir John Pakington) would explain the matter.

Vote agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £891,262 be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of Half-Pay, Reserved Half-Pay, and Retirement to Officers of the Navy and Royal Marines, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1861."

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: I think, Sir, this Vote is one on which the Committee may fairly require some information. It will be recollected that last year the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) in a very eloquent speech in favour of the officers of the navy, adverted to the extreme difficulty which the Admiralty experienced in giving due promotion and encouragement to our zealous officers, in order that they might feel that justice was done to them in the service. The right hon. Baronet went into the details, which much interested the House, and he showed what is perfectly true, that at present promotion in the navy is almost at a standstill. It is absolutely sad to think of the small number of promotions we have been able to give during the past year, particularly promotions of commanders to be captains, and of lieutenants to be commanders. Prior to the last war there was a vast number of officers who in peace were unemployed; there was no opportunity of employing them, and a great many were put upon the retired and reserved lists. The result is that our system of half-pay for the navy is in a complicated and most unsatisfactory condition. It would be well if some comprehensive scheme could be framed which would enable you to provide for officers who have served their country faithfully, to encourage young officers to remain in the service, and to hold out to all a fair hope of promotion. Unfortunately, however, this is impossible.

Sir Charles Napier

I am prepared to show that no scheme, however comprehensive, which you could frame would ever be permanent in the navy. The navy is liable to such great fluctuations that you cannot deal with it as you can, for example, with the Civil Service, where you have a fixed body of gentlemen serving you, and where there is a known and certain amount of promotion. If to-morrow we could get rid of those alarms which are excited by the state of Europe, we know well that the first proceeding on the part of the House of Commons would be greatly to reduce our fleet. The result of that would be to throw a vast number of young officers out of employment, and those officers would necessarily cease to advance on the navy list, for if you cannot give employment to your officers it is quite impossible you can promote them. Suppose, on the other hand, a great war were unfortunately to break out. There would then be a great increase in the navy, and you would have, so far from anything like a reduction, to draw largely from the merchant service. It will thus be seen that the navy is liable to such great and constant fluctuations that, however desirable it might be that you should put your lists upon a fair and proper footing, I maintain no Minister could come down to the House of Commons and submit a scheme which would do for all future years. You must deal with your navy lists according to the circumstances of the time. Where the shoe pinches there you must apply a remedy. No doubt, if one were to take a superficial view of the subject, one might come to the conclusion that we should at once place our lists upon such a footing that what we call our effective lists should be composed solely of effective officers. The scheme which the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich drew up, and upon which he bestowed so much care, goes further in that direction than the one which I have now the honour to submit to the Committee, but there are many defects in his plan which doubtless I shall have to point out in the course of this debate. I think, that one of the principal objections to his scheme is, that it is very expensive, and that it could not be permanent. If the right hon. Gentleman could show that his scheme was equally applicable to a time of peace and a time of war—because that is the important point—no doubt he would prove it to possess at least one great advantage; but inasmuch as it is very expensive, and does not offer that advantage, I think it ought not to be adopted. There is another reason why I should be sorry to see it carried into effect. It would hurt the feelings, I might almost say break the hearts, of many old and valuable officers who served their country during those wars in which it gained its greatest glory. I allude, of course, to the proposal of the right hon. Baronet that admirals who are above a certain age should be placed on a retired list.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: On a supplementary list.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: They are not to remain on the active list.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Yes, they are.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: Well, at all events, the old admirals are dealt with in the scheme. I maintain that there is no necessity for doing so. If, indeed, it were necessary by some means or other that you should increase your list of admirals in order to bring in younger men some change might fairly be adopted; but the present system gives you plenty of young admirals. There is no lack of such admirals now; many old officers will, no doubt, shortly follow their forefathers, and among those who are coming up there are plenty young and active enough to discharge satisfactorily all the duties of flag officers. I say, therefore, there is no necessity for dealing with the admirals at all. Where does the shoe pinch in the navy? The evil is that we have no means of promoting lieutenants to be commanders, and commanders to be captains. During the time the present Government have been in office, notwithstanding the vast number of officers who are now employed, and who have been employed for some years past, the First Lord has been able to promote only three commanders to be captains. One has been promoted in consequence of a death vacancy, and three have been promoted by the Board for distinguished services, making a total of seven commanders who have been promoted to captains during the past year. During the same period the First Lord has promoted four lieutenants to be commanders, three have been promoted in consequence of death vacancies, and two more in consequence of haul-down vacancies of admirals. In addition there were seven Board promotions, making a total of sixteen lieutenants who have been made commanders. Considering the vast body of officers in the service, it is obvious that under the present system the prospect of advancement which is presented to them is of a very melancholy and unsatisfactory character. In order to remedy as far as possible this state of things, we propose to lighten the lists of captains, commanders, and lieutenants by the retirement of certain officers, in order to make way for the promotion of others. The principle we propose to adopt is by no means a new one in the service—it is that of compulsory retirement. The term, I admit, is an ugly one. It is always painful to compel men to go on a retired list, and I should have been very glad if it could have been avoided. In dealing with these retired lists, however, nothing but compulsory retirement would effect the object we have in view.

The various features of our proposal will be found set forth in a printed document which has, I believe, been issued to-day, and is in the hands of hon. Members. First, then, as to captains, the arrangement we propose is as follows:—

“All captains who have attained, or shall hereafter attain, the age of sixty, without having served in their present rank, to be placed on a Retired list, and receive pay as follows:—If on 10*s.* 6*d.* half-pay list, when retired, 18*s.* per diem; if on 12*s.* 6*d.*, 20*s.*; if on 14*s.* 6*d.*, 20*s.*; such officers to assume the rank and title of rear admiral at the time they would have obtained their flag by seniority had they remained on the active list.”

These officers, recollect, have never served at all in their present rank. It will be observed, however, that there is one class of the above on whom it would be unfair to impose this arrangement,—those officers, I mean, who are on the 14*s.* 6*d.* half-pay list, and may therefore be regarded as on the high road to their flag. That class of officers will not be affected by this proposal, unless by their own desire. It would be unfair to touch them because as rear admirals they would be entitled to 25*s.* a day. We propose to deal with commanders in much the same way as with captains. All commanders of the age of sixty are to be placed on a retired list, with the rank of retired captain, and to receive half-pay according to their length of sea service, on the scale which is shown in the same document. We desire, you will observe, to adopt the principle that half-pay shall increase according to the length of service. That is a totally new, and I think beneficial, feature in the half-pay system of the navy. At present each rank receives half-pay altogether irrespective of service. The officer who lives on shore at ease is paid at the same rate as the one who has been engaged in active service afloat or abroad for years and years. The general principle we seek to introduce will, I think, meet with general approval, and will confer a great boon on the service. All commanders on the active list who have not been employed either afloat, in the Coastguard, or as mail or transport agents, within a period of fifteen years, are to be placed on a retired list, and to receive retired pay according to their amount of sea service, on the same scale as other commanders, such officers being permitted to assume the rank of retired captain on reaching the age of sixty, but without further addition to their retired pay afterwards. The scale of pay will be as follows:—Pay per diem.—Under nine years' service, half-pay they may be receiving at the time when retired; above nine years' and less than twelve years' service, 10*s.* 6*d.*; above twelve years' and less than fifteen years' service, 12*s.* 6*d.*; above fifteen years' and less than twenty years' service, 14*s.* 6*d.*; above twenty years' service, 16*s.* 6*d.* Officers after twenty years' service in these ranks, or who are physically incapable of service, are to be eligible for this retirement, with the rank of retired captain, irrespective of age, at the discretion of the Board of Admiralty. Time served in command of Revenue vessels will count as sea time. Time served in the Coastguard on shore, or in Transport service on shore, will count as sea time in the scale of retired pay in the proportion of three years in the Coastguard or Transport Service, as one of sea service; while time service as mail or transport agents afloat will count for the purpose as sea time for the first three years, and after that in the proportion of three years' agents' time as two of sea service. Lieutenants are to retire, the same way as commanders, when they attain the age of sixty, with the rank of retired commander, and to receive pay according to their sea service, on the following scale:—Pay per diem.—Under six years' service, half-pay they may be receiving at the time when retired; above six years' and not less than nine years' service, 7*s.*; above nine years' and not less than twelve years' service, 8*s.* 6*d.*; above twelve years' and not less than fifteen years' service, 10*s.*; above fifteen years', 11*s.* 6*d.*; officers after twenty years' service in this rank, or who are physically incapable of service, to be eligible for retirement. We propose that no further additions shall be made from the active list to the present retired list for commanders and lieutenants. Provision is also made in our scheme for an improvement in the half-pay of lieutenants on the active list. Of commanders we have, unfortunately, always too many seeking for service, but there is a difficulty in regard to lieutenants on the active list. They are constantly on duty, and render, I need hardly say, very valuable service to the country. After a great number of years' service, however, many of them find they have no prospect of promotion, and when they go on shore they return to the same half-pay as those who have not served at all. We propose that an encouragement should be held out to lieutenants to serve in the shape of an increase of half-pay, according to their increase of service, and we trust that that will induce them to be anxious for employment. The effect of the proposal, should it be adopted by the House, will be at once to remove eight captains, sixty-four commanders, and 179 lieutenants from the active list, and to give us the opportunity of bestowing immediate promotion on a number of officers, which will be a great boon to the service. Those lists which are now overburdened by the numbers established by orders in Council will be reduced to their established number, so that we shall be released from the unfortunate and heartbreaking necessity of promoting only one in three. Our proposal will leave vacancies for the immediate promotion, should it be deemed desirable, of three commanders to the rank of captain, and eighteen lieutenants to the rank of commanders, and what is far more important for the future efficiency of the service, will hereafter admit of a promotion for every vacancy. These are the details of the scheme which I have very imperfectly put before the Committee. I do not see the right hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth (Sir Francis Baring) in his place, but I wish to introduce a few observations to him and to those who advocate the cause of officers on the reserved list. The Admiralty have considered very fully the claims of those officers. We cannot admit them to be the same as the claims of officers on the active list, inasmuch as they never, in all human probability, can be called on for active service. Although no doubt the right hon. Member for Portsmouth, when, as First Lord, he drew up the scheme of retirement, never did intend that those officers should rise in the list, nevertheless, it as was not perhaps fairly put before them that they would never rise on the list, pari passu with the active officers, it has been a great grievance. They say that they accepted the offer which was made to them with the distinct understanding that they would rise as on the active list. There is no document to show one way or the other. I find on looking over the names that there are many officers on that list of good service. The Board have therefore decided to recommend that under the system they shall be included—that is to say, that officers on the reserved list shall enjoy half-pay according to the length of service, whereby those who have served faithfully will benefit largely.

Lord Clarence Paget

There is but one subject more which I have to remark upon, the scheme of the right hon. Baronet opposite, the First Lord of the Admiralty under the late Government. His proposal, that the patronage shall be solely in the hands of the First Lord, the Board do not concur in. They think the present system of Board promotions most invaluable to the service, and invaluable for this reason, that they are the only promotions which are not governed by the numbers already on the list. If an officer has gone through such distinguished service that it is a matter of justice he should be promoted, there is a Board meeting, and, on all the Members concurring in the view of its propriety, the Board have the power to make the promotion, even though the numbers be above the scale fixed by the Order in Council. I should be very loth and very sorry to see that done away, [An hon. MEMBER: So would the service,]—because it is most important that officers should feel that if they distinguished themselves by signal service, and particularly in action before an enemy, the Board have power to promote them, even though the numbers are completed. I will read a list of the officers promoted last year by the Board, which I hope will induce the right hon. Baronet to entirely agree with me that these Board promotions ought not to be abolished. There is Captain Turnour, promoted for services in the Naval Brigade in India. This officer was at Delhi and throughout the terrible scenes of the Indian war. Would the right hon. Baronet say that, if the list were complete, such an officer ought not to be promoted? There is Captain Viscount Gilford, for services and severe wounds in China. He had his arms shattered and bullets through his body, and I believe went through tortures in consequence. He was three or four times under fire. Then there is Captain Grandy. That is an annual promotion given to the Coastguard, and a very proper promotion, too. Of commanders there is Commander T. Jones, senior Lieutenant of his ship in Japan, and in action in China. There is another Commander Jones—no relation—Commander W. H. Jones, for service before Nankin. He also navigated the Yang-tse-Kiang, and was at the Peiho action. There is Commander Anderson, for service in the Royal yacht. That is an annual promotion, and I do not believe any one will object to it. There is Commander Hobson, for Arctic discoveries under Captain M'Clintock. There is Commander Balfour, as senior Lieutenant in command of the gunboats in the Peiho. There is Commander Winthrop, an annual promotion in the Coastguard. I am sure the Committee will agree, after hearing that list, that these promotions are most valuable to the service. I believe that I have now dealt with every point, and all I can say is that I shall be happy to answer any questions which may be put to me.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: It is impossible to overrate the importance to the naval service, and, therefore, the importance to the public interest, of the subject which the noble Lord has now submitted to our consideration. As it is one to which it was my duty to give considerable attention during the time that I had the honour to be connected with the Admiralty, I am sure the Committee will indulge me while I address to them not only some observations upon what has fallen from my noble Friend, but upon the more general subject of the condition of the various classes of officers of the Royal Navy. I can take no exception whatever to the frank and fair tone in which my noble Friend has now addressed, as he always does address us. But I am sorry to say that I heard the statement with very great disappointment, and I am bound to say that I think the plan which he has now submitted does not bear out or correspond with the observations with which my noble Friend commenced his speech. My noble Friend commenced by stating most fairly and truly that the present state of the navy with regard to promotions, is as unsatisfactory as possible. The expression of my noble Friend was that promotion is at a standstill, and he then proceeded to give a proof of the accuracy of his statement by mentioning the number of promotions which the present Board have been able to make in the past year, from the rank of commander to that of captain, and from the rank of lieutenant to that of commander. I am sorry to say that in consequence of being out of town I did not see the printed plan until my noble Friend was kind enough to hand it to me, and I was not aware until to-day that the subject was to be brought before the House. In the few observations, therefore, which I shall make I shall have to speak principally from memory, and I cannot recollect accurately how many promotions of these two classes the late Board of Admiralty were able to make. But I think I am right when I state that the number of promotions at my disposal during the year that I held office was even less than that mentioned to us to-night. My noble Friend adverted to the unsatisfactory state of the lists of retired officers and reserved officers until the navy has become a mass of confusion; but he did not go on to state, as he might, that the real cause of all this confusion and complication is that successive Boards of Admiralty have from time to time been content to adopt mere stopgaps to meet the emergency of the moment, and have never had the courage to deal with the subject upon broad and permanent principles. I am convinced that the navy never will be satisfied, and never ought to be satisfied, until this miserable hand-to-mouth system is abandoned. My noble Friend tells us that, owing to great fluctuations in the navy, by which I presume he means the alternations of periods of war and peace, a permanent system of retirement is impossible; but in the same breath—almost in the same sentence—my noble Friend tells us that a comprehensive system is desirable. Now, in my opinion, a comprehensive system ought to be a permanent system, and I dispute altogether the dictum of my noble Friend that a permanent system is impossible. I admit that a period of war may require a mode differing from that which is required in a period of peace, but I do not for a moment admit that that is any reason why a permanent system is impossible. The duration of periods of peace is usually much longer than that of periods of war, and it is the duty of this House and of the Admiralty, in addressing themselves to this important subject, to make the nearest approach they can to a permanent system which shall meet the requirements of the Royal Navy during an average of years.

Lord Clarence Paget

My noble Friend says that my scheme was expensive and not permanent, but I must beg leave to differ from him. The scheme which I ventured to propose was in its nature permanent, that is to say, it was self-acting, and not like that of my noble Friend's, only meant to meet the pressing emergency of the moment. One objection mentioned by my noble Friend has frequently been adverted to before, and I heard his observations cheered from some quarters of the House. I allude to the effect which he said it would have on the feelings of flag officers. This is a very difficult and delicate part of the question. I have stated before, and I state again, that no man would shrink more anxiously than I should from inflicting pain on those most distinguished men—one of whom I see before me (Sir Charles Napier); but, on the other hand, let me say as broadly, that we must deal with this matter for the public interest, and for the general interest of the naval service. Provided we do not inflict any hardship on the gallant Admirals at the head of the list, of which they would have fair reason to complain, I do not think they ought to allow their feelings unnecessarily to stand in the way of an improvement which may be for the good of the service and the welfare of their brother officers. In dealing with this complicated question I feel it is an advantage to have one of the Admirals who would be affected by the scheme, here in his place in this House, ready to state their case if I at all misstate it. My noble Friend—unintentionally of course—did not accurately describe the manner in which I proposed to deal with these Admirals. He first said that I proposed to put them on a retired list; and when I corrected him, he changed the phrase, and said I meant to put them on a supernumerary list. There may be something at the head of the paper containing my plan which might appear as though there was to be a supernumerary list; but my noble Friend will find it is not so if he looks to the end of the revised plan. At page 35, I proposed as follows:—

“1. Active Flag List, to be divided into two lists, to be called First and Second Flag Lists. First List to consist of all flag officers on the active list who have completed 70 years of age; second list to consist of 15 admirals, 24 vice-admirals, and 36 rear-admirals. 2. As officers on second list complete 70 years they are to be transferred to first list, and each vacancy so created to be filled by promotion from active list of captains. 3. Officers on first list to be as eligible for all honours and all employments as they are now, the principle and object of the proposed arrangement being solely that officers who have completed 70 years should no longer impede promotion; and that there should be flag officers of each rank of an age at which they are likely to be effective.”

My noble Friend will admit, therefore, that I proposed neither a retired list nor a supernumerary list. I did not propose to remove those distinguished men from the active list; but I said, as distinctly as words could say, that they should be as open to all honours and employments as now. All I proposed to call on them to do was one thing—that when they arrived at three-score years and ten they should admit the fact, and when they had passed that age that they should no longer check the promotion of their junior officers. I appeal to truth and common sense whether there is anything in this of which they have a right to complain, which treats them with disrespect, which disregards their services, or to which, considering the general interests of the service, they ought to take the slightest exception? Looking to the extreme difficulty of the question and the necessity of maintaining promotion, I cannot imagine that they should not acknowledge the fairness of no longer continuing to impede promotion when they have arrived at that age. My noble Friend proposes, and rightly proposes, as I think, compulsory retirement. I quite accept the explanation he gave; and after the plan which I proposed it is almost unnecessary to say that, however painful it may be in exceptional cases, I agree with him that we cannot deal with the subject without adopting the principle of compulsory retirement; but I say distinctly that you will have no satisfaction in the Navy—you will not deal as you ought with this most important subject—unless you deal with all ranks.

I now come to the explanation given by my noble Friend of the plan he proposes. He proposes a system of compulsory retirement, and so far he is right; but I believe there can be no satisfactory arrangement unless you deal with all ranks alike. You must adopt fair and sound principles, and when you have adopted them you must apply them to the admirals as well as to the lowest officers in the Navy. There should be no suspicion of favouritism, no ground for complaint of dealing with officers of different ranks in a different way; if there is, public opinion will not support you, and the opinion of the naval service will not support you. I object to the plan of my noble Friend, because it is insufficient, because it does not meet the evil, because it will create objections in the navy not of a fanciful character, not arguing from matters of feeling merely, and because it deals differently with different ranks, and applies one rule to one rank and another rule to another. I object to your not applying your rule to admirals, because I am convinced that you will therefore be doing injustice to the captains. Your first rule with regard to captains is that at 60 years of age all captains are to retire who have not served at all as captains. To commanders you apply a totally different rule. You say that all are to retire who are now 60, and all hereafter are to retire as they become 60. There is no limit applied to them as to whether they have served as commanders or not. That is unfair, and it originates in the timidity of the Admiralty in not having dealt with the question in a bolder spirit. By not dealing with flag officers you act unfairly to the captains. Officers will arrive at 60 who ought to become flag officers, and who would become flag officers if the plan were applied justly to all ranks, and they will have to retire because the admirals are not got out of the way by seniority as they advance in years. This inequality will apply most unfairly, for the same reason, to commanders. I am very glad that the Admiralty have so far followed the plan which I prepared as to have adopted the principle of compulsory retirement at a certain age, but they ought to have applied it more equally and more boldly. If you had applied the principle of retirement at 60 to all captains, then you would have given a fair chance of promotion to all commanders; but you apply that principle to only a small fraction of the captains, those who have never served as captains. The retirement on the captains' list will therefore be much slower than on the commanders', and it will stop the commanders' promotion.

I will now advert to another part of the noble Lord's speech, and with more pleasure, because I can speak of it in different language. I agree with what the noble Lord proposes to do in regard to increased half-pay according to service, and also in regard to allowing the half-pay of active lieutenants to be increased in the same way. I think that is quite right. I think also it would be a fair matter for consideration whether the time served as mate should not be allowed to count. You will do very great injustice if, in computing their time, you exclude the whole period during which they served in the rank of mates. I do not say that in every instance the whole of that time should be allowed, but I repeat, you will do great injustice if you do not allow some part of it to that considerable number of junior lieutenants who have served a long time in that grade. I therefore hope the noble Lord will take this matter into consideration.

I will now allude to the subject of Board promotion, and I am obliged to tell my noble Friend that I have not changed my mind on that subject. Speaking as I do, with only brief experience at the Admiralty, I do not presume to speak of the soundness of my own judgment, but I deem it my duty to state frankly and openly the conclusion at which I have arrived,—that, on the whole, the system of Board promotions does not work well for the public service. I will read to the Committee an extract from a memorandum I added to my scheme of retirement just before I quitted office. It was in these words:—

“As I am going out of office, and can no longer be open to the suspicion of wishing to increase my own patronage, I must say that I still think it would be for the advantage of the public service to do away with Board promotions. I do not mean, in expressing this opinion, to imply the slightest suspicion of, or reflection upon, the gentlemen who now, or at any other time, constitute the Board of Admiralty. I only mean that I think such patronage ought to be exercised under the strongest possible responsibility; and I have no faith in aggregate bodies ever acting under that sense of responsibility which is felt by individuals. If Board promotions are retained, they should not be allowed to swell the lists, and should only be made in anticipation of vacancies.”

If hon. Members who take an interest in this question will refer to the earlier pages of this memorandum they will find statements bearing on the change when Board promotions were first introduced. The practical result has been that the aggregate amount of promotions has greatly increased. I adhere to the opinion I then expressed—that whoever may constitute these Boards there is not the same sense of responsibility in the aggregate body that there is in the individual Minister, open to question and censure in this House. Therefore, although I express my opinion with the respect due to gentlemen of professional experience, I do, on the broad public principle just stated, adhere to my opinion that it is for the interest of the public service to concentrate responsibility in all matters of promotion and do away with it as regards all aggregate bodies. I may be told of the distressing case of Lord Gilford, who was wounded in China, and other officers who stand in the same position. I say no doubt they are entitled to every consideration, but in one of the very votes passed to-night you find the name of Viscount Gilford most properly selected for a very handsome pension. Therefore, I would rather refer to that case as supporting my view of the subject. You have rewarded him by a pension. It may be right to give him reward by pension and promotion, too. I cannot say how that may be; but you must remember that you cannot promote him without keeping back some other officer who ought to be promoted.

Sir John Pakington

There is another branch of this subject to which the noble Lord did not allude; he did not give his opinion upon the question of haul-down promotion. In this memorandum I have condemned such promotion; and I adhere to that view. I say haul-down promotions do not benefit the public service; and they create very sore feeling. It is all a matter of chance, luck, or favour who may obtain these haul-down promotions. ["Hear!"] I am glad that observation is cheered by a gallant Admiral opposite who is so competent a judge; for he is just one of those distinguished men who are likely to benefit by the continuance of that system.

I am not aware that I need detain the Committee by longer observations upon the statement the noble Lord has made; but I would beg leave before sitting down to ask the attention of the Admiralty and the Committee to some other points connected with the present position of the different classes of officers in the navy. I am sorry to say my belief is that there is scarcely one rank of officers in the Royal Navy which is not at present dissatisfied more or less with their position. [Sir CHARLES NAPIER: Hear!] I do not know what is the meaning of the gallant Admiral's cheer. If he means that the different classes of naval officers who complain of their position do so without reason, I will say no man is less disposed than I am to yield to any unreasonable claim; but, on the other hand, I think the gallant Admiral will agree with me that it is one of the greatest possible misfortunes in our naval service to have large classes of men aggrieved by well-founded complaints. The question is whether the complaints they make are well-founded or not. The first class to which I allude are the captains of the Royal Navy who are not contented with their present position, and I submit to the House, I submit to the Admiralty, I submit to the gallant Admiral, that, knowing what we do of what was passing lately in the fleet, knowing the unfortunate dangers which have existed and to which I hope the attention of the Admiralty has been gravely directed, this is not a moment when your officers ought to be dissatisfied. Have the captains in the Royal Navy any grounds of complaint or not? There are several respects in which they allege they have grounds of complaint. In the important respect of pay they are not in the position in which officers of their rank and fulfilling their important duties ought to be. The noble Lord is conversant with the change which took place some few years ago as regards the pay of captains in the Royal Navy. A few years ago I believe they were paid according to the class of ship they commanded. That is no longer the case. They are now paid according to their seniority in the service. What is the result? There are three classes of pay? At the present time no less than twenty captains are commanding line-of-battle ships on the lowest class pay, and I believe it to be the fact beyond all question that captains in the Royal Navy occupy their high position at a pecuniary loss to themselves. This cannot be right. I hold in my hand a letter from an officer of great distinction—it is a private letter. I have no objection to communicate in regard to it with the noble Lord, but I trust the Committee will allow me to read an extract from it. It comes from an officer of very high reputation as a captain who happens to be a man of independent fortune and to whom a pecuniary loss in the service of the country is not of that importance it must be to others. He writes to the effect, that a captain working out his three years in a ship will find himself considerably out of pocket. In fact, he pays for his own services. The consequence is, that a great many officers of this rank are never able to take employment; and the country in the hour of need loses the services of some of her best men. The average expense attending the commissioning of a ship is estimated at about £500. The writer has commissioned four ships which cost him £1,700, and that many will say was cheaply done. Will the Committee allow me to mention one or two cases which happened to myself when I was first Lord of the Admiralty. At that time, about a year ago, we were anxious to get up as speedily as possible a Channel fleet. I sent for an officer, with whom I had no personal acquaintance whatever; I only knew him to be an officer of the highest distinction and standing in his profession. I offered him a line-of-battle ship. He requested twenty-four hours to consider. Next day he came back; thanked me for the offer, and said he should be proud to hold such a command, but that he could not afford to undertake it. I will give the House another instance of the same kind, also a captain in the navy, who happened to be a friend and connection of my own. He was an officer of high reputation, and I intended to offer him a ship. I believe he became acquainted with that intention, for he called on my private secretary, and through him sent me a request that I would not make him the offer, because he had not yet recovered from the debts he had contracted in fitting out a former ship as commander; and in consequence of these debts he could not afford to take command of a ship as captain. Now, this must be a false and erroneous state of things, and cannot be for the interest of the public service. Let the House remember the diplomatic duties captains of ships are often called upon to fulfil on foreign stations; and the hospitality they are required to extend to the officers of foreign vessels according to rules of the service which no one desires to see broken through. I am speaking in the presence of naval men, who can vouch for the truth of what I say; and I ask, can it be for the good of the service that officers should be exposed to such pecuniary loss in the discharge of their duties, that unless they are possessed of private means they cannot afford to take the command of a man-of-war? But how is it with foreign nations? Is it the case with France? Not at all. All officers in command of ships in the French navy have advantages that are not given to officers in the British service. In the first place their cabins are furnished; but a more important advantage is this—in the French navy there is regular system of table money on a scale proportionate to the rank of the officer, and, I believe, also to the class of vessel. There is also one scale of table money for the home ports, and another for foreign ports. This prevents the occurrence of instances like those I have mentioned, of officers whose services the country requires, and who ought to be afloat preserving that discipline which I am afraid is now impaired. It is most painful and distressing

Sir John Pakington

when an officer comes to the First Lord of the Admiralty and says, "I should be proud to hold a command, but it is too expensive, I cannot afford it." My noble Friend is in a position to know the fact; he is the man of all others to whom, on account of his knowledge and experience, the navy looks for some remedy for the evils complained of.

The lieutenants have also complained much of their position; but I have great hopes that the proposals of the noble Lord, especially the suggestion I took the liberty to make—that their mates' time should be counted, and the increased rate of pay, will give satisfaction. But I am sorry to say, that the masters, the paymasters, the engineers, and the naval instructors, are all making complaints, more or less well founded; they all desire to be improved in their positions. I will not go into these complaints, as I do not wish to detain the Committee longer. But I am distinctly of opinion that it will be for the good of the service and the country if these matters are looked into. Anything like ill-founded and unreasonable complaints should, of course, be disregarded and set aside, but all well-founded complaints should be fairly and justly met. It is difficult to enter into the whole of the retirement question; I do not wish to put the scheme I ventured to propose into comparison with that of the noble Lord, further than it may conduce to the public good. I do not wish to carry any comparison of the kind beyond the fairest reasonable limit; but I cannot help thinking the best course for the Admiralty and the country would be to refer the whole question to a Commission. If the Admiralty is willing to deal with it, it is no doubt competent to do so. But it is a large question; taking the operation of the retirement pay and allowances, and all the complaints made by various ranks of naval officers, this course appears to me the most desirable. I would suggest to the Government whether an inquiry into the whole question by a competent Commission might not be satisfactory to the service. As far as I can judge of the scheme of the noble Lord at the moment, I think his plan is timid and unsatisfactory, that it is not likely to give that satisfaction to the service which is so desirable. In making these observations, I trust I have said nothing of which the noble Lord can complain. I assure him I have no motive whatever but the good of the naval service. No man can hold, even for a short period, the office I had the honour to fill without admiring and taking a sincere interest in that noble service. I shall heartily thank the Admiralty for adopting any scheme that may really be for its benefit; and I shall be very glad to hear that the Government is prepared to refer the whole question to a Commission.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he begged leave to thank the right hon. Baronet for the clear manner in which he had stated the grievances of the officers of the navy. Every word he had said would be received with satisfaction by the navy at large; there was no exaggeration whatever in his statement. As to the scheme of the Government, he thought the Committee had reason to complain that it had not been laid before it in time to receive full and sufficient consideration. He did not understand how the noble Lord could hope for such great advantages from his plan. He did not wish to see the system of selection done away with, though, as it was conducted, it gave dissatisfaction rather than encouragement. They were told of the promotions of the First Lord, and the patronage of the First Lord, till the House hardly knew what was meant by it. The patronage of the navy was given to the First Lord to dispose of fairly and properly. But it was impossible to avoid making most of the promotion in the navy, independent of political influence. Every one knew it was given by influence; it was nonsense to suppose it was not. If he commanded four or five votes in the House he could go to the First Lord of the Admiralty and insist on promotion for his son. They saw that men of influence and title always got on. The chief promotions were political. He held a list in his hand which showed that the promotions from the rank of commander to that of captain had been in 1854, 34; in 1855, 32; in 1856, 32; in 1857, 23; and in 1858, 22. They could not with any arrangements make promotions sufficiently large, without constant retirements from the service, and the way in which that result should be effected ought to be whatever way was least hurtful to the feelings of officers of the navy. In 1854, no less than 52 lieutenants were made commanders; in 1855 there were 61 thus promoted; in 1856, there were 68; in 1857, 30; in 1858, 52. Now, considering that every man who entered the navy must not expect to be an admiral, any more than every clergyman ought to expect to be a bishop, he must admit, he thought, there was no lack of promotions for a time of peace. [An hon. MEMBER: And partly a time of war.] He thought the noble Lord would do well to leave these matters alone, and leave the officers as they were at present. He did not find fault with the noble Lord's desire to benefit and ameliorate the condition of the navy; but when he said he intended to benefit the captains of the navy, all he did was to add five years to the captain's age before he retired, and to take 5s. away from the captains when they were made admirals. He had not studied the plan proposed by the late First Lord, much as he respected, and he might say admired, the way in which he did his duty when he was at the Admiralty; but he did not think he was long enough at the Board of Admiralty to enter into the feelings of the old officers in the service. He would not, therefore, go into that plan, but he would suggest to the noble Duke at the head of the Admiralty the desirableness of withdrawing his plan for the present, and give the profession a fuller opportunity of considering it. It was not respectful to the Committee to place it in their hands a few hours only before it was discussed and to ask for more money, while at the same time it was proposed to inflict injury without conferring advantages on the officers in the service. He could not agree with the right hon. Member for Droitwich that it would be desirable to refer the matter to a Commission, because any such Commission would be appointed by the Admiralty themselves, and would in all probability, in reporting on the matter, do just exactly what the Admiralty bade them.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT: I did not understand that the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty intended to press for any Vote of money to meet the scheme which he has advanced, but simply to lay it before the House; and I quite agree with the hon. and gallant Admiral (Sir Charles Napier), that, with such a short notice it would be impossible to bestow upon it that amount of consideration which is due to the officers whom it so immediately concerns. I am glad that the late First Lord (Sir John Pakington) has corrected his first proposition on the subject of retirement; if, according to his second plan, the Admirals were to be entitled to hold commands and be capable of nomination to pensions and honourable distinction, in the same manner as if they had been retained on the active list instead of being removed, as the case proposed, to a substantive list, on their advance in age, the change could have afforded only a slight benefit to the service, whilst it necessarily struck a heavy blow on the hearts and feelings of the officers themselves who had been employed in the war, lasting with slight intermission, from 1784 to 1815, and been distinguished for gallantry and ability. It is peculiarly distressing to myself to refer to my own case; and if it had been possible to mention the names of other officers, I would gladly have declined the necessity. After having served as a lieutenant for upwards of six years and as a commander for seven years more, I became in 1822 a captain. It was my good fortune to perform services in the command of a frigate in 1823 which obtained the high approbation of the Admiral commanding the squadron on the station to which I was attached, and led to the recommendation of my name to the Sovereign in 1827 for the distinction of the Companionship of the Bath by his late Majesty, who then presided at the Board of Admiralty as Lord High Admiral. To this hour I have never received that honour, it has been denied to me by every successive First Lord, except Lord Ellenborough, who left at the Admiralty a Minute, that I should be promoted on the next vacancy—this was in 1846. I was entitled to it, by the fact of wearing a medal. The reason why I was not made in 1827 was that the number of Companions was then limited to one hundred. I am now told that the honour is restricted to officers whose names have been recorded in The Gazette. At the period to which I refer, 1827, actions against pirates were not entered in The Gazette; the case is now altered, and similar services have appeared in The Gazette with the names of officers raised to that distinction on their account, while I have been most cruelly refused that which they have been given. One other observation. If an officer declines to serve he is entitled to no consideration; in my case I challenge contradiction when I make the assertion that no officer in the navy, from 1824 to 1852 more earnestly, more emphatically sought employment than I did, and I had commanded a frigate in action; but I was told from time to time—firstly, that I was too low on the list of captains—secondly, in the middle—thirdly, too high for ships then about to be commissioned. The fact was I had no interest, and, therefore, I could get no employment. Every step I won through my own energy, and for thirty years I offered, year by year, myself for any description of service and for any station in the same spirit, and year by year came back the cold curt answer, enough to break my heart. In a case like this the question should be put, has the officer really endeavoured to serve? If he has not, let his name be set aside, but if he has, it is an excess of cruel injustice to punish him for his misfortune by placing him on a reserved list. Sir, I shall be pardoned for these remarks, when I remind you that my days are closing in, and the time approaches when no distinction of earth will be of value; but I could not allow the opportunity to pass of justifying the reserved Admirals, and of showing conclusively that Admiral Walcott who sat in Parliament was one who had not failed in exertion in his own profession. I could not brook any imputation to the contrary. The late First Lord had recommended that the patronage should rest with the First Lord for the time being, on the ground that he was accountable to this House for its just administration—but the real mode of employment was the following:—the First Lord would say to the Naval Lord, I intend to appoint Captain Black to such a ship, or to promote an officer, as the case might be, and without inquiry into the claims of other officers that favoured individual at once received appointment or promotion. Three only of from ten to fifteen admirals who are between the ages of fifty and sixty are in employment. Officers, while captains, do good service; but in their removal to the superior rank are rarely employed in command; the less occasion therefore for removing the more aged officers who gradually die off when promotion occurs from the captains' list. I cannot approve of the scheme of the late First Lord (Sir John Pakington) with respect to commanders. The position of lieutenants is a standing proverb of neglect. It is flagrant injustice to withhold from that grade advantages which are bestowed for medical officers, when their services are equally meritorious. By the existing regulations a surgeon may attain the rank of lieutenant colonel, while a lieutenant of twenty years remained stationary. Permit me, Sir, to offer to the House my sincere thanks for the patience with which they have listened to my remarks in general, and for their kind attention when I referred to my own position. Would that I could indulge the hope that the time was at hand when promotion and honour would depend wholly on the com-duet of officers, and not on uncertain, and capricious regulations, which lead to bitter disappointment, and when the golden rule would be adhered to, sum cuique, give to every man according to his deserts.

Admiral Walcott

SIR MICHAEL SEYMOUR observed, that in a great service like the navy nothing short of a full and efficient scheme could be of a permanent character. The scheme of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir John Pakington) met generally his approval, and he should be glad to see it carried out. He should like to see the claims of the various classes of officers settled on a right basis. That part of the right hon. Gentleman's plan which referred to the admirals had been objected to, but he was sure there was no intention to cast any reflection on the services of those officers. He would be the last man to throw any reflection on those gallant officers, but he could not see how they could be affected by removal from one list to another. If benefit was to accrue to the service from such removal, he did not think there should be so much sensitiveness as had been exhibited on this subject. He deeply sympathized with the gallant Admiral (Admiral Walcott), than whom no one stood higher in the opinion of the service, although he might perhaps justly complain of the manner in which he had been treated. The principle of selection was tried in the higher branches of the navy upwards of 100 years ago. When it first commenced we had only twenty-one admirals; but the system finally broke down under Lord Howe, who made a selection of sixteen captains, who were passed over the heads of a large number of other officers, thereby exciting the greatest possible dissatisfaction. The question raised by that debate being a very important one, he trusted it would be examined in a comprehensive manner, and one that would result in advantage to the service.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought the discussion that had taken place on the noble Lord's scheme was calculated to attract a good deal of attention. The noble Lord held that no general plan could be laid down for meeting this subject, but that means must be taken to ease the shoe where it happened to pinch at each particular moment. The opinions of the House, however, appeared to be in favour of viewing the question in a broader spirit. A non-professional mind could not help remarking that the cost to the country of the retired list was very nearly equal to the entire charge for the officers who were now in active employment. That anomalous state of things existed, too, at a time when the navy afloat had been almost doubled within the last few years. The number of men now voted was between 85,000 and 86,000, whereas eight or nine years ago it was only between 40,000 and 50,000. With such a large increase in their force it might have been supposed there would not be much difficulty in promoting officers in the lower ranks; but they were told the fact was otherwise. The noble Lord gave a curious reason for the course he was about to take. He said he was going to promote commanders and lieutenants, but there stood an order in his way declaring that there should not be above one promotion for every three vacancies. Well, the natural, as well as the simplest course, would surely be to get rid of that order. The noble Lord, however, did not do that, but meant to create the vacancies instead, giving to a number of gentlemen an increased rate of pay, without regard to whether or not they had a fair claim to it, merely with a view to clear the way for the promotion of those below them. Would it not be far better to relax the order against the promotion of officers in the lower grades? When it had been strongly stated by his right hon. Friend, and confirmed by all the naval Members who had spoken, that there were captains in such a position that they would not serve because they would serve at a loss, it was pretty obvious that the whole service, both active and retired, required to be looked into in a large and comprehensive manner. We had now pretty nearly worn out the old French war list; and yet, although the navy had lately been greatly increased, the cost to the country for the unemployed was about equal to that for the employed. Whether that was remediable or not he could not tell; but it seemed to indicate that the arrangements of the service were very far from perfect, and the evil would hardly be cured by the bit-by-bit expedients suggested by the noble Lord.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he wished to explain to the right hon. Gentleman that the crowded state of the half-pay list was not due to the present day at all, but was the result of past years. If any one looked at the lieutenant's list, comprising the young officers who had been promoted of late years—he would find that almost every lieutenant upon it, who was fit to go to sea, was now in active employment. As his worthy and gallant brother Officer had told the House, they could not kill the elderly officers. He should, indeed, be very sorry to kill them, and would prefer that they should live in honour as long as it pleased God to spare them. It was all very well, therefore, to say the list was in an unsatisfactory state, and ought to be dealt with in a comprehensive manner, instead of by mere dribbles; but it was impossible to get rid of the old admirals, old captains, old commanders, and old lieutenants. The right hon. Gentleman said that, if they dealt with the captains and commanders, it was but fair that they should deal in the same way with the admirals also. Why, it was asked, should they not carry their compulsory retirement for the junior ranks up to the admirals? Now, the admirals were in a totally distinct category. In the first place, they were necessarily officers of more distinguished service; and it became offensive to officers of their age to put them upon the retired list, unless that was absolutely unavoidable. The Admiralty did not find such a course to be necessary. They had plenty of young admirals, and they desired to have plenty of young captains and commanders likewise. When he was asked to produce a great and comprehensive scheme, he could only say that he did not think that such a scheme was proper at this time. Nor did he think the matter of sufficient magnitude to justify an inquiry by a Commission, as was asked for by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich. What he proposed was, a small boon to a certain number of officers, by which a flow of promotion, which was admitted on all hands to be desirable, would be created. Reference had been made to the hardship of not allowing mates' time to count; but if that were permitted, there could not be such short periods of service taken as at present; however, this point should receive the earnest consideration of the Admiralty. In former times officers served eight or ten years as mates, before receiving promotion; but that was not the case now, when every officer obtained promotion very soon after passing as mate. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir John Pakington) had given a touching recital of the hardships suffered by captains of line-of-battle ships from insufficient pay; and had stated that officers had refused employment, because they could not afford to command a line-of-battle ship. He (Lord Clarence Paget) felt inclined to go some way in that expression of feeling, and was willing to admit that in some cases the pay of captains of line-of-battle ships did bear hardly upon individuals. Until within a few years the pay of captains graduated according to the size of the vessels they commanded; but in the late war it became necessary to employ some of the most distinguished and senior captains in vessels of light draught of water, and there arose complaints that while one officer commanded a frigate, another, who was his junior, commanded a line-of-battle ship, and had better pay. No doubt, the costs of living attaching to the command of a line-of-battle ship were great, but it should not be forgotten that of late years the Admiralty had done much for the captains. Formerly a captain had to go to a great expense in his outfit, but now he had nothing to take on board but his portmanteau. The Admiralty furnished almost everything — plate, furniture, linen, &c. He admitted there were some cases of hardship, but this was a question of expense, and it was the duty of the Government to economise the public money as far as was consistent with justice. He hoped that his right hon. Friend would not persist in his opposition to the Vote, as a great and comprehensive scheme would be a costly affair, and one that would not be certain of proving a permanent advantage to the navy.

Lord Clarence Paget

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON observed that, while the noble Lord called this a small boon, he asked the Committee to adopt it because it was so small. Would the noble Lord say what the cost to the country would be, and whether this Vote would cover the whole expense? [Lord CLARENCE PAGET: Yes.] Then, was it to be understood that if the Vote were agreed to it would involve the sanctioning of the scheme by the House? Because, if so, that could hardly be asked of the House, seeing that the scheme itself had only been published that morning, and its reception by the Committee had not been very gratifying. Before committing themselves to this scheme, time ought to be given for the consideration of it.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he fully concurred with the right hon. Baronet, and he hoped the scheme would be withdrawn, or he should feel it his duty to divide the Committee against it.

ADMIRAL DUNCOMBE also complained of the little time allowed for consideration of the scheme. The complaints of captains of line-of-battle ships which had been stated by his right hon. Friend were well-founded, but could easily be remedied by a graduated scale of table money.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he desired to say that the change in the pay of captains was made while he was at the Admiralty. According to the old rule officers, of whatever standing, were paid according to the rate of the ships in which they were employed. A complaint was made during the Russian war that it was impossible to put captains of high standing into frigates or small vessels in which they might most advantageously serve the country, because by so doing they received a lower rate of pay than other officers of less standing who commanded line-of-battle ships. It was strongly represented that if officers were paid under all circumstances according to their standing in the service it would facilitate the choice of captains for the work they were most fitted to undertake, and that on the whole no injustice would be done. While the war was going on, vessels of light draught being greatly in request, it was thought very desirable occasionally to appoint to the command of them captains of high standing, whom under the old system they could not have so employed. He did not mean to deny that the captain of a line-of-battle ship might be subjected to higher charges than a captain commanding a frigate. But there was no rule to which objections could not be urged; and this, on the whole, was considered by his naval colleagues an advantageous one.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, the plan had been adopted by the Admiralty without thought, and the sooner the old system was reverted to the better. He moved that the Chairman report progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress and ask leave to sit again."

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that after the opinions which had been expressed, he would beg to move that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £12,000—the cost of the proposed scheme—with a view of postponing the consideration of the subject. He hoped the Committee would allow him to pass the reduced Estimate.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, that under these circumstances he would withdraw his Motion.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he had no objection whatever to the course proposed by the noble Lord, and he sincerely hoped the scheme would never again be submitted to the House.

Motion and original Question, by leave, withdrawn.

The following Votes were then agreed to.

(5.) £679,262 Half-Pay.

(6.) £488,806, Military Pensions and Allowances.

(7.) £173,030. Civil Pension and Allowances.

(8.) £478,000, Freight of Ships, &c.

The House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again To-morrow.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHARITIES BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. SPOONER moved the adjournment of the debate.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the Bill was one entirely unobjectionable, being merely to bring Roman Catholic charities under the general law, and he therefore trusted the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Spooner) would not press his Motion.

MR. BOWYER said, the Bill would give the Commissioners the same power over Roman Catholic as over Protestant charities. It was merely a Bill to remove certain defects of title. He contended it was of importance that the House should go into Committee on the Bill, inasmuch as the Act of Exemption of the last year would expire on the 4th of July.

Motion made, and Question "That the Debate be now adjourned,"

Put, and negatived.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 1 postponed.

Clause 2 (No Proceedings) to be instituted as to Dealings with Roman Catholic Charities, prior to 2 & 3 William IV., c. 115).

MR. ADDERLEY said, he thought that the clause required some explanation.

MR. BOWYER explained that the object of the clause was to place Roman Catholic charities on the same footing as the Protestant charities. As respects this and the remaining clauses they were prepared by a most experienced conveyancer, Mr. Stoner. The object of this clause was to prevent litigation regarding matters which occurred previous to the passing of the statute 2 & 3 William IV., c. 4, which placed Roman Catholics on the same footing as Dissenters. As the law gave no protection to the churches and schools of Roman Catholics before that time, it was just that the law should not take cognizance of anything done in the administrations of such unrecognized charities. The law should not exercise jurisdiction where it gave no protection. Hon. Members over-estimated the effects which the Bill was intended to produce. The object of the Bill was merely to remedy defects in title, and it was simply a conveyancer's Bill. The Attorney General had carefully examined the clauses of the Bill, with which he was perfectly satisfied, and he (Mr. Bowyer) hoped the Government would proceed to pass the clauses of the Bill.

MR. DEEDES said, the hon. and learned Gentleman had given the very best reason why the Committee should further investigate this Bill, when he said there was no use in discussing it by persons not learned in the law, and he thought the debate ought to be adjourned.

MR. ADDERLEY also objected to proceeding with the Bill. It had been said that inconvenience would arise if the Bill were not passed before the 4th of July. If so, why had not the Bill been proceeded with before?

MR. BOWYER said, the Bill was introduced in the last Session, and re-introduced by him in the first fortnight of the present. If it had not made more progress the cause was to be found in a desire that the measure should be well considered, and the obstruction caused by the proceedings on the Reform Bill.

MR. SPOONER said, he wished to know whether, under this Bill, the Charitable Trust Commissioners would have the same control over Roman Catholic charities as they had over other charities. He had been informed by good lawyers that they would not.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the Bill went as far in that direction as was consistent with the peculiar circumstances of the case. The Attorney General had looked at it with as jealous an eye as the last speaker himself. He (Sir George Lewis) conscientiously recommended the passing of the clause to the Committee.

MR. BOWYER said, the Charity Commissioners would exercise the same control in both cases.

CAPTAIN STURT said, he objected to proceeding with a Bill of a purely legal nature without the presence of the Law Officers of the Crown.

Mr. Bowyer

MR. ADDERLEY concurred, and proposed that the present stage should be passed, and further discussion reserved for the third reading.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he thought that would be the best course.

Clause agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported, as amended, to be considered on Monday next.

House adjourned at a Quarter before Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, June 15, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^a Infants Marriage Act Amendment.

3^a Bank of Ireland; Union of Benefices.

INDIA.—LEASING OF CHILDREN.

RETURNS MOVED FOR.

LOED BROUGHAM said, he had yesterday presented a Petition praying for the suppression of a gross abuse that existed in India, that of parents leasing out their children, and had stated that it was a practice destructive of all morality. He hoped, by returns, for which he meant to move, to show fully the infamous character of this description of slavery. The specific evil to which he referred was that of individuals leasing out their female children, of eight, nine, or ten years, for ninety-nine years, for purposes of prostitution; and leasing out their male children for purposes of mutilation. He hoped that steps would be taken to put an end to this monstrous evil, to alter the law, if that was found necessary; but if no alteration of the law was required, to have it declared in such a way as to make it known to the people of India.

RIFLED CAST-IRON GUNS.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary for War a question of considerable importance, of which he had given notice. It was a question connected with the national defences of the country. He was one of those who believed that the defence of this country must mainly depend upon our maintaining our navy in a greater state of efficiency than that of any other country in the world, and it gave him great satisfaction when the Secretary for War stated in February last in the other House, in moving the Army Estimates, that he was anxious, as soon as possible, to issue rifle guns for the use of the navy. The right hon. Gentleman then stated that he hoped, by means of enlarging the Royal Factory at Woolwich, and with the aid of Sir William Armstrong's factory at Elswick, to have, between the 1st of January last and the end of the next financial year, something not very far short of 3,000 rifled guns on board Her Majesty's ships. When rifled guns were about to be introduced into the French and other navies, he hoped the answer which his noble Friend was able to give would be that a large number of guns had been rifled and delivered to the navy. He had so framed his question that it might have reference to cast-iron guns, because he found this class of guns distinctly mentioned in the evidence of Captain Caffin before the National Defence Commission. When asked about the guns that were being prepared for the navy, he said—"The present arrangement is to encase a cast-iron gun in a wrought-iron cylinder;" and on being further asked if Sir William Armstrong was doing that, his answer was "Yes." Now he was informed that the Government had been warned that these cast-iron guns, when they came to be tested, would be sure to burst. Nevertheless, large contracts for cast-iron guns had been entered into by the Government, and he was informed that when experiments came to be made the result was that the whole of the guns experimented upon burst. The consequence, he believed, was that the contracts had been cancelled. He wished, therefore, to ask his noble Friend the Under Secretary for War, What number of cast-iron guns have been rifled and delivered to the navy; by whose advice cast-iron guns have been hooped and rifled; what has been the results of the experiments upon the cast-iron guns so treated; and whether the Ordnance Select Committee were consulted on the subject, and approved of the rifling of the guns in question? He asked this question because he was at a loss to know who was responsible for the advice that had been given—whether it was the Secretary for War, the Commander-in-Chief, or Sir William Armstrong. He thought it was an anomalous position to place Sir William Armstrong in, a gentleman enjoying a salary from the Government, to ask him to make a report on the very article which he had contracted to manufacture for the Government. He thought it right that the very best advice should be given to the Government on such a subject, but it was unfair to place an individual in the invidious position of being a contractor for the manufacture of an article, and then to call on him to give advice to the Government with respect to the very article he and his partners were manufacturing.

THE EARL DE GREY AND RIPON, in answering the Question of the noble Earl, had, in the first place, to draw their Lordships' attention to the circumstance, that he thought it desirable that he should answer it strictly as it stood on the paper, and in the next, that there were good reasons why he should not go into all the particulars to which his noble Friend had referred. With regard to the question, what number of cast-iron guns had been rifled and delivered to the navy, his answer was that no rifled cast-iron guns had been delivered to the navy; for that description did not apply to the guns called the Armstrong guns, which were not cast-iron guns. With regard to the second question, by whose advice cast-iron guns had been hooped and rifled, he had to state that at the end of last year, and in the early part of the present, it was a subject of serious consideration with the Government how they should be able, at the earliest possible period, to supply both the army and navy with rifled guns. The gun of Sir William Armstrong had been adopted after a full and satisfactory trial, but it was found that Sir William Armstrong's guns could only be delivered comparatively slowly. The Government had therefore to consider whether they might not issue guns not exactly so perfect as the Armstrong, but still rifled guns, that could be supplied more rapidly. At that time orders were given that cast-iron guns should be provided, and subsequently rifled by Sir William Armstrong. A certain number of guns were prepared and hooped, and some of them were subsequently rifled. The rifling was upon what was called the "shunting" plan, which was suggested by Sir William Armstrong. Those guns were tried, but the result was not satisfactory, and all proceedings with respect to guns rifled upon that plan had been suspended. The hooped guns—that was, the ordinary service guns turned down and hooped, but not rifled—had also been tried, and in the experiments those smooth-bore guns had stood considerable trials, but all had ultimately burst—in fact, they had been tested to destruction; and although it was not in his power to say that the hooped smooth-bore guns had established any marked superiority over the ordinary smooth-bore guns, yet neither could he say that the trials had proved them to be failures. It would be, in fact, rather premature to pronounce upon the matter as it then stood. The noble Earl had further asked whether the Ordnance Select Committee had been consulted on the subject, and had approved the rifling of the guns in question. That question implied some misconception on the part of the noble Earl as to the nature of the functions of the Ordnance Select Committee. That Committee was a body of officers of experience and scientific attainments, to whom every description of invention for warlike purposes that was brought forward was referred. They examined all those inventions and reported to the Secretary of State whether they were likely to be useful, or whether they were of such a nature as to render it undesirable that the Government should have anything to do with them. The Committee had no function to decide what description of gun or other materials should be ordered for experiment—that was the function of the Secretary of State—it was the province of the Committee to conduct the experiments and to report the result. Therefore, the answer to the third question of the noble Earl must be in the negative—that the Ordnance Select Committee was not consulted before these guns were rifled. The noble Earl, at the conclusion of his speech, had alluded to the position of Sir William Armstrong, and had spoken of that gentleman as contractor with the Government. It was due to Sir William Armstrong that that matter should be cleared up. The facts were that Sir William Armstrong was not a Government contractor at all, for he was not a partner in the Elswick Iron Works, which supplied the guns. He had no profitable interest in those works, but he had advanced money to that concern, for which he held security, and of course received interest, but none of the profits of the concern. It was also true that Sir William Armstrong was a partner in certain iron works at Elswick, but those were not the works which supplied ordnance to the Government. Having now answered the noble Earl's questions, he would only further observe that their Lordships would not expect him to give very minute information upon a subject of this nature. He had answered the questions, he hoped, to the satisfaction of his noble Friend, but certainly as far as was consistent with the public interests.

Earl de Grey and Ripon

FURIOUS RIDING AND DRIVING BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that by the present law the penalty for furious riding or driving through the streets of the Metropolis, so as to endanger the life and limb of any person, or to the common danger of passengers, was but 40s., a sum totally inadequate to ensure protection for the lives and limbs of Her Majesty's subjects. It appeared from a Return laid upon their Lordships' table that, within the last two years, no less than 134 persons had been run over and killed outright, and 1,827 injured. Of those who had been run over but not killed at the time, eight had subsequently died, and of those who had been knocked down, nine had afterwards died. Even this inadequate penalty of 40s. might, under certain circumstances, be reduced to 2s. 6d. He thought it was monstrous that any person should be able to set the law at defiance merely because he was able to put his hand into his pocket and pay the fine imposed. He therefore proposed that in cases of accident or loss of life through reckless driving, the perpetrators should be visited with imprisonment, and not mulcted in a fine. He had himself seen examples of reckless driving in the streets of London, particularly in those neighbourhoods in which the traffic was not very great, such as in Belgravia, which was perfectly inconsistent with the preservation of public safety. The furious driving was principally by persons in one-horse carts belonging to tradesmen and others. The noble Marquess cited several cases of the lamentable and even fatal effects of furious driving:—among them the case of one Thomas Barnard, who had been tried in February previously for feloniously killing a man by furious driving. It appeared that Barnard had driven against a poor old man of 70, and knocked him down, and he died in two hours afterwards. The defence was that the driver was on the right side of the road. That man only got two months' imprisonment; but within a few minutes afterwards a man was convicted of stealing a watch, and sentenced to three years' penal servitude. He thought such an inequality of punishments afforded ample justification for bringing forward the present Bill.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was obliged to the noble Marquess for his laudable efforts to improve the law in this particular, but doubted whether the Bill would effect the object. This question had very recently been considered by a Select Committee, consisting of all the law Lords and other Peers, and after great deliberation they came to the unanimous conclusion that the law upon the subject ought not to be altered as was now proposed. The noble Marquess did not appear to have accurately studied the existing law. It would be supposed from the noble Marquess's statement that if a man by furious driving killed another he was only subjected to a fine; but the law really was that if a man by furious driving maliciously killed another, he would be in jeopardy to lose his life; and if it were done by negligence he would be guilty of manslaughter, and would be liable to a sentence of penal servitude. Now, the Bill before their Lordships was only confined to improper driving where no injury was sustained. As the law now stood, upon any such occurrence a pecuniary penalty might be inflicted upon the offender by summary conviction before the magistrates; but the noble Marquess proposed that even where no injury had been done, any person might be convicted of furious driving—that was, in fact, for driving at a greater rate than some nervous or timid person thought he ought to do—before a single magistrate, and sentenced to imprisonment with hard labour. For so undefinable an offence as furious driving, unaccompanied by personal injury, he thought it would be hard to inflict a punishment so severe. Believing the provisions of the Bill to be inexpedient and improper, he must ask their Lordships to reject the second reading.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH said, he did not think the explanation of the noble and learned Lord was any answer to the very serious state of things disclosed by the Return which he had quoted.

LORD PORTMAN moved, that the Bill be read that day three months. The Bill only proposed to inflict a punishment of imprisonment, but without hard labour he could not see that that would be of much use in checking the evil complained of.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now"), and insert ("this day three months").

LORD DENMAN recommended the noble Marquess to withdraw the Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH said, that after the strong expression of opinion from the noble and learned Lord Chancellor—an opinion from which it was, nevertheless, his misfortune strongly to dissent—he would not persevere in the Motion for the second reading of the Bill.

Amendment and original Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn; and Bill, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

AUSTRALIAN COLONIES.—INTRODUCTION OF ANIMALS.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON asked, Whether the Question of introducing and acclimatising in the Australian Colonies Animals of a rare and valuable Character, has been brought under the Consideration of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and is favourably entertained by Her Majesty's Government? The question, he thought, did not fall within the category of ordinary questions, inasmuch as no principle of public policy was involved in it; but it was one, nevertheless, of considerable interest and importance both to the Colonies and to this country. The expediency of introducing and acclimatizing in Australia various British and other animals had been mooted some time since, and had been brought under the notice of the Colonial Office by an Australian gentleman, and since then a scheme for that object had been sketched out, and had now acquired considerable maturity. The noble Earl here mentioned several of the animals which had been introduced into that country, and stated that Her Majesty had countenanced the scheme by sending out specimens. The introduction of British fish into Australia was a matter which received a good deal of attention, and, considering the great value of the salmon fishery in this kingdom, the introduction of the salmon would, doubtless, be of the greatest advantage to Australia. Moreover, numbers of the fine birds which thronged the English woods, or flew about the fields, had been exported to Australia, and he was glad to think that in the groves and streams of the British colonies the birds and fish of the mother country would be revived. The Victoria Government had given £500 towards the encouragement of this scheme, and in public meetings the Government had been urged to increase the grant to £2,000. He should certainly not wish to make any addition to the Miscellaneous Estimates of this country in the present year, because he thought them high enough already; but the scheme might be promoted by other means besides money, and much might be done for it by the expression of opinion in its favour.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, that the subject of the introduction and acclimatizing animals of a rare and valuable kind into a distant quarter of the world was no doubt one of very great interest, not only in a scientific point of view and with reference to the enjoyment which it was calculated to produce, but also for a more practicable reason—namely, the value of those animals to those countries in which they were introduced. The matter had attracted some attention for a number of years, and two great attempts had been made to introduce animals from this and from other countries into Australia. One of these attempts had hitherto been successful, while the other had met with eminent success. The first, of course, was the introduction of salmon into the Australian waters. That was attempted during the previous time that he was at the head of the Colonial Office; but that undertaking, although it was conducted under very scientific superintendence, failed in consequence, it was now supposed, of mistakes which might in future be obviated. Another effort was at present being made for the attainment of the same object, and he earnestly hoped that it might prove successful, because it would tend greatly to the pecuniary advantage as well as the social enjoyment of the colonists. The second experiment to which he referred was the introduction of the alpaca into Australia; which he believed might already be said to have completely succeeded. His noble Friend said that he did not wish that any Vote should be taken in the present year among the Miscellaneous Estimates for the promotion of these experiments; but he (the Duke of Newcastle) should go rather further than his noble Friend, and he should express his belief that, as a matter of principle, it would not be desirable to take a Vote in any year for such a purpose. He believed that the Government could assist such an undertaking more effectually in other ways than by any pecuniary contributions, and he felt persuaded that the general superintendence of such schemes would be best conducted by private individuals. That was the opinion he had maintained with respect to the transmission of botanical specimens, and he held it with respect to the removal of animals also. He could, however, assure his noble Friend that he was sincerely desirous of assisting those who engaged in such experiments by addressing communications in their favour to the Governors of colonies, and other measures. In the case, for instance, of the removal to Australia of that very rare and delicate fish which had originally come from China to the Mauritius, he had written to the Governor of the latter colony for the purpose of asking him to give all the aid in his power to the undertaking. As his noble Friend had brought forward that subject he (the Duke of Newcastle) thought it would be wrong for him not to give credit to a gentleman connected with Australia—namely, Mr. Edward Wilson, for his efforts in ensuring the success of the experiment as far as it had gone. He certainly could not hold out any expectation that the Government would contribute pecuniarily to that object; but on the other hand he should feel it to be both a duty and a pleasure to afford every other kind of aid in his power to those who were so generously and patriotically promoting an object of such great social and scientific importance.

The Earl of Carnarvon

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, the noble Duke had misunderstood him upon one point. He had not expressed the opinion that a Vote should be taken either in the present or in any future year. On the contrary, he believed with the noble Duke that such an object as the introduction of animals into Australia should be left to the enterprise of private individuals.

BANK OF IRELAND BILL.

THIRD READING.

On Motion, That the Bill be now read a third time;

LORD MONTEAGLE objected.

On Question, resolved in the Affirmative.
Bill read 3^d, and passed.

PROTEST.

DISSENTIENT :

" Because no Evidence or Argument has been adduced to prove that the Restraint imposed on the Bank of Ireland, prohibiting the Loan of Money on Mortgage or other Landed Security, has been productive of Injury to that Establishment, or of public or private Inconvenience, and has thus justified its Repeal.

" Because this Restraint forming a part of the original Constitution of the Bank of Ireland, and steadily maintained to the present Time during a Period of about 80 Years, has been shown to be consistent with a System of successful and prudent Management, upholding public and private Credit, not only in prosperous Times but during Periods of Commercial Pressure and of Political disquiet.

"Because even during the Crisis which produced the Bank Restriction that Measure was recommended, adopted, and condemned in Ireland less in reference to Dangers or Exigencies affecting Irish interests, than as a Consequence of the Suspension of Cash Payments enacted by the Legislature of Great Britain.

"Because the Repeal of this Restraint upon Loans and Mortgages of Land, which has so long subsisted, cannot but be interpreted as giving the Sanction of the Legislature to the Investment in Landed Securities of the Capital of Banks issuing Promissory Notes payable on Demand; a Practice which has been condemned as contrary to sound Principle, and therefore open to serious Objection.

"Because the ultimate Security of the Promissory Notes payable on Demand is insufficient for the Public Interests, unless their immediate Convertibility is also provided for, and for this reason the practice of locking-up Capital thus rendered unavailable to answer pressing Demands is inconsistent with the true Theory of Banking, or with its safe Application.

"Because if this Repeal of the wholesome Restraint of the Irish Bank Charter Act, 21 & 22 Geo. III. Cap. 16, had taken place during the existence of the Agricultural Distress consequent upon the Failure of Crops, it can hardly be doubted that a Pressure so urgent would have been cast on the Bank of Ireland as would have led them to unwise and dangerous Advances, adding to the existing Agricultural Distress the further Risks attendant on an imprudent Extension of the Circulation.

"Because the Danger of the Principle involved in the Bill becomes greater when it is proposed that it should be applied to the central and most important Bank in Ireland, which, as holding the Public Accounts of the Treasury and Exchequer, as paying the Dividends, and intrusted with the Public Remittances from England, stands in all these important respects in the Position of a National Bank, and is liable, if deviating from its present more prudent Course, to risk the certain Convertibility of its Notes by Investments not available in the immediate Discharge of its legitimate Banking Engagements.

"MONTEAGLE OF BRANDON."

DUCHY OF CORNWALL (LIMITATION OF ACTIONS) BILL.

REPORT OF AMENDMENTS.

Order of the day for the Report of the Amendments in this Bill read.

LORD KINGSDOWN stated for the information of their Lordships the mode in which the accounts of the Duchy were kept.

LORD VIVIAN rose for the purpose of asking the noble Duke below him (the Duke of Newcastle) a question as to the meaning of a remark which the noble Duke used in a former debate, but which then escaped his notice. The noble Duke was reported to have said that the Duchy had always exercised its rights with leniency and forbearance, and that many of those noble Lords and hon. Gentlemen who were now most forward to complain had received favours at their hands. He wished the noble Duke would explain who were the parties to whom he referred. A noble Lord who opposed the Bill the other evening, but who was not now in his place (Lord Churston) had authorized him to say that he had never received any favour at the hands of the Duchy; for himself he could say that he had never asked for or received any. The Council of the Duchy, he considered, had failed in their duty if they had granted any, and he challenged the noble Duke to mention the names of the noble Lords and hon. Gentlemen to whom he referred. He might say here, too, that he had been taken to task for applying the term "sharp practice" to the officers of the Duchy. He was quite aware that that term ought not to be applied unless there were ample means of justifying it. He did not apply the term to the Council—the term was applied to some of the subordinates; and he only wished that noble Lords who were on the Council would examine into these questions and see for themselves whether their conduct did not deserve the name of "sharp practice." He had formerly explained that he had no longer an interest in the Bill—the case in which he was interested was decided before this Bill was brought forward; but he had thought it right to refer all the correspondence that had passed between him and the officers of the Duchy in reference to that case to the hands of an eminent counsel, whose name he was not at liberty to mention because he had only received his reply as he entered the House; but it was to the effect that he thought a degree of pressure existed which few gentlemen would have thought it desirable to exercise; and however technically justifiable the course of the Duchy might be it was one which he would not advise any client of his to take unless he were a Jew or "some sharp practitioner." It was legally right, but it would hardly be thought right by any fair-dealing man. He might also add that he was borne out by many of his Friends—some of them Members of the other House of Parliament —in the application of the term “sharp practice” to the conduct of the officers of the Duchy.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, he did not rise to discuss the provisions of the Bill, but to reply to the question of the noble Lord—a question, however, he must say, which appeared to him to be not only a singular but an irregular one. The noble Lord asked him what he meant by an assertion that was made in the noble Lord's own hearing, and which he then allowed to pass without challenge, but now came down with it cut out of a newspaper, and challenged its correctness. He had not a word to say against the correctness of the report, which he believed conveyed a fair representation of what he said, but the noble Lord had put into it a word which he did not use, and which he did not think was in the report. He never said that either Lords or Gentlemen had received favour at the hands of the Duchy. What he said was, that noble Lords and hon. Gentlemen who were most forward in complaints had derived great advantages at the expense of the Duchy. In saying this he intended no personal attack on the noble Lord himself, still less on the noble Lord who had been before alluded to (Lord Churston), there was no one who had shown more courtesy, and he might say kindness, to the officers of the Duchy than that noble Lord. He was stating a general fact which applied to all the landed gentry of Cornwall. There was no reflection on them; but, nevertheless, for several years past a course of events had taken place tending, pro tanto, to enrich the landowners at the expense of the Duchy. Fifty or sixty years ago a measure was passed through Parliament by which about 20,000 acres of land, the property of the Duchy, were disposed of at nominal prices. Then came a dispute about the settlement of the septennial leases. Though it was generally admitted that the holders of those leases could not enforce any right to renew, yet by the Cession of Manors Bill the property thus held on leases was converted into freehold, by which several years' value was added to the property of the landowners. Then, one of the most ancient rights of the Duchy of Cornwall was the duty on tin. Disputes, however, arose with respect to them, and a Bill was introduced by Lord Montague, when Chancellor of the Exchequer, by which these tolls were given up, the Duchy receiving a compensation out of the public Exchequer. He had no hesitation in stating that if those rights were existing now they would be worth £25,000 a year. Altogether he believed that the property the Duchy had lost of late years in this way was of the value of between £50,000 and £60,000 a year; and this was a public question, because it must be remembered that the revenues of the Duchy diminished the provision that must be made from the public Exchequer for the heir to the Crown. The subordinates of the Council had been accused of sharp practice. As to that he must say that they had occasional law suits; but considering the nature and extent of the property these were very few, and he did not recollect a single case in which the Duchy had not been successful. Was not that a proof there was no sharp practice in the matter? He could assure the noble Lord that he would not make either himself or his colleagues angry by the employment of these terms; and as to the opinion which the noble Lord had read he knew nothing of the counsel or of the case that had been submitted to him; but he was quite willing to take the opinion of any independent and honourable man whether the opinion which the noble Lord had read was a fair description of the transaction. The noble Lord had made these complaints to him several months ago, and also to his noble and learned Friend opposite, the Chancellor of the Duchy (Lord Kingsdown); and they had both gone over the noble Lord's case with the utmost minuteness, calling in the aid of their most experienced servants, and they convinced themselves that there was no just cause of complaint against what had been done. He did not say the noble Lord had not a case; when both he and his noble and learned Friend began to look into it they thought he had cause of complaint, but they were now satisfied that the decision was legally, morally, equitably, and generally right. As to any other complaints the noble Lord or others might have, he could only say that if they were sent to the Council he would take care that they should be investigated.

Lord Vivian

LORD VIVIAN thanked the noble Duke for his offer, and said he would accept it.

LORD PORTMAN said that the noble Duke who had to-night defended the rights of the Duchy of Cornwall was not a Member of their Lordships' House when the first investigation was made into the affairs of the Duchy. The Report then made to the House was that customs had been abandoned, fees and heriots had been lost, boundaries of estates had become doubtful, and adverse claims had been made which had grown into habits, if not into legal rights. It had taken the Council twenty years to put the affairs of the Duchy to rights. The Council did not wish to encroach upon the property of others, but it was their duty to guard the rights, privileges, and estates of the Duchy.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH said, he remembered, in the days of His late Majesty, George IV., great complaints had been made of malversation in favour of particular individuals, and against the interests of the Duchy. He deprecated the employment of such terms as "sharp practice."

Amendments reported; and Bill to be read 3^a on Friday next.

UNION OF BENEFICES BILL.

BILL READ 3^a, AND PASSED.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH observed that some of the Commissioners under the Bill were to be appointed by Corporations. Now, whatever might be the merits of Corporations, they were certainly not religious bodies, and he recommended that this portion of the Bill should be altered.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, this point had received very serious consideration. It was difficult to say in what way the Commissioners should be appointed, and the mode proposed in the Bill was adopted as the least objectionable that could be thought of. The duties were not wholly of a religious kind. There was property to look after, and Corporations were considered the proper guardians of such property.

Bill read 3^a.

On Question that the Bill do pass,

THE BISHOP OF LONDON moved to insert at the end of the 1st Section the words—

("And a Benefice, Sinecure Rectory, or Vicarage in the Suburbs of any City, Town, or Borough in the Schedule to this Act, and the Parish of any such Suburban Benefice, shall, for all the purposes of this Act, be deemed to be within such City, Town, or Borough, and shall be included in and subject to the provisions of this Act accordingly.")

Amendment agreed to; words added.

THE EARL OF POWIS moved to insert in Clause 17 words to permit the appropriation of the disused churches to foreign congregations not being in communion with the Church of Rome. The object of this proposal was to include the Greek Church, to which a large and influential community in London, Manchester, and Liverpool belonged; and which was not at all of a hostile character as regarded the Church of England. But for the remarks of a right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Durham), it would never have occurred to him that such an Amendment as he proposed would be thought objectionable; for the object of the contemplated enactment had nothing whatever to do with questions of orthodoxy, but it was simply a matter of international courtesy, such as English congregations often received in foreign countries.

Moved in Clause 17 line 31, instead of ("Foreign Protestant Congregations,") to insert ("Christian Congregations not in communion with the Church of Rome.")

THE BISHOP OF DURHAM, after the pointed allusion of the noble Earl, felt bound to explain that he did not oppose the Amendment proposed by the noble Earl on the ground that the Greek Church was a hostile or proselytizing body. Still he could not forget that there were important differences between the doctrines of the Greek and the English Churches—that the former did not hold the same doctrine as the latter with regard to the Procession of the Holy Ghost; that it held as much as the Roman Catholic Church the dogma of the Real Presence; that it enforced compulsory confession; and that, though it did not worship images, in indulged in the adoration of pictures. He considered that there was in particular a spirit rising in this country against compulsory confession, and he thought it would be unwise to do anything that might seem to encourage that practice.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH preferred the existing words of the Bill—"Foreign Protestant Churches." The Amendment would allow churches to be appropriated to congregations of Mahomedans, Jews, or Buddhists.

LORD REDESDALE conceived that under the proposed clause Unitarians would be admitted, which would be very repugnant to the feelings of English Churchmen. If the clause was good for anything it was good as showing that the English Church took a comprehensive and tolerant view of the subject, and that the Christian Protestant Church of England held out the hand of fellowship to other Christian Churches.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON thought that in introducing the clause he was only following out principle and precedent in allowing churches to be used by foreign Protestants, and he considered that the clause should remain as it was.

THE BISHOP OF ST. ASAPH was of opinion that the qualification of "Christian" was equally necessary.

THE BISHOP OF ST. DAVID'S approved the Amendment.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, he thought it would show a very great want of Christian charity if we were expressly to exclude the members of the Roman Catholic Church from the power of the clause. The Roman Catholics were a very large proportion of our fellow subjects. We provided chaplains who professed that religion for the army, the navy, and various public establishments, and, in his opinion, to except Catholics in a case of this kind would be an offensive provision, and one which he should regret to see adopted. There should be a community of religious feeling between all Christian Churches; he trusted therefore that their Lordships would not give their assent to the Amendment now proposed.

Amendment negatived.

Clause enabling the reseating and rearranging of churches inserted.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

House adjourned at Half-past Seven o'clock, to Monday next,
Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, June 15, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Votes for Disqualified Candidates.

ANNUITY TAX ABOLITION (EDINBURGH) BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clause 14 agreed to.

MR. MURE moved the following proviso at the end of the clause :—

"Provided always, That upon the death or removal of any of the present ministers of any of the above-mentioned thirteen churches, the successor or successors of such minister or ministers shall not be entitled to a salary or stipend of more than £550 per annum until such time as the Commissioners named in this Act shall have made such provision as they may deem expedient for payment of a salary or stipend, amounting to not more than £550 per annum to the ministers to be nominated by them to the Tolbooth Church and the Old Church under the powers by this Act conferred upon the said Commissioners."

Lord Redesdale

The hon. Gentleman disclaimed any wish to interfere with the principle of the clause. His object was simply to give power to the Commissioners to deal with the matter of the amount of salaries of the successors of the present incumbents to a limited extent, so that, if they thought it expedient, they might fix the salaries of successive ministers at £550.

THE LORD ADVOCATE held that the interests of religion and of the Established Church would be more effectually served by the maintenance of thirteen ministers at a salary of £600 or £700 a year, than by keeping up two inefficient charges such as these, at a cost of a diminution of the stipends of the other ministers. He would not, however, oppose the Amendment if his hon. Friend would consent to leave out the specification of the two churches, and say "any minister nominated by the Commission."

MR. MURE said, that he had no objection to comply with the suggestion of the learned Lord.

Amendment, with the alteration proposed, agreed to.

Clause agreed to, as was also Clause 15.

Clause 16 (Accounts to be kept and published by the Commissioners).

THE LORD ADVOCATE suggested that this clause should be postponed for further consideration. He would, however, take that opportunity of explaining the facts of the case with respect to Trinity College church to which the clause referred. It appeared that the North British Railway of Scotland, being obliged to take down the church for the purposes of their railway, paid a sum of £16,000 to the Town Council, to be applied to the rebuilding of the church on another site. Owing to some differences of opinion upon the question, an action was commenced against the Town Council to compel them to build the church according to the agreement. The Lord Ordinary decided against the Town Council, and the money would be handed over to the Commissioners for the rebuilding of the church. The arrangement was, that the church should be rebuilt after an interval of five years, during which time the minister of Trinity College church was to be maintained at a salary of £600 a year. After the rebuilding of the church there would be a balance of between £5,000, and £6,000. A Committee of the House had recommended that a portion of this fund should be applied to the redemption of the Annuity Tax. On the part of the Town Council he had been pressed over and over again to take the money for the same purpose, and he thought it would be fair enough to relieve the town on the one hand and give the church the benefit on the other. The Amendment he was going to introduce was that the money should be handed over to the Commissioners, who should be bound to build the church and to apply the remaining fund as had been already stated.

MR. E. ELLICE (St. Andrews) thought that if any parties had reason to complain, in respect to this matter, it was the Railway Company itself. They were compelled by the Town Council to pay a large sum of money for the rebuilding of this church. He observed that although this money had been extorted by the Town Council from the North British Railway Company for the specific purpose of rebuilding the church on another site, the Town Council had resorted to every technical quibble, to every mode of legal chicanery they could think of, in order to escape from the obligation which they took upon themselves when they received the money. As a matter of equity, if after rebuilding the church any balance remained, the Town Council ought to hand it back to the Railway Company.

MR. BLACK contended that the former part of the transaction was highly creditable to the Town Council; and he might say that he was himself the Town Council on that occasion, because it was left entirely to him to arrange with the Railway Company in London. The Company at first proposed to remove the church and go to a jury to declare the value of the land; but he (Mr. Black) required that they should rebuild the church, and the Parliamentary Committee decided in his favour. The Company then preferred to pay the money, and he left it to the Company's own architect to say what sum the church could be built for. After that he (Mr. Black) left the Council; but he could not defend the Council for attempting to evade the obligation he had undertaken. Up to that point he maintained that the Council had acted very liberally towards the Company. The Company, in endeavouring to overreach the Council, had been overreached themselves.

MR. BLACKBURN said, that the fault of the Council lay not in accepting the money, but in attempting to misappropriate it. If after the church was built a balance remained it should be applied to the support of the church, but not to the relief of the inhabitants.

MR. HADFIELD was surprised that not a single Scotch Member had a word to say for the Town Council of Edinburgh. He was satisfied from what he knew of members of the Council that they had acted in an honourable manner.

Clause postponed.

Clauses 17 to 20 agreed to.

Clause 21 postponed.

Clauses 22 to 24 agreed to.

Clause 25 agreed to, with Amendments.

Clauses 26 and 27 agreed to.

Clause 28. (Provost, Magistrates, and Council to pay to succeeding Minister and his Successors a Salary of £200 per annum.)

MAJOR CUMMING BRUCE proposed an Amendment which would have the effect of giving to the ministers of the Church of Montrose a salary of £250 a year, instead of £200. The town was a very large one, and he was sure the Committee would admit that even £250 a year was not more than adequate to enable the minister of such a place to maintain his position.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 38, after the word "hundred," to insert the words "and fifty."

MR. BAXTER reminded the Committee that the original proposal for the settlement of the Annuity tax was, that the salary of the minister should be £340. Now it was proposed that £200 should be paid as the stipend of the minister, and that the remainder of his income should be made up from the pew-rents, &c. That arrangement was acceptable to the Church party in Montrose, and so far as the result was concerned, the salaries of the ministers, so far from being reduced, they would rather be increased by the operation of the Bill. He should certainly oppose the Amendment of the hon. Member.

MAJOR CUMMING BRUCE said, that he was informed that, a little time ago, the Town Council of Montrose were willing to have the salary fixed at £250, but that when the smaller sum was suggested they readily accepted it. He spoke in the interest of the minister, who, he considered, should not be left dependent on the generosity of any body of men.

Mr. MURE objected to the proposal, because it would interfere with the administration of relief to the poor, who received aid out of the church-door collection.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he should not feel himself justified in agreeing to the proposition of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. C. Bruce), inasmuch as he believed it would have the effect of disturbing the arrangement that had already been agreed to by the Church party in Montrose.

Question put, "That the words 'and fifty' be there inserted."

The Committee divided—Ayes 42; Noes 70: Majority 28.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 29 (Stipends of the Ministers of the Montrose Church).

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY suggested that, as the Bill was a compromise on this subject, it was desirable that no element should be left in it which could give rise to future misunderstanding and irritation. They had experience of the effect of pew-rents in England, and he did not think it would be wise to extend that principle in Scotland. It was very desirable that a certain portion of every church should be reserved for the poorer classes, and that they should have absolute security that those free seats would be reserved for them. He wished, therefore, that a clause should be introduced giving the poor a right to adequate accommodation in the church.

MAJOR CUMMING BRUCE said, it was his intention to propose that one-tenth of each church should be appropriated to the poor. He proposed in line 15 after "case," to leave out to the end of the clause, and to insert "it shall be lawful for them to increase the salary or stipend of the ministers of the said church to an amount not exceeding £340." He did not think that the salaries of the ministers should be made dependent upon pew-rents or church-door collections, which should be devoted to the poor.

MR. BAXTER urged upon the hon. Gentleman not to persevere in his Amendment, which would have the effect of creating much dissatisfaction.

MR. BLACKBURN said, he supported the Amendment, on the ground that if the people knew that those collections would be appropriated to other purposes than the relief of the poor they would cease to contribute to the poor-box.

Amendment negatived.

MAJOR CUMMING BRUCE proposed

Major Cumming Bruce

an Amendment in the clause appropriating one-tenth of the church at Montrose to the use of the poor in the same way as had been arranged in the churches of Edinburgh.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY proposed a proviso at the end of the clause, by which not less than one-third of each church should be appropriated to the public without costs.

THE LORD ADVOCATE opposed the proviso, on the ground that the accommodation already provided for the poor was amply sufficient, and that, if adopted, it would only lead to confusion.

Proviso negatived.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clauses 30 and 31 were agreed to.

Clause 16 (Accounts to be kept and published by the Commissioners).

THE LORD ADVOCATE then proposed that the clause should be framed to this effect:—

"That the moneys now in the hands of the Town Council of Edinburgh for the purpose of rebuilding Trinity College church, including all interest and accumulations, should be handed over to the Commissioners under this Bill in November next, and that after an interval of five years, the Commissioners should appropriate these moneys, or such amount as should be necessary, to the rebuilding of the said church according to the plan already agreed upon; and that during the said period of five years the minister of that church should receive a stipend of £600 a year."

The rebuilding of the church would cost £12,000, which would leave a balance of £6,000 or £7,000 to be applicable to other purposes set forth in the Bill.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 21 (If Commissioners fail in the Discharge of their Duties, the Lord Advocate may bring a Complaint before the Court of Session.)

MR. STIRLING proposed the following Amendment:

"After 'on,' leave out the rest of the clause, and insert, 'and after the passing of this Act, the advocacy, donation, and right of patronage of the following City churches—namely, St. Andrew's, St. George's, Greenside High Church, New Greyfriars, Old Greyfriars, St. John's, Lady Yester's, St. Mary's, St. Stephen's, Trinity College, Tron Church, and New North Church, shall cease to be in and belong to the Magistrates and Council, and shall be vested in the Commissioners; and the right of patronage of the said churches, as vacancies shall occur among the ministers thereof, shall be exercised by the Commissioners, assisted by representatives annually elected by the Kirk Sessions of the said churches, one by each Kirk Session, from among its own members, for the special purpose of acting with the Commissioners in filling up such vacancies, subject to the rules of the Church of Scotland."

He did not wish to cast any imputation on the manner in which the Council had exercised their patronage; but the altered circumstances of the case, he thought, required this change. He denied that the Council had any right to compensation for the withdrawal of the patronage, inasmuch as it was a trust vested in them on behalf of the public. No compensation was proposed to be given to the Town Council of Edinburgh, when the University patronage was withdrawn; and in this very Bill the patronage of the second charge in Montrose, was to be transferred to the elders and members of that church, without compensation to the Town Council.

THE LORD ADVOCATE held that the Town Council had always exercised their patronage well and wisely, and had been hardly dealt with in the University Bill. An ordinary patron could, of course, sell his right; but the Town Council could not alienate their patronage, which was, therefore, at present not saleable. He thought it right that they should have the power of negotiating for the disposal of their patronage, and could not consent to its being forcibly withdrawn from them.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, it appeared to him that the clause proposed was one so just and reasonable, that it ought to receive the general assent of the Committee. They should recollect that it was this question of patronage which had occasioned the great schism in the Church of Scotland. When they were changing the application of those funds, he thought it was but a just concession that this patronage should be given to the unexceptionable body proposed. It was most desirable that the patronage of the Church should be exercised by the members of the Church.

MR. BLACK said, he quite agreed with the hon. Member for North Warwickshire; but as the right of presentation had always been treated as property, it was but fair that the Council should be permitted to sell a property which belonged to the City of Edinburgh. He suggested that the patronage should be transferred to the Kirk Session and congregation, instead of the Commissioners, as in the case of the church of Montrose, and that a year's rent should be the price of the patronage.

MR. BLACKBURN said, in the case of Montrose church, there was no price; the Council merely held the patronage as a public trust; and if it were for the general good that it should be transferred, that was no reason why the Council should receive money, and make a profit out of it.

MR. DUNLOP said, nothing could be more injurious than to transfer the patronage from the public Council to another body, elected in a wholly different manner. Let the Council sell it, or let it be transferred in each instance to the respective congregations.

MR. E. ELLICE (St. Andrews) pressed on the Lord Advocate the propriety of taking away the patronage from the Council, who had no title to compensation. The patronage ought to be transferred to the congregations; but sooner than see it remain in the hands of the Council, he would vote for the Amendment.

MAJOR CUMMING BRUCE thought there were grave objections to giving congregations this patronage; because very frequently there were two or more pastors amongst them; and the result was, that in the exercise of this patronage much animosity was engendered.

MR. BUCHANAN said, that in this case there were very special reasons for vesting the Church patronage in the congregations; because they would look out for the most popular minister, whereby the seat-rents would be increased.

MR. STIRLING had no objection that the patronage should be vested in the congregation, and suggested that the Lord Advocate should put the clause in a shape that would satisfy all parties.

Clause negatived.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he would not undertake to bring up a clause in place of it; he would, however, consider whether he could so amend it that it ought to meet the wishes of all parties.

Preamble agreed to.

House resumed; Bill reported as amended, to be considered on Monday 25th June.

BERWICK-UPON-TWEED ELECTION.

Message from The Lords, That Her Majesty has appointed To-morrow, at half-past Twelve of the clock, at Buckingham Palace, to be attended with the Address of both Houses of Parliament, under the provisions of the Act 16 Vict. cap. 57, with respect to the Berwick-upon-Tweed Election, and that the Lords have appointed the LORD STEWARD and the LORD CHAMBERLAIN of the HOUSEHOLD to attend Her MAJESTY therewith on the part of their Lordships, and to desire this House to appoint a proportionable number of its Members to go with them.

Ordered, That four Members of this House do go with the Lords mentioned in the said Message to wait upon Her MAJESTY with the said Address.

Ordered, That Viscount PALMERSTON, Sir GEORGE LEWIS, Viscount CASTLEROSSE, and Lord PROBY do go with the Lords mentioned in the said Message.

Ordered, That a Message be sent to the Lords to acquaint them therewith; and that the Clerk do carry the same Message.

On Motion "That the House, at rising, adjourn till Monday next,"

UNIFORM WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

QUESTION.

MR. GARNETT said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is the intention of the Government to take any steps in accordance with the recommendation of the Astronomer Royal and the Comptroller-General, contained in the Letter of the latter of the 9th February, 1859, and the Report of the former gentleman, on the subject of the better administration of the Law with regard to Weights and Measures, and the organization of a separate office for that department.

MR. LAING said, that the question raised by the Report of the Astronomer Royal, was no less a one than whether the Government should take upon themselves to establish a centralized agency for insuring uniformity of weights and measures throughout the kingdom. The connection of the Treasury with the subject was very slight; it merely related to seeing a standard of weights and measures deposited in the Exchequer; the extension suggested would fall within the department of the Home Secretary. He could not say that the Government had made up their minds to the introduction of any measure on the subject.

COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE.

QUESTION.

MR. BAINES said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade questions relative to the Treaty of Commerce with France, namely, first, it having been stated that applications are pressed upon our leading commercial men to proceed to Paris, under the auspices of the Board of Trade, to convince the French Commissioners that liberality is the true policy, whether it is true that leading commercial men have been pressed to proceed to Paris, and, if so, for what purpose; and, secondly, it having been publicly alleged that the Treaty is an universally admitted failure, whether the President of the Board of Trade can state if anything has occurred in the progress of the negotiations, to cause the Government or their negotiators to believe that the Supplementary Convention will fail to carry out the original design of the Treaty?

MR. MILNER GIBSON: If it has been stated that the Board of Trade have urged upon any commercial gentlemen to go to Paris in order to convince the French Commissioners that "liberality is the true policy," I can assure my hon. Friend that the statement is entirely incorrect. No commercial gentleman has been asked to go to Paris for any such purpose; but, it being necessary under the Treaty that a Supplementary Convention should be concluded in order to convert the ad valorem duties into specific duties, and also to settle the actual amount of such duties, it was thought desirable to obtain from the Chambers of Commerce, and from persons interested in the various branches of industry affected, the best information possible, in order that the conversion might not take place in a manner disadvantageous for the interests of the trade of this country for want of information. The Chambers of Commerce were invited to supply the Board of Trade with information, and it was suggested that deputations should go to Paris. But the suggestion thrown out on our part was that delegates should go to Paris, sent by the Chambers of Commerce, representing the various branches of trade and industry affected, in order to supply the special information practically necessary to settle the details of the Treaty. That was the course taken, and that was the most reasonable and the most proper course to be taken; and unless it had been taken, it would not have been possible to convey to the Commissioners the special information on the various branches of our manufactures and industry which it was necessary for them to possess in settling the duties. There is not, therefore, the slightest truth in the statement that any gentlemen have been sent by the Board of Trade for the purpose of recommending any particular policy. Those gentlemen went to Paris for the simple purpose of supplying the necessary information, which can only be afforded by skilled persons connected with the various manufactures and trades that will be affected by the Treaty. In answer to the other Question which my hon. Friend has put—whether the Treaty is not held to be an universally admitted failure, I will only say that such a statement is entirely new to me. As far as I am aware, the negotiators are succeeding in carrying out, by a Supplementary Convention, the original design and intention of the Treaty. All that I hear leads me to believe that its practical commercial value has been much underrated.

COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE. QUESTION.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he wished to repeat the question which he had put to the noble Lord opposite a few days ago, as to whether any steps have been taken for the enlargement of the period at which the ad valorem will be turned into specific duties. The question was of great importance, because though it was possible that the French Government might not fix a lesser duty than 30 per cent ad valorem, if it were left in their power to do so, if the change were once made into specific duties it would no longer be in their power to increase, though they might, if they chose, diminish their amount. But if the time within which the ad valorem were to be changed into specific duties were allowed to lapse, it would be at any period in the power of France to lower the ad valorem duties from 30 to 10 per cent; or, on the other hand, to raise them from 10 to 30 per cent. The British manufacturer, consequently, would never have any certainty as to the amount of duty which his goods might be called on to pay on their entrance into France. It was, therefore, highly important that either the ad valorem should be turned into specific duties within the period prescribed by the Treaty, or else that by mutual consent the time should be enlarged in a Supplementary Convention?

UNIFORM VALUATION OF PROPERTY. LONDON CORPORATION.

QUESTIONS.

MR. STANLEY said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if it is his intention, now the Reform Bill is withdrawn, to bring in his Bill this Session, to enforce a uniform Valuation of Lands and Tenements in England? The right hon. Gentleman stated some time since that he had a Bill prepared for procuring an equal valuation of all the property in England, and that he did not lay it on the table owing to the pressure of business—alluding as he (Mr. Stanley) understood to the Reform Bill—which he said was likely to take up the whole time of the House. That Bill was now withdrawn; and the House would probably agree with him that it was of the greatest importance that a Bill for a more perfect valuation of property should be introduced in case another Reform Bill was brought in proposing a rating franchise, such a valuation would be absolutely necessary.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he was quite prepared at once to introduce the Bill for the Amendment of the parochial valuation; but he feared, though the Reform Bill had been withdrawn, there was little prospect, from the pressure of business, of bringing the Valuation Bill under the consideration of the House. He wished, however, to caution the House against the expectation that the Bill would establish one uniform system of valuation, similar to that of Ireland. As long as the English system was parochial it was impossible it could be so uniform as one established under a single Government Board.

NEW HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT. QUESTION.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he rose to ask the First Commissioner of Works what arrangements have been made since the lamented death of Sir Charles Barry to complete the Houses of Parliament and the adjacent buildings; and whether there is any plan left by Sir Charles Barry for the completion of the whole, on which it is intended to proceed. During the lifetime of the late Sir Charles Barry various steps were taken more or less ineffectually, in order to ascertain when the Houses of Parliament would be finally completed. Like the clock just alluded to by the hon. Member for Peterborough, the Houses, commencing at an estimate of £750,000 had already cost the nation £2,400,000. Now, at the death of Sir Charles Barry it became an object of special interest to the public to know whether the works were completed; if not, how much remained to be done; and what would be the extra cost. He also wished to know who was the person deputed, or to be deputed, to carry out any additional works which had been projected by Sir Charles Barry. It was generally understood that Sir Charles Barry had prepared plans, not merely for the completion of the Houses, but other plans of an extensive nature for improving the neighbourhood, including the removal of the Courts of law, the formation of the approaches to the bridge, and of a quadrangle in New Palace Yard, and other alterations. He wished to know whether the Government were in possession of Sir Charles Barry's plans for those improvements; and if so whether they were prepared to act upon them? Another question he wished to ask was this: It was well known that a short time previous to Sir Charles Barry's death a misunderstanding existed—a misunderstanding of very long continuance—as to the rate and mode of remuneration for his services; and he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether that misunderstanding had been finally arranged, and if so upon what terms? He would also ask whether arrangements had been entered into with the person who had been appointed to succeed Sir Charles Barry and complete any works that remained, which would not be subject to the like misunderstanding; and whether the Government had agreed with that individual for the final and total completion of all works at present unfinished connected with the Houses of Parliament?

THE PARKS AND CHARING-CROSS.

QUESTION.

MR. W. EWART said, he would beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether more seats round the larger trees in Kensington Gardens and the Parks can be placed there for the accommodation of the public; also, whether the large piece of ground lately used as a reservoir for one of the Water Companies, opposite Grosvenor Gate, can be thrown into the Park for the use of the public; and whether the unsightly iron railing round the Statue of King Charles I., at Charing Cross, might not be advantageously removed?

MR. COWPER said, that when the country was deprived of the services of Sir Charles Barry, there were some works in progress in connection with the Houses of Parliament which had been commenced some time ago, when his predecessor in office had proposed a final Vote for the completion of certain works which it was then agreed should be carried on. Those works were of small extent, and in selecting an architect to finish them, he thought the right course to pursue was to ask Mr. Edward Barry, the son of Sir Charles Barry, to undertake the direction of them, because he knew he had assisted his father in their construction, that he was in possession of the plans and designs, and had manifested his competency for the task by the results which he had achieved in the case of Covent Garden Theatre and the Floral Hall. He had proposed to Mr. Barry that he should accept the same amount of remuneration as that which it had been agreed his father should receive—that was to say, 3 per cent on the whole outlay on those works, with 1 per cent additional on the measured work. The plan which Sir Charles Barry had prepared in order to enclose New Palace Yard as a Quadrangle, had been laid before Parliament in 1855; but in his office there were no further details than those contained in the Parliamentary Returns. The design consisted of three parts; the first was intended to occupy the place on which the houses in Bridge Street now stood, and would cost £67,000; the second portion would extend from the east end of Bridge Street to the Courts of law, and would cost £80,000; while the third would occupy the site of the present Courts of law, and would cost £150,000. Hereafter, when all the houses in Bridge Street were pulled down, the House would probably deem it desirable that buildings should be erected on that site for the accommodation of the public offices, and likewise that the site of the Courts of law should be built upon; but it was as yet premature to come to any decision on these points.

In reply to his hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Ewart), he could say that he was extremely anxious to provide as much sitting accommodation as possible for the public in Kensington Gardens and the Parks, and steps had been already taken for increasing the number of seats. With respect to that hideous circle in Hyde Park, opposite Grosvenor Gate, which had hitherto been used as a reservoir, he had to state that it had only lately passed into the hands of the Crown, and that it would be necessary soon to determine to what purpose it should be applied. He should be very glad if the subscribers to the Monument which it was proposed to erect in Waterloo Place to the memory of the Guards who had fallen in the Russian war, and which, he thought, was too large for the present site, could be induced to place it in the circle to which he was referring; but he could give his hon. Friend no positive information as to how that particular spot would be ultimately disposed of. He quite concurred, he might add, with his hon. Friend in condemning the unsightly iron railing which surrounded the statue of Charles I., and he knew of no necessity for its being continued. It was a work of ancient date, and had been erected probably from a feeling that some of the mob might at that time be disposed to mutilate the statue as being an emblem of principles of which they disapproved. He found that there were three Royal equestrian statues in the Metropolis, and of those, that of George IV. in Trafalgar Square, was unprotected by a railing; while in the case of the statue of George III., in Cockspur Street, which had until lately been so protected, he had taken the liberty of ordering the railing to be removed, and the result had been that the appearance of the pedestal had been improved without any injury to the statue having arisen. He believed, therefore, that the best course to take would be to remove the railing which surrounded the pedestal of the statue of Charles I., and he felt assured from the quiet and becoming demeanour of the people in the streets of the present day no harm to the statue need be apprehended.

Colonel Wilson Patten

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN asked, what the Estimate was for the completion of the remaining works connected with the two Houses of Parliament?

MR. COWPER: In the Estimates which have been laid on the table, no sum has been put down for the completion of any such works. The works which are now being carried out are to be paid for by means of a Vote which was taken in a former year.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN: Are there any works remaining to be carried on for which an Estimate will be required?

MR. COWPER: None.

DISTURBANCES IN NEW ZEALAND.

QUESTION.

LORD ALFRED CHURCHILL, in rising to put a Question on this subject, said the disturbances to which he wished to call the attention of the House had their origin in the circumstance that a native chief had taken it upon himself to endeavour to prevent the sale of a plot of land in the province of New Plymouth, with which the owner was desirous to part. To such interference the Government of the colony could not, of course, submit, and martial law had been proclaimed in the province. The consequence had been that the Europeans had been brought into collision with the natives, and it being recollected that a number of the settlers were at some of the outlying positions, a force of about 265 strong, including volunteers, colonial militiamen, and some men of the 65th Regiment, had been sent out to secure their safety. The volunteers, who had been sent in advance, while the military, under the command of Colonel Murray, remained some distance in the rear as a reserve, came upon the enemy and attacked them in the most gallant manner. Being, however, in an isolated position, and being in danger of being surrounded, they sent one of their number back to Colonel Murray to ask for support. Now, what did Colonel Murray do? He stated that the volunteers had brought themselves in the difficulties of their position without orders, and he shortly afterwards took the troops home. No doubt he was acting according to the strict letter of his orders; but he did not think that was quite the way in which an officer commanding Her Majesty's forces ought to act when 140 of the finest volunteers the colony possessed were in advance and in a dangerous position. There could not be the slightest doubt that but for the arrival of Captain Cracroft and his blue jackets—who deserved all honour for their gallant conduct—these unfortunate settlers would have been cut to pieces during that night, being short of ammunition. He did not wish to cast any imputation on Colonel Murray. He only hoped the Government would call on him to give an explanation of his conduct. Having said so much on that point, he wished to state some facts as to what he believed had been the cause of this outrage. First of all there was the system of Europeans acquiring possession of land under the direct title of a native chief which a European Government would not recognize. Then, two years since, an arms ordinance, enacted by Sir George Grey, preventing the selling of arms and ammunition to natives, was repealed. He at the time put a question to the Colonial Secretary as to whether the repeal of that ordinance had received the sanction of the Government; and the reply he received was that it had become a dead letter and was inoperative, and that, therefore, there was no use in longer retaining it. No doubt the natives by various means did acquire arms and ammunition, but the Act did impose a great check on them, and the probability is if that Act had not been repealed we should not have had the arms to contend with which were brought against us on this occasion. He had received a letter from a gentleman largely connected with the colony, which stated:—

"The European population of that province is only about 3,000 souls. The lands are principally held by the natives, who appear to have been encouraged to resist the sale of them by Europeans of the very vilest character who have settled among them, such as runaway convicts, sailors of different nations, and others, who, preferring a life of licentiousness, have lived among the natives, and encouraged them, not only by their advice but by subscriptions, to resist the Queen's authority. A considerable sum was raised last year to support the pretensions of this rebellious chief to the kingly authority, and I regret to say that there has been large quantities of gunpowder recently shipped for New Zealand from London."

This extract was fully borne out by the intelligence received by the last mail, that Sir Henry Barkly, the Governor of Victoria, had issued a proclamation against the importation of arms from Melbourne and New South Wales; for in this instance, as in the Kaffir war, it was found that individuals in the Colonies and this country had been supplying the natives with arms to fight against us. There was another point to which he wished to refer—the difficulty at all times of employing soldiers against the natives of New Zealand. They might do very well for garrisons, but they could not be taken into the bush, serving, as they did, from the very nature of their clothing, as a mark for the enemy. The army had not taken that part in this affair which they ought to have done, the blue jackets and volunteers being chiefly engaged; but the fact was that a ship of war, a gunboat or two had much more effect on the natives than a whole regiment of soldiers; for the simple reason that they could be moved about without difficulty. He had seen in the New Zealand papers that not fewer than seventy-six waggons were required to convey the baggage of the soldiers. They could not, therefore, be of much use in that colony. Volunteers and a greater number of blue jackets were chiefly required. He trusted that at any rate the Government would declare the lands of all the chiefs who had joined in the rebellion forfeited. Without some such exemplary punishment a proper effect would not be produced on the native mind. He also hoped the Government would reimpose the ordinance against the sale of arms to the natives, which would have a considerable effect in preventing the natives obtaining ammunition. With these observations he begged to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies to state to the House the information received respecting the recent disturbances in New Zealand, whereby Her Majesty's forces have been brought into collision with the native tribes, and also what course Her Majesty's Government intend to pursue?

Lord Alfred Churchill

COLONEL DICKSON hoped hon. Members would express no opinion as to the conduct of Colonel Murray before further information had been received. He was quite sure the noble Lord did not mean to throw out any imputation on that gallant officer. He had not the slightest personal knowledge of Colonel Murray, but he had seen upon former occasions that officers had incurred blame, which the House had reason afterwards to regret when full information as to the actual facts had been obtained.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE was afraid he could not add much to the statement of facts made by his noble Friend. He had stated both the cause of this unfortunate outbreak in New Zealand, and the facts themselves quite accurately. As to the facts, he really could not add anything to the account they had read in the newspapers. As to the conduct of Colonel Murray, it would certainly be premature to pronounce any opinion. There had been a want of co-operation, however, between the military, volunteers, and militia, which required explanation, and he had no doubt in due time that explanation would be received. One word as to the causes of this collision between the colonists and the natives. One could not deal with these matters without being painfully conscious of the difficulty of getting at the full and exact truth and rights of the case; but, nevertheless, with the pretty full information they possessed at the Colonial Office he was glad to say there was every reason to believe that, however this unfortunate affair had originated, the New Zealand Government were in the right. No doubt this was a critical moment in the history of New Zealand. On the one hand the colonists were rapidly increasing in numbers and power; they were longing for the use of the land which was lying useless on all sides around them, the nominal owners not being capable of turning it to account; on the other hand, these lands belonging to some native tribe or family, they had to deal for every acre of them with native owners, among whom there was often a strong feeling against the increase of territory in the hands of the white race, partly arising from the sense of their own decay in power and numbers, and the rapid increase in both of the colonists. The Governor was strictly adhering to the rule, evidently a just one—on the one hand to take no land from any native who could not show a fair title; and, on the other, if such a title was shown to allow no other native or tribe to interfere with the sale of land by such an owner. That was exactly the case which had arisen. The chief who sold this plot of land was admitted to be the proprietor of it. That admission was made by the leader of the present revolt, although he pretended to have some vague claim to it of a feudal character. It appeared that the natives themselves admitted that, even according to their own usages and notions of equity, the sale of the land was perfectly legitimate. Though the value of the plot was not very great, the question involved was one affecting the whole future acquisition of land in New Zealand, and also affecting, in the highest degree, the welfare both of the colonists and the natives. It was manifestly necessary for the colonists that they should be enabled to buy land, and it was likewise for the interest of the natives that they should be at liberty to dispose of the lands they could not turn to account, and thereby contribute to that prosperity in which they would themselves participate. Such being the case, there had been, he feared, nothing for it but to decide the question at issue by force of arms. The Government deplored that necessity. As far as they knew, they believed the Governor had acted with great judgment and vigour; and his Excellency had hopes that the disturbances would not proceed any further.

MR. ADDERLEY said, the circumstances that had occurred in New Zealand illustrated the wisdom of his recommendation that the Colonies should be left to provide for their own defence. 1,400 regular troops, entirely paid by this country, were employed to keep the peace of New Zealand, and on the very first occasion when they might have been of use, they had proved themselves of no use whatever. ["No, no!"] Not only were they of no use, but they did absolute mischief. They took no part in the action, but they had created a feeling of bitterness between themselves and the colonists by abstaining from action. They left the whole brunt of the day to the volunteer force. The volunteers had proved themselves capable, as far as courage and skill went, of undertaking their own defence, all that they required being increased numbers; but why were they not more numerous? Simply because the Colonies had been taught to lean upon England to find troops for them, and while that was the case they would never develop their own resources. In New Zealand we were having an exact parallel to what happened in North America when General Braddock was sent to aid the colonial militia. The moment the regular troops appeared the colonial militia broke down and became utterly valueless. In that case also regular troops had proved equally unfit to cope with native warfare. In the portion of New Zealand where the disturbance broke out there were only 50,000 natives, men, women, and children, while the number of British emigrants, chiefly, of course, adults, was 70,000. Surely, then, if the colonists were left to depend upon themselves, they would soon organize a force that would render any such native insurrections as these absolutely hopeless. Let it not, however, be imagined that the colonists would not ask for Queen's troops. They were certain to ask for them as long as the business of supplying those troops produced one of the best trades the settlers could have. But the only result of sending out regular soldiers was that they broke down the volunteer forces, strong and well adapted as they were for the purpose, while they were themselves utterly useless against the natives.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he could assure his right hon. Friend that, so far from the success that had been gained being due to the volunteers, that force was a mere handful; and in the opinion of the Governor and every authority in New Zealand, the safety of the lives of every European man, woman, and child in the colony depended on Her Majesty's soldiers and sailors.

Afterwards,

CAPTAIN JERVIS thought that some observations with respect to the conduct of our officers in New Zealand ought not to pass unnoticed. The hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Adderley) in order to cry down the Colonial system, had been pleased to state that the British troops had not conducted themselves in that distant part of the world as they ought to have done, and the case of General Braddock had been quoted. But there was not the slightest similarity in the cases. What was the cause of General Braddock's disaster? That he would go into the woods against advice, and consequently he had his troops destroyed in a jungle. The commanding officer in New Zealand was ordered on no account to allow himself to be drawn into a jungle, and not to remain after daylight. He obeyed his orders and saved his troops, and the only thanks for his services were insinuations, in order to prove that the Colonial system was not what it ought to be.

MR. CHILDERS wished to correct a very grave inaccuracy in the statement that the native population in the district in which this unfortunate affair had taken place was less than the English population. The native population of New Zealand was lately between 100,000 and 150,000, and the entire English population from about 50,000 to 70,000; and in this part of the Northern Island the English were outnumbered by about ten to one. When the despatches came home he hoped they would be laid on the table, and he believed they would show that, however, gallantly the volunteers had behaved, the conduct of Colonel Murray had been free from all blame. He regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had again put forward his peculiar views about Colonial defences. He did not say that our Colonial possessions must not partly depend for defence on the military prowess of forces raised among themselves, but in the colony which had been most successful in raising volunteers the success was due to the fact of there being a considerable number of British troops in the place. In Victoria there had been 1,000, and there were now 400 or 500 British troops, and 2,000 efficient volunteer rifles, cavalry and artillery had been raised. Much of this success was due to the assistance which they had received from the officers of the regular army, and from being brigaded with the regular forces in the colony.

Mr. Chichester Fortescue

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he entirely concurred with those gentlemen who had spoken of the unfairness of complaining of an officer who had no opportunity of answering the accusation which had been made against him. Colonel Murray had given an account of his own proceedings, which appeared to have been strictly in obedience to orders, but he had had no opportunity of rebutting the particular allegations made against him. He would not enter into the question of how far the Colonies ought to defend themselves, but with regard to the opinion formed in New Zealand of the value of British troops, there was clear evidence that the first thing done was to send off in hot haste to Sydney and Melbourne to get the assistance of regular troops from the neighbouring colonies, and he was glad to say that assistance was immediately rendered.

COLONEL LINDSAY thought they ought to know who was responsible for the conduct of the operations—was it the officer in the command of the troops, or was it the officer in immediate charge of the volunteers? There ought not to be a divided command, and the volunteers ought not to be able to go where they pleased. In this case it appeared, not that the volunteers were successful, but that being rather in a scrape the blue jackets got them out of it.

EUROPEAN ARMY IN INDIA.

QUESTION.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for India, What was the date of his communication to the Indian Council on the subject of the abolition of the local European army in India, and whether the Council collectively declined expressing their dissent on the ground of its being too late to do so? The right hon. Gentleman stated the other night that as long as the question between the abolition and retention of a local army was pending in the Cabinet, he thought it unadvisable to consult with the Indian Council on the matter. What, then, was the Indian Council appointed for? The right hon. Gentleman said in effect that he belonged to two Councils, each consisting of sixteen members—the one being the Cabinet Council, possessing no specific knowledge of India whatever, and the other the Indian Council, composed of men most capable of giving advice relative to the affairs of that country, and chosen expressly for that object. Of what use was the Council of India, which cost the country some £25,000 or £30,000 a year, if the Cabinet was to decide such questions first, and then to consult these gentlemen afterwards? These gentlemen were, he believed, high-minded men, and if they were to be thus treated, they would naturally think the country might be spared the expense of their salaries.

MR. SPEAKER suggested to the hon. and gallant Member that he should confine himself more strictly to the question he wished to put to the Indian Minister.

SIR DE LACY EVANS: The right hon. Gentleman having stated that he at last made a formal communication to the Indian Council for the purpose of allowing it to express its dissent from the decision of the Cabinet, and that the Council then declared that it was too late to do so, he therefore wished to know whether the Council collectively declared that it was too late, and what was the date at which the right hon. Gentleman made his communication to that body?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he could only repeat what he had said on a former occasion — namely, that throughout the whole of the autumn, while the question of the abolition of the local army was pending, he was in constant communication with the leading members of the Council of India, though not in their collective capacity, and was, therefore, in perfect possession of their opinion. Whether that opinion was expressed individually or collectively, the result was practically much the same. The essential point was that in taking part in the Cabinet, he should be able to state what was the opinion of the members of the Indian Council on this important question. It did not seem to him that it would be proper to bring the subject formally before the Indian Council till some step was to be taken in one direction or the other. If the decision of the Cabinet had been in favour of maintaining a local army, no step whatever would have been necessary, but things would have gone on as they had done before. The decision of the Cabinet was come to on the 16th of May, and on the very next day he stated what that decision was to the Indian Council. He said they would be sorry to hear that the decision arrived at the day before by the Cabinet was against the maintenance of the local army; and, therefore, that now, for the first time, he could bring before them a practical question on the subject; and that he was ready to do so in order that any Member who wished to put on record his dissent might have it in his power to do so. The proposal he should make was that a letter should be written to the Commander-in-Chief, desiring him to suspend recruiting for the Indian army, and any member of the Council wishing to raise objection might then do so. An opportunity was thus offered to the Council to express an opinion, but they said that the Government having come to that decision, they thought it was too late for them to express assent or to attempt to alter that determination. He could not say how many of the Council expressed that view, but no one expressed a contrary opinion. He did not therefore actually propose the writing such a letter, as the Council did not seem to wish to record opinions against it; and the result was that, having had an opportunity to dissent, they had declined to avail themselves of it.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL, in answer to the Question of the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines) said, he was informed by Lord Cowley that considerable labour had been employed in the task of bringing the ad valorem duties into the shape of specific duties, but that it was not likely that the task would be accomplished in the time proposed for it in the Treaty itself. Lord Cowley, therefore, expected that some prolongation of time would be required, but he was unable to say how much, and as he had some observations to make upon the subject, he begged Her Majesty's Government to wait for those observations before they took any determination with regard to the prolongation of the period. He could not therefore give a more definite answer; but as soon as he heard from Lord Cowley on the French Ambassador here the matter would receive his immediate attention. He agreed in the statement that it was of great advantage that the task should be accomplished, but it required a great deal of inquiry and specific information, which occupied much time. There were one or two other questions which from time to time had been asked, and to which he had not been able to reply.

With regard to the case of Senor Escalante, the gentleman who was imprisoned in Spain upon suspicion of distributing the Bible, he was imprisoned for a considerable time, though in a very indulgent way; but on application to the Superior Court, that tribunal had, upon his plea, decided in his favour, and he had been set at liberty.

A Question had been asked respecting the export of unmanufactured cork from Spain. There had been a correspondence with Spain on the subject, and the Minister of Finance said that he could not make out that there was any duty on the export of unmanufactured cork except from one province—the province of Gerona; that the Spanish Government were employed very assiduously in endeavouring to improve the tariff of Spain, and that they wished to show the same liberal spirit to us as we had manifested towards Spain in respect to wines; but that there were conflicting interests, which were found difficult to be dealt with, just as in England a similar difficulty had been felt, as the experience of the opposition to the repeal of the Paper duties showed.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD inquired whether the proposed changes in the Spanish tariff were to be effected by a supplementary convention?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Yes, it will be done by a supplementary convention.

HARBOUR OF HOLYHEAD.

QUESTION.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary to the Treasury, when the new Boats will be put on the Holyhead Station; when the Piers at that Station will be completed; and, as to overtures said to be made to the Midland and Chester Railway Companies on that subject? He had heard that some offer had been made to the railway companies that if they forewent the building of the piers they should be allowed half an hour in addition to the time agreed on for the journey; but he trusted to hear that no such offer had been made.

MR. LAING believed, that large boats would commence running on the 1st of August. The works going on at Holyhead belonged to three classes. First, the large outer works; second, the pier from which the present boats ran; and third, the new pier partly for Irish boats and partly for the Transatlantic steamers, on the plan of Mr. Hawkshaw. The latter plan was not yet commenced, and was likely to undergo some modification, as, Irish ports being made points of departure for Transatlantic steamers, it was not probable that Holyhead would be used for that purpose. The estimate for the work was £450,000, but if the Transatlantic steamers' pier were not required, the expenditure would be very much less. Under any circumstances, some additional accommodation would be required at the existing pier, because the other could not be completed under a period of three or four years. It had been represented by the City of Dublin Steam Packet Company that it might be more advantageous to lay out money on the present pier, in making it a permanent stone structure, instead of a wooden structure, than upon the other proposed by Mr. Hawkshaw. He believed there was a good deal to be said on both sides, and as a considerable amount would have to be laid out, it would be desirable to have a little experience of the working from the present pier before deciding the question. The arrangement with the railway companies was, that they were bound by a contract to complete the whole transit between London and Dublin in eleven hours; but he understood that the penalties attached to the contract with regard to that time were not to take effect until the requisite accommodation was provided at Holyhead for carrying the mails direct on board the steamboats without stopping at the station. About two years would elapse under any circumstances before the accommodation could be complete, and as in the meantime the railway company had only access to the pier by a very sharp curve, which could not be traversed with safety by the large engines, they very naturally claimed some allowance of time before being subject to the penalties. No express allowance had been made, but the understanding came to was that half-an-hour should be allowed, and that all parties were to do their best to accomplish the transit in the shortest time which the present circumstances would admit. He hoped that the delay would not be more than a quarter of an hour or twenty minutes.

Lord John Russell

House at rising to adjourn to Monday next.

ARMY (MEDICAL OFFICERS).

ADDRESS MOVED.

COLONEL LINDSAY rose to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to reconsider the eleventh Clause of the Army Medical Warrant of October, 1858, as far as relates to its retrospective application to the Medical Officers at that time serving in the ranks affected, having due regard to the Public Service. The clause to which he alluded was as follows:—

“With a view to maintain the efficiency of the service, all medical officers of the rank of surgeon major, surgeon, or assistant surgeon, shall be placed on the retired list when they shall have attained the age of fifty-five years, and inspectors general and deputy inspectors general when they shall have attained the age of sixty-five years.”

He did not mean to attack this compulsory system of retirement generally; on the contrary, he thought that, acted upon in the case of all subsequent entrants it would be productive of great public advantage; but he did attack the retrospective application of the clause to those who were already in the service. The junior ranks would derive advantage from it, but they would obtain that advantage at the expense of their seniors. He admitted that the public good ought in all cases to be paramount to all other considerations; but when that public good did not clash with existing interests, those interests ought to be respected. On this subject he might quote the opinions of two Commissions which sat on the subject of general promotion in the army. The Commission which sat in 1854 stated,

“If the system recommended were at once substituted for that which has been hitherto in force without adopting some means to protect the interests of those whose prosperity would be affected by the change, much injustice would be inflicted on those who have relied on the continuance of the present regulations. We are of opinion that a liberal view ought to be taken of the claims of those officers, and that in introducing a change which the public good requires, they ought to be carefully protected from injury and from having their just expectations disappointed.”

In 1858 another Commission was issued, and they reported that,

“It appears to us that an officer enters the army subject to any changes in the existing regulations which Her Majesty from time to time may think necessary for the good of the service to make. Yet, on the other hand, we are of opinion that great care should be taken to introduce these changes in the manner which shall as little as possible prejudice the interests of the officers affected, and that every consideration should be shown which may be compatible with the public objects in view. When great changes are necessary for the advantage of the public service, we hold it to be expedient, because just, to give to individual interests and claims every consideration which is compatible with the attainment of the public objects in view.”

He regretted that the same view was not expressed by the Sanitary Commission. They said—

“It is true that all general rules must occasionally press hard upon individuals, but at the same time they inflict no individual injustice, though they may produce individual hardships, for all are aware of the existence of the rule and of the effect it may have.”

But all officers were not aware of the existence of the rule. One gentleman—he believed it was Dr. Lucas—who received the first intimation of his removal from the service by seeing his name in The Gazette. That was a mode of dismissal in which he apprehended no gentleman would treat his servant. He would now state some cases of the hardships of this rule. The first was the case of an officer who had been thirty years in the service, twenty-one of which were spent abroad, and he was still in full vigour. His colonial service had in fact ruined his prospects. During the Crimean war he was in the Colonies; he had, therefore, no war employment; having no war employment he had not been promoted; and not having been promoted to the rank of Deputy Inspector, he was removed at the age of fifty-five instead of sixty-five. There was another case, that of an officer who was first for promotion when the warrant came out. The rule by which an Inspector General should retire after having served three years had previously been issued. An officer at Malta had not only served these three years, but had been removed from the service; he was, however, kept at Malta when the late Director General should have gone out. It was not convenient to send the latter gallant officer out, and the other was kept at Malta though not in the service. He was afterwards replaced in the service, and received his full retiring allowance, but the effect was, that the officer who had been first for promotion, and who under other circumstances, would have become Deputy Inspector General, lost that advantage in consequence of the delay, because he was fifty-five years of age, and was consequently, by the terms of this warrant, compelled to retire. What did he (Colonel Lindsay) now ask? That those officers who had been forced to retire in the full vigour of life, under a warrant which had no existence when they entered the service, should be fully compensated, inasmuch as by quitting the service they forfeited the high pay and allowances to the enjoyment of which they had a right to look forward under the former warrant. The compensation which a staff surgeon of the first class was to receive was an advance of 1s. 6d. a day. That was what had been said to him (Colonel Lindsay) by way of answer when he brought this matter under the notice of the House on a former occasion. He must, however, say that the answer was anything but a satisfactory one. Eighteenpence a day was not a sufficient compensation for officers, who had passed so many years of their life in the service of the country, and who had been deprived of that higher rank to which they had looked forward, and which they would have received only from this alteration. In the proposals just circulated by the Admiralty for the compulsory retirement of naval officers at the age of sixty the scale was much more liberal. It was there proposed that naval officers who would have been in receipt of 10*s.* 6*d.* a day should have their half-pay increased to 18*s.*, and those whose position entitled them to 12*s.* 6*d.* would receive 20*s.* He hoped he should hear from the right hon. Gentleman that some change would be made, especially as there was in the retiring allowances proposed for some of the naval officers a precedent, which might, in this case, be followed with great advantage, and with a due regard to what was just on all hands.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to re-consider the Eleventh Clause of the Army Medical Warrant of October 1858, as far as relates to its respective application to the Medical Officers at that time serving in the ranks affected, having due regard to the efficiency of the Public Service."

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT regretted very much that he could not accept the view which the hon. and gallant Member took of this question. The hon. and gallant Gentleman admitted that compulsory retirement even in the army was necessary for the public good. [Colonel LINDSAY: In this particular case.] Well, that compulsory retirement was necessary in this particular case; but he complained of the age at which the retirement was placed; that it was placed at an earlier age in the case of surgeon and surgeon major than in that of deputy inspector and inspector. But there was this difference between the two cases—that the former officers were executive—they prescribed and operated; but the deputy inspector and inspector were simply administrative. That was the reason why the retiring age was placed, in the case of the one class—surgeons major and surgeons—at fifty-five, while in the other—deputy inspectors and inspectors—it was fixed at sixty-five. He believed that the rule was a perfectly sound one, and had been productive of much advantage to the medical profession, though like most other regulations it might in some cases be productive of individual hardship. He believed that compulsory retirement in the case of medical officers was less disadvantageous than was supposed. As a general rule, medical officers on their retirement from the army got into practice in civil life as consulting practitioners, and in most instances a fair amount of practice was the result. In fact they themselves had always urged that they should be allowed to retire at the age of fifty—five years earlier than that fixed for their compulsory retirement—if they wished to do so. As to the question of the retrospective operation of the warrant, it was true that the warrant was retrospective, and acted upon all men who were already in the service; but to postpone a change of the kind till every man in the service at a particular date had left, would be to postpone to an indefinite period an alteration which it was admitted was beneficial to those now entering the service. He must ask the hon. and gallant Gentleman, had no advantage accrued to the medical officers from the warrant of which he now complained? Had there not been established by that warrant an increase of rank, an increase of full pay, and an increase of half-pay, in favour of those officers? Their position, as a class, was immensely improved by it. But if they allowed officers to say, "I shall take this because it is an advantage to me, but I refuse to submit to this other, because I consider it a disadvantage to me," they would get into inextricable confusion. The hon. and gallant Member had referred to individual cases of hardship; but he (Mr. Sidney Herbert) did not admit that illustration by personal cases was the best kind of argument in cases of this kind. He should prefer to deal with the case generally. He admitted that there was a particular provision in this warrant that was open to argument against it; but it was counterbalanced by those which conferred the advantages to which he had just alluded. In the case of the captains of the navy there was nothing to gild the pill for them when they were compelled to retire, and, therefore, it was necessary to give them a larger retiring allowance; but there were several excellent medical appointments in military establishments which did not require any great activity, but might be regarded as retirements. The Government had exclusively devoted those to officers who were affected by the warrant of 1858. One of those was in the College of Sandhurst, another in the Asylum at Chelsea, a third in the Hibernian School, a fourth at Enfield, and so on. He thought it was mischievous to be constantly changing, or trying to change, that which had been done. Had he yielded to the suggestions made even during the present Session for alterations in military regulations of recent date, the Army Estimates would have been increased by some £40,000 or £50,000 per annum. He was anxious to do all in his power to meet what he admitted to be cases of individual hardship, but he thought the best mode of doing this was to give to the officers who had been affected by the warrant priority in appointments to the different situations which might fall vacant and to which they were eligible.

Colonel Lindsay

COLONEL DICKSON thought that the provision in the warrant by which higher ranks were given to medical officers was in some respects unwise; but he concurred with his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Lindsay) in thinking that an injustice was done to many of those officers by the retrospective operation of the warrant in the manner so clearly pointed out by him; and for that reason he should support his hon. and gallant Friend's proposition. In dealing with such cases as these expense ought never to be allowed to outweigh the claims of justice.

COLONEL LINDSAY in reply quoted the evidence given before the Sanitary Commission by the director general, Dr. Smith, in which he stated that the rank of first-class staff surgeon was generally not executive but inspectorial—that was, that the first-class staff surgeons did not, for the most part, treat disease, but inspected those who did, and took their share in the administration of the Hospitals. As he (Colonel Lindsay) thought that his object might be effected by the ventilation of the matter, he should not press his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

VOTES FOR DISQUALIFIED CANDIDATES BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. BUTT moved for leave to bring in a Bill to amend and declare the Law relating to Votes given for a disqualified Candidate at Parliamentary Elections. The hon. and learned Member said that it was a perfectly well established principle of law, that if the party voted for a person who was disqualified, with a full knowledge of such disqualification, his vote was forfeited. But the decisions of Committees of that House, in respect to votes for disqualified candidates, were contradictory. Some of them went the length of holding that the mere service of notice on the elector of the candidate's disqualification forfeited his vote for that candidate if disqualification was afterwards established. In some cases the question of disqualification turned upon a nice question of law; so that it was going a great length to say that the mere putting of a paper in an elector's hand, and stating that the person for whom he was going to vote was disqualified, forfeited his vote, in case the Committee of the House afterwards decided that the candidate was disqualified. In 1835, in the case of Mr. Feargus O'Connor, who had been returned by a majority of votes for the county of Cork, a Committee decided that a lease of lives renewable for ever was not a qualification which entitled a man to sit in Parliament for a county. Notice of Mr. O'Connor's disqualification had been served on the electors; but it was almost universally believed in Ireland that a lease of lives renewable for ever was a qualification. Nevertheless, the votes of the electors who had voted for Mr. O'Connor were declared forfeited, and Mr. Longfield, a relative of the hon. and learned Member for Mallow, was declared by the Committee to have been duly elected, though it was notorious that the great majority of the electors were opposed to him. In like manner, Mr. C. O'Dwyer had been unseated as Member for Drogheda, and his opponent, who had not got one-third of the number of votes recorded for him, declared duly elected, though the latter was the last man in Ireland whom the great body of the electors would have returned. The voters in such cases could not be expected to know that the candidates were disqualified, for there was no reason why they should take for granted the mere statements of the opposite parties upon the subject. The state of the law was such, that if Committees were to follow some of the precedents, it would be possible that, without the slightest fault on the part of the electors, a person might obtain a seat in that House whose political principles were disliked by nine-tenths of the constituency he would be supposed to represent. The question then arose how was that evil to be remedied? It had been proposed they should declare that no one could be duly elected a Member of the House for whom a minority only of the electors had voted. But he was not prepared to go quite that length. A person might give his vote for a foreigner, or for a man convicted of high treason, or any individual who was manifestly disqualified by law from sitting in that House; and it was only fair that he should pay the penalty of such perversity of conduct. All that it was necessary to provide in such cases was that votes should not be thrown away which had been given with an intention of making a fair and reasonable use of the franchise. The measure which he then proposed to introduce would contain three provisions. It would declare that in no instance should a vote be deemed null in consequence of its having been given to a disqualified candidate, unless the Committee which inquired into the case should be convinced that it had been given perversely, and with a knowledge that it had been given to a person legally incapacitated from sitting in that House. The Bill would further provide that the vote should not be annulled, unless a notice of the disqualification of the candidate had been given before the candidate had been put in nomination; and it would further contain a provision to the effect that a vote should be held valid in case of a candidate being unseated for corrupt practices, unless the corruption had been proved previously to the election, and before a legally constituted tribunal. With that explanation he would beg for leave to introduce the Bill.

Mr. M'MAHON seconded the Motion.
Leave given.

"Bill to declare and amend the Law relating to Votes given for a disqualified Candidate at Parliamentary Elections, ordered to be brought in by Mr. BUTT, Mr. MELLOR, and Mr. M'MAHON."

Bill presented and read 1^o.

SELLING AND HAWKING GOODS ON SUNDAY BILL.

SECOND READING. PRIVILEGE.

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. DIGBY SEYMOUR rose to call the attention of the Speaker to a question of privilege. There was a clause (the 11th) in this Bill which provided that a certain part of the penalties which might be imposed under its provisions within the Metropolitan Police district or within the City of London should be paid over to the Receiver of the Metropolitan Police district or to the Chamberlain of the City of London, as the case might be, and applied in aid of the expenses of the police. Now, he (Mr. Digby Seymour) understood that a considerable portion of the cost of the Metropolitan and City police was provided out of the Consolidated Fund, and if that were so, the Bill was one which would lessen the taxation imposed upon Her Majesty's subjects. Two Resolutions were passed by that House bearing on such legislation in the years 1831 and 1849 respectively. The first of those Resolutions declared that when, in any Bill sent down from the House of Lords for the purpose of receiving the concurrence of this House, it appeared that any pecuniary penalties were imposed, raised, or taken away, the Speaker, before the second reading of the measure, should report to the House whether the object of the provisions imposing, varying, or taking away such penalties was merely to punish and prevent offences, and whether it was expedient for the House to exercise its privilege with respect to such enactments. If there ever was a moment when it was expedient for the House to assert its authority over questions of taxation it was the present. The Resolution of 1849 was an amendment of the rules of the House as modified by the Resolution of 1831. It declared—

Mr. Butt

"That with respect to any Bill brought to this House from the House of Lords, or returned by the House of Lords to this House, with Amendments, whereby any pecuniary penalty, forfeiture or fee shall be authorized, imposed, appropriated, regulated, varied or extinguished, this House will not insist on its ancient and undoubted privileges in the following cases:—

"1. When the object of such pecuniary penalty or forfeiture is to secure the execution of the Act, or the punishment or prevention of offences."

"2. Where such fees are imposed in respect of benefit taken or service rendered under the Act, and in order to the execution of the Act, and are not made payable into the Treasury or Exchequer, or in aid of the Public Revenue, and do not form the ground of public accounting by the parties receiving the same, either in respect of deficit or surplus.

"3. When such Bill shall be a Private Bill for a Local or Personal Act."

The first clause of that Resolution apparently relaxed the general effect of the Resolution to which he had referred, but the objection he raised was supported by the second. He submitted that the present Bill, being one which would indirectly come in aid of the revenue, it ought to be laid aside and not entertained by the House.

MR. BRIGHT: I think it very likely that the House may consider there is some force in the objection which has been raised by the hon. and learned Member for Southampton (Mr. D. Seymour); but I think it a great pity that the case was not brought before your notice at some time before the second reading of this Bill, in order that you might have looked into the case and been fully prepared to give an opinion with regard to it. But the hon. and learned Gentleman is not to blame, because I believe his sagacity has only very recently enabled him to discover the point, and I believe during the time when you were not in the Chair this evening. I do not make this observation for the sake of blaming the hon. and learned Gentleman; but for your convenience, and that of the House, I think it would be better not to proceed with the Bill now, but to adjourn the further consideration for a few days, in order that you may have an opportunity of considering the question fully, and to see whether or not we are establishing a precedent which hereafter we may have occasion to regret. I do not know whether I should be in order in moving this at this stage—but if it is thought I am in order, I would move that the Order of the Day for the second reading stand adjourned to this day week.

MR. SPEAKER said, it appeared to him that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Southampton had taken rather a nice distinction in regard to the Bill. As it was very desirable that no opinion should be given on the point thus raised without due consideration, he should prefer the opportunity which would be afforded by the adjournment of the Bill for considering the subject.

MR. DIGBY SEYMOUR said, that the point had not occurred to him before, but he had lost no time in bringing the matter before the House the moment he discovered the informality.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, that if the Speaker wished for time to consider this matter, he certainly should not object to the adjournment. He must say, however, that he thought the course taken by the hon. and learned Gentleman was rather unprecedented. He had not given the slightest notice of his intention, and he (Lord R. Montagu) thought it would have been better had they gone into the principle of the Bill. The hon. and learned Gentleman expected that fines would be levied: but the Resolution said:

"The House will not insist upon its ancient and undoubted privileges, &c., where such fines are not made payable to the Treasury or the Exchequer."

Now, the fines imposed by the Bill were not made payable to the Treasury or the Exchequer. [Read!] Well, "or in aid of the public revenue." [Mr. D. SEYMOUR: Hear!] It appeared the hon. and learned Gentleman rested his case upon that. How was an Act which levied fines to prevent Sunday trading to be held to be "in aid of the public revenue?" Was it to be supposed that no Act could be brought in by the House of Lords, or that no penalty could be enforced by them for the disobedience of that Act? It appeared to him that this passage which the hon. and learned Gentleman had read excluded altogether the question of privilege. He was glad, however, that the hon. Member entirely disproved the only solid argument which had been raised against the Bill. It had been very generally asserted, that the Bill, if passed into law, would intend to suppress Sunday Trading, but that it would be as inoperative as the present law. But now, on the contrary, the objection which is raised rests on the supposition that the Bill would be operative, and that fines would be raised under its provisions. As, however, time to consider the question was desired by the Speaker, he moved that the debate be adjourned to that day fortnight.

Notice being taken of Clause 11, relating to the Appropriation of Penalties, which was alleged to be inconsistent with the Privileges of this House, Second Reading deferred till Friday 29th June.

TITHE COMMUTATION BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clause 1, (Corn Rents under Local Acts may be converted into Tithe Rent-charge).

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE expressed his opinion that the measure would be an extremely useful one.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he was glad to learn that the Bill met the approval of the hon. Baronet.

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE remarked that the average prices of corn had fluctuated more since the establishment of free trade than they had done before.

Clause agreed to, as were the remaining clauses.

The House resumed.

LORD HENNIKER moved the following Clause to follow Clause 30 :—

"Whenever it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the Commissioners that by reason of error as to boundary or otherwise, any rent-charge or portion of rent-charge shall have been charged by any confirmed instrument of apportionment on lands not within the parish in respect of the tithes of which the aggregate rent-charge, the apportionment of which shall have been so confirmed, was agreed or awarded to be paid, the Commissioners may, if they see fit upon the application of the owner or owners of the said lands, and without the consent of any owner of land in the said parish, or of the person for the time being entitled to the receipt of the said rent-charge, by an order under their hands and seal, direct that such rent-charge or portion of rent-charge so charged on lands not within the parish, shall be redeemed by the payment by the owners of lands charged with the residue of the said rent-charge by the said apportionment or any of them, of such a sum of money, and within such time as the said Commissioners shall, by such order, direct and appoint, such sum not being less than twenty-four times the amount of such rent-charge; and, if there shall be any question touching the situation or boundary of the lands which shall be alleged to have been erroneously included in the said apportionment, the Commissioners shall have the same powers for hearing and determining the same as are given by the said first recited Act for hearing and determining any difference whereby the making of an award of rent-charge in lieu of tithes is hindered."

The noble Lord said that he submitted for consideration and adoption the clause of which he had given notice, and stated that it was for the purpose of affording a remedy for a grievance inadvertently, or perhaps somewhat through their own negligence, caused to owners and occupiers of land and tenements, whereon apportionment of rent-charge had been twice awarded in consequence of disputed boundaries of adjoining parishes, and thus they have been rendered liable to payment of a double amount of rent-charge for the same property—this clause, being an extension of the powers given by the Act of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 73, and the 10th & 11 Vict. c. 104. He trusted there would be no objection to the proposition for rectifying so palpable an error, and he might add injustice, as that alluded to, which had arisen in many instances; for, unfortunately, the apportionments being confirmed, there was no appeal, nor had the Tithe Commissioners the power to relieve the parties concerned.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that he had no objection to the clause of the noble Lord.

Clause added.

Bill reported, as amended; to be considered on Monday next.

TENURE AND IMPROVEMENT OF LAND (IRELAND) BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,—"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. HASSARD said, that since the reprinting of the Bill he found no Amendment in it sufficient to remove his objections to the measure. The first part of the Bill was intended to enable owners of property to raise money for the purpose of improvement; but there was an Act of Parliament already passed that enabled them to do this better than was proposed by the present Bill. The fund from which it was to come was one to be objected to. There was a still greater objection to the machinery by which the Bill was to be carried out, the application for the purpose having to be made to the Board of Works. It was also proposed that loans applied for should be by application to the Chairman of Quarter Sessions; but although he had a great respect for Chairmen of Quarter Sessions, he thought that they were not qualified for the purpose. He was to be a barrister of ten years' standing; but unless he was a resident and knew the country, he could have no adequate local knowledge and no knowledge of land. He would suggest that this first part of the Bill be left out altogether. The Bill also proposed to introduce the provisions of the Montgomery Act; but he did not think this could be effective. He did not think that any man would consent to submit his case to the Chairman of Quarter Sessions, or, if done at all, it should be submitted to the Quarter Sessions itself. With regard to the leasing powers, he thought it would be much better to adopt the Bill on that subject which had been introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin. As to the third part of the Bill, which related to tenants' improvements, and for which object alone he believed the Bill was introduced, he thought it ought to depend upon agreement between landlord and tenant. He saw no more reason why they should interfere in contracts between landlord and tenant than in contracts between the owner of a ship and the man who chartered it. His principal objection was that it was sectional legislation. It applied only to Ireland, but he was at a loss to understand why, if it were good for Ireland, it was not equally good for England. He hoped, therefore, that it would be made an Imperial measure.

COLONEL GREVILLE said, the Secretary for Ireland deserved great credit for having introduced the Bill and shown a desire to settle a question which had been long agitated; and he thought the objections of the hon. Gentleman applied rather to the details than the principle of the measure. Although it did not go so far as he could wish, and did not meet what he considered the justice of the case, he was prepared to go into Committee to give every assistance to the Government and to amend those details which could be amended without endangering the passing of the Bill. It was said that there was great apathy, and that the farmers in Ireland did not call for the measure. The fact was that the farmers were tenants at will, and they were afraid to set themselves in opposition to their landlords lest they should be told they could leave. But what was just eight years ago was just now. It was right that a tenant who had, with the tacit consent of his landlord, made improvements which increased the lettable value, and was suitable to the estate, should receive compensation upon eviction. But as Bills with retrospective clauses had failed to pass for the last four or five years, it was not likely that the House would grant such a demand now. There was no chance of passing a retrospective clause, and it was only delaying the Bill to propose it. The same might be said of the provisions which the hon. Member for Tipperary (The O'Donoghue) wished to introduce into the Bill. He hoped, therefore, that the hon. Gentleman would be content to take what was now in the Bill without endangering its passing into law by proposing Amendments which it was not possible to carry. Contrary to the opinion of the hon. Baronet who opposed the second reading of the Bill, he thought it was of great advantage that all the different branches of the subject were treated in one Bill. If the Bill passed into law, though it would not settle the question so effectively as he could wish, it would still do a great deal of good, and he should therefore support it.

MR. MAGUIRE: I ask the indulgence of the House for a very few moments, while I refer to a matter of some importance, as well to several hon. Members as to myself. It is well that, as we are now on the eve of the discussion of a measure which is of vital interest to the people of Ireland, there should be no misconception, either in this House, or elsewhere, as to the reasons for the course which was adopted in 1858 by gentlemen with whom I had the honour to act, in reference to what is termed the retrospective principle. I have been specially attacked for the course which we were compelled to adopt in 1858, and I have even been denounced—I admit by a very small and insignificant number of persons—as a traitor to the cause of the tenant. Now what are the real facts of the case? As my hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Greville) has stated, the retrospective clause of the Bill of 1855 was negatived by a majority of this House. In 1857, Mr. Moore, then Member for Mayo, introduced his Bill, or the Bill of the League. Mr. Moore, being naturally anxious to push his Bill as far as he possibly could, organized a deputation to the noble Lord who was then as now at the head of the Government. The deputation consisted of 44 or 45 Irish Members, as influential as any who have ever represented any class. Mr. Moore stated his case, and wished to know what course the noble Lord was inclined to take with respect to the further progress of the Bill. The noble Lord expressed strong objection to the Bill, but to one feature—the leading feature—of it in a special degree. That was the provision for retrospective compensation. The noble Lord even refused to permit the Bill to be read a second time and sent into Committee, saying that he would not sanction or affirm the principle of the Bill. Mr. Moore soon after lost his seat, and the Bill was not further proceeded with. What happened in 1858? I, with my hon. Friend the Member for Tipperary, had the honour of re-introducing the same Bill that year. When the discussion took place on the Motion for a second reading, the retrospective principle of the Bill was denounced in the strongest manner by the leaders on both sides of the House, by the noble Lord, the present first Minister and by the noble Lord, the Member for Cockermouth (Lord Naas), who represented on that occasion the opinions and determination of his party. The result of that condemnation was, that on the division we were beaten by more than three to one—I believe by four to one. And it is the fact, not before stated, that it was only by the persuasion of myself and others that several Irish and several English Members were induced to vote for the second reading, but on the understanding that by so doing they sanctioned the principle of compensation but not the particular application of the principle. Had that not been so we should have been beaten by as many as six to one. Well, Sir, what were we to do, after such a division?—what course were we to adopt, after a pronouncement so emphatic, and a majority so overwhelming? Were we to act the part of hypocrites, and continue, for party purposes, to keep up a false cry in the country? Were we to tell a trusting people that a measure embracing retrospective compensation could be carried under the circumstances then existing? I should be ashamed of myself—I should be unworthy of my position, as a Member of this House, if I lent myself to so dishonest and so base an imposture. What did we then do? Some twelve or fourteen Members of us determined to endeavour to effect something for the people we represented, although we could no longer hope to obtain all that we desired to accomplish. We saw that some legislation was absolutely necessary, we knew that a general feeling of discontent pervaded our people,—we beheld them leaving the country in vast bodies,—we felt that this migration originated in an almost universal sense of insecurity, and in that “hope deferred” which “maketh the heart sick.” We waited on the then leader of this House, and through him we urged on the Government—which we had previously supported—supported solely on public grounds—the absolute necessity which existed for legislation on this subject; while at the same time we stated—I certainly did—that we could not ask for the re-introduction of a clause which had been defeated but a few days before by an overwhelming majority, and the re-introduction of which we felt convinced would ensure the immediate rejection of the measure we demanded. We did not insist on that which was no longer possible of attainment; but we did ask for an honest and comprehensive measure of prospective compensation; and, Sir, if I am called a traitor to the cause of the tenant for the conduct which I have described, I think I need not care much for the judgment of the person who called me such. As to the principle of retrospective compensation, I hold the same opinion with respect to it now that I ever did. I think it as just and as fair as that of prospective compensation; but I find that, although it is a just and right principle, and one which in conscience and equity ought to be maintained, I cannot avoid remembering that this is an assembly with landlord sympathies and landlord instincts; and believing that this assembly will not recognize it, I certainly will not condescend to be a party to perpetuating a mockery and a delusion upon a subject of such grave importance.

Mr. Maguire

MR. BUTT said, he was anxious to go into Committee on the Bill, and deprecated further discussion at the present moment.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY never knew a Bill that had so little in it, and considered that it was even a greater sham than the Reform Bill. The Conservatives, for that reason, liked the Bill, and would not oppose the Motion to go into Committee, because they did not object to swallow this harmless “bread pill,” as it had been called. The Bill introduced by Lord Derby’s Government contained a very strong retrospective clause. It was carried in 1853 by a large majority, when the late Solicitor General for England (Sir Hugh Cairns) voted, as he had always done, for the retrospective clause. The noble Lord at the head of the present Government also voted for it, and agreed in 1855 to support the principle. Hon. Gentlemen opposite, representing extreme tenant league views, were then loud in their support of a retrospective clause, and urged that the Bill must be rejected if it were not retained. It was monstrous, therefore, for them now to get up and oppose and denounce a retrospective clause.

Question put, and agreed to.
House in Committee.

MR. MASSEY in the Chair.

Clause 1, agreed to.

Clause 2 (Application of Act).

COLONEL DUNNE objected to the proposed title inasmuch as it limited by anticipation the operation of the Act to Ireland. He moved that the clause be postponed.

MR. HENNESSY said, there was no precedent for the insertion of an interpretation clause at the beginning of a Bill.

MR. CARDWELL said, he should have thought it was a matter of the greatest possible indifference whether the clause was placed in the early or the latter part of the Bill. It was put in the early part, in order that the Committee might have notice of the subject-matter with which it had to deal, which, in his opinion, was a great advantage.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE apologized to Irish Members for interfering in the discussion, but objected to the Motion for the postponement of the clause as informal, and thought it ought not to have been received by the Chairman. A clause could be postponed by consent on the suggestion of the Gentleman having charge of the Bill, but in no other way. There could not be two questions before the Committee, and the question in Committee was always upon some Amendment, or that the clause should stand part of the Bill, a question interposed that a clause be postponed, was a Previous Question, and in Committee the undoubted rule was, that the Previous Question could not be put. Such had been the invariable practice of his predecessor and successor in the office of Chairman of Committees as to Motions for postponement, and such was the principle on which he himself had acted during his tenure of that office; otherwise their discussions in Committee would be interminably protracted.

THE CHAIRMAN, in reference to what had fallen from the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock, said he understood the practice was different from that stated by the right hon. Gentleman. It was undoubtedly a rule of the House that a Motion to postpone a Vote in Committee of Supply could not be put, because there was no period to which the Vote could be postponed; but it was quite competent to any Gentleman to move the postponement of a clause in Committee on a Bill, because the arrangement of the clauses was a matter over which the Committee had control. A Motion to that effect on the part of the Minister or the Gentleman introducing the Bill was constantly agreed to, and it certainly would not have been competent for him to refuse to put the Motion.

LORD NAAS rejoiced at the decision which had just been made, that in Committee the House was at liberty to consider which portions of a Bill it deemed most important to discuss; and believed that it would facilitate their future deliberations. The practice of introducing an interpretation clause at the beginning of a Bill was certainly a departure from the usual practice, but it was a convenient course, and one which, if generally adopted, would prevent the inconsiderate extension of measures to a part of the United Kingdom for which they were not intended.

COLONEL DUNNE withdrew his Motion. Clause agreed to; as was also Clause 3. Clause 4 (Clerk of the Peace).

MR. VINCENT SCULLY submitted that the Bill could be better carried out by the Landed Estates Court and the Valuation Office than by the Quarter Sessions.

LORD NAAS said, this question was most important, but it would be best raised upon the 10th clause.

MR. CARDWELL accepted this suggestion; and thereupon the clause was agreed to.

Clauses 5 to 9 were also agreed to.

The House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again on Tuesday next, at Twelve of the clock.

House adjourned at One o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, June 18, 1860.

MINUTES.] Took the Oaths.—Several Lords.

PUBLIC BILLS.—2^a Infants Marriage Act Amendment.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

RESOLUTION.

On the Motion of Lord REDESDALE, it was Resolved,

“That this House will not read any Bill a Second Time after Tuesday, the 17th of July, except Bills of Aid or Supply, or any Bill in relation to which the House shall have resolved, before the Second Reading is moved, that the Circumstances which render Legislation on the Subject of the same expedient are either of such recent Occurrence or real Urgency as to render the immediate Consideration of the same necessary.

CATHEDRAL AND COLLEGIATE CHURCHES COMMISSION.

QUESTION.

LORD LYTTTELTON, in rising to put the question of which he had given notice, Whether Her Majesty's Government intend to bring in any measures founded on the Report of the Commission for inquiring into the Condition of Cathedral and Collegiate Churches (1852), or the Report of the Select Committee of the House of Lords for inquiring into the Deficiency of Means of Spiritual Instruction and Places of Divine Worship in the Metropolis and populous Places (1858), said that these were strong instances of a practice too common in these days, by which important subjects were examined and reported, or with the utmost diligence by Royal Commissions or Parliamentary Committees, but nothing further was done in the matter. The two bodies to whom the Question referred had applied themselves with great diligence to the investigation of the subjects. The recommendations of the Cathedral Commissioners alone occupied six folio pages, and in every case their recommendations were proper matters for the consideration of the Legislature. If these recommendations were shelved it would be an extraordinary instance of waste of labour upon a difficult and important subject. The subject of spiritual destitution was one of a different kind; and on this point there could be no doubt that the Report of the Committee of their Lordships' House which sat about two years ago had had considerable effect in diffusing information throughout the country. The Committee also had made various recommendations, one only of which had been taken up, namely, that relating to the union of benefices, a subject on which a Bill had been introduced by the right rev. Prelate near him (the Bishop of London); they had suggested that an alteration should take place in the law relating to pews and the sale of livings under the patronage of the Crown; also that power should be given to tenants for life to leave property for churches and parsonages in the same way as was now done for purposes of education. These and other minor recommendations were made by the Committee, and there were also in the evidence of Archdeacon Sinelair recommendations of various kinds on the same subject. He did not ask for legislation on these matters this Session or in any particular Session, but he wished to know whether the Government could hold out any hope that in a future Session they would be prepared to carry out any of the recommendations to which he had made reference.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, he need hardly remind his noble Friend that it would be hopeless to hold out the expectation that legislation with the purpose of carrying out the resolutions and recommendations of the voluminous Report of this Commission could be initiated at so late a period of the Session as the 18th June. Indeed, his noble Friend had acknowledged that he did not put the question in the hope that any legislation could take place in the present Session, but rather with a view to ascertain whether the Government, in a succeeding Session, would be ready to take up the question. He, however, thought that in matters of this kind, except under very peculiar circumstances, it was not desirable that a Government should pledge themselves as to the course of legislation they intended to propose in an ensuing Session. Such a course he held to be neither politic, wise, nor just. The Report of this Commission was very voluminous and complicated, many of its recommendations were at variance with the course of legislation for many years past, and great caution was required in dealing with such a large subject. Two points recommended in the Report of the Commission had already become the subject of legislation—first of all, that which referred to the union of benefices, and, in the next place, that provision which enacted that where surplus funds were paid into the hands of Ecclesiastical Commissioners the locality from which they were drawn should have the first claim upon them, if its spiritual necessities were not already provided for. With regard to the first of these, his noble Friend was aware that a Bill had been brought in on the subject by the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of London), which had passed their Lordships' House and was now in the Commons; and, as regarded the second point, a Bill had been brought into the other House by the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in which there was a clause to enable the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to meet local deficiencies. This clause would, he hoped, meet the views of his noble Friend on that subject. At any rate, he was unable to hold out to his noble Friend any hope of further legislation on this subject during the present Session.

Lord Lyttelton

CHURCH TEMPORALITIES (IRELAND) ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order.)
Clause 6 (Commissioners appointed by Her Majesty and the Archbishops to be removable.)

EARL POWIS said, that this clause contained an extraordinary provision relative to the removal of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners by the two Archbishops of Ireland. By Clause 1, it was enacted that there should be two Ecclesiastical Commissioners receiving a salary,—one to be appointed by the Crown, in order that the Government might be properly represented, and the other by the Primate and Archbishop of Dublin, jointly, to protect the interests of the Church; but the 6th clause provided that the latter Commissioner should be removable, not by the authorities who appointed him, but by the Crown. In the analogous case of the English Church a directly contrary course was adopted, they were appointed during good behaviour, and he thought that the English precedent was the one to be observed in this case. He would, therefore, move as an Amendment that the Commissioners appointed by Her Majesty should be removable by the Crown, and that those appointed by the Lord Primate and the Archbishop of Dublin should be removable by those Prelates.

THE EARL OF ST. GERMAN'S said, that this was no new provision created for the first time by this Bill. The 3 and 4 William IV. already gave to the Crown the power sought for in the Bill, which merely sought to continue that power. Moreover, the Act in question had been originally framed by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners themselves, and had been passed with their concurrence.

THE BISHOP OF DERRY said, he thought the matter of little importance, but preferred that the clause should stand as it did.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, that if any alteration or Amendment were made, it should consist in the reduction of the two Commissioners to one, and he believed that was the general impression in Ireland. One Commissioner, he believed, had recently transacted the business.

THE EARL OF ST. GERMAN'S said, he understood the work was more than one Commissioner could transact, although it was true that during the illness of Sir Henry Meredith, Mr. Quin had transacted the business of the Department.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 8 (Officers to be appointed).

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE proposed an Amendment to "Omit ('as the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for Ireland now pay to such Officers respectively, or such other Salaries as the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for Ireland shall from time to time hereafter, with the approbation and consent of the Lord Lieutenant, testified in writing under his hand, think fit to allow') and insert in lieu thereof ('the several Salaries set forth in the Schedule to this Act annexed, such Salaries to be payable from and after the passing of this Act, due credit being given to each of such Officers for his past services')."

THE EARL OF ST. GERMAN'S objected that it was very unusual to fix such salaries in a Bill. The more desirable course would be to leave the matter in the hands of the Commissioners, as was usually done in regard to similar departments.

THE BISHOP OF DERRY stated that it was the intention of the Commissioners to re-arrange the salaries of their officers.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received on Thursday next.

THE ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS' VALUATION.

QUESTION.

LORD PORTMAN inquired of Her Majesty's Government, What progress had been made by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in the Valuation ordered by the Act 3 & 4 Vict., c. 183, s. 77? The matter was one of very considerable importance, and it was very desirable that the valuation in question should proceed. From circumstances, however, which had come within his observation, it appeared as if the Commissioners had been guilty of some neglect of duty or disobedience of the law. Unless some answer could be given, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners ought either to ask Parliament to repeal the clause, or else Parliament ought to put such a pressure upon them as to oblige them to carry out the law. His Question appeared to assume that some progress had been made. He had, however, reason to believe that, had he moved for a Return, the answer would have been "nil," and he asked the question to elicit some information.

THE EARL OF CHICHESTER said, that his noble Friend had answered his own question. The object for which this valuation was to be made, or rather completed, was to enable the Commissioners to ascertain the value of the poor livings. One reason why they had not proceeded to cause a fresh valuation to be made was that they had obtained no additional powers since the last valuation, and there was no reason to believe that any new valuation would be more accurate than the last. The value of the property they were called upon to deal with was constantly changing, and the Commissioners believed that they were justified in postponing the valuation, in consequence of the great loss of time and labour, to say nothing of expense, which would be involved without commensurate results.

INDIA.—EUROPEAN TROOPS.

RETURNS MOVED FOR.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE, in moving for certain Returns referring to the amount of European regiments in India, said he did not intend to enter upon a discussion of the difficult question of the expediency or wisdom of abolishing the local army; for abolition it would be, whether called by the name of amalgamation or absorption, if the Queen's regular army was to do all the work of European troops in India. Upon that point he had formed no decided opinion; but as it was mixed up with the question of the whole administration of India, he thought it important that full information should be given to the House. The Returns for which he moved would not give much information by themselves, but they would add to the information conveyed by the Papers which had been presented to the other House, and the presentation of which to their Lordships had been most unaccountably delayed. The noble Marquess concluded by moving an Address for—

“Return of the Number of local European Regiments in each of the Presidencies of British India, and the Total Amount of that Force on the 1st January 1830, 1835, 1840, 1845, 1850, 1856, 1857, 1858, 1859, and 1860; specifying whether Infantry, Cavalry, or Artillery: Also,

“Return of the Number of Regiments and the Total Amount of Force of the Queen's Army in the same Presidencies at the same Periods: And also,

“Return of the Number of Recruits sent from England in each of the last Four Years to different Regiments of either Army; and of the Number of Officers and Soldiers sent Home invalided or discharged from either Service in those Years:

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, it was extremely important that the information now asked for should be supplied; but he should, on this occasion, imitate the example of the noble Marquess, and not go into the general question respecting the manner in which it was proposed to deal with the local army in India. At the same time he would suggest for the consideration of the Government a matter upon which silence had hitherto been observed, and which, though of great importance, must, he presumed, have escaped attention. One of the reasons assigned for the amalgamation of Her Majesty's army and the local army was, that it was most desirable that all the regiments serving in India should from time to time come to this country. Now, it was impossible for Parliament, within any period to which they might reasonably look forward, to give effect to that object. He apprehended that Parliament would be bound by its own solemn pledge, recently given within the last two years, and that it would not impose what hitherto it never had imposed—compulsory service upon any body of soldiers whatever. The position in which the affair stood was this:—The Company's army was transferred to the Crown, subject to the same conditions as those on which it was held by the Company—that is to say, it was liable to serve within the same territorial limits only, as if it had continued in the service of the Company. It was impossible, therefore, for Parliament to give to the Crown any power to send from India to England any portion of that force, unless the men should choose, on being discharged from the service, to re-enlist as if they had entered into one of the Queen's regiments. Now, it would be rather dangerous to let the bird loose from the cage, in the hope of its flying back into the window. That experiment had lately been tried, and had failed. Last year they had lost 16,000 men, and this year it was possible they might lose 15,000 more. It was not until the expiration of the men's service, which continued for ten years, and of the officer's service, which continued for life, that it would be possible for the Government, under any circumstances, to direct the transfer of any local force now in India to this country.

EARL GRANVILLE, in assenting to the returns, deprecated discussion at the present stage of this question, and until the whole matter was before their Lordships.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, under the circumstances he had stated, this amalgamation, however important it might be, would be practically deferred, in the case of the men, until the expiration of ten years; and in the case of officers, during the whole of their lives.

VISCOUNT HARDINGE said, there was one question which he wished to ask the noble Earl—namely, whether if an officer was once appointed to the Staff, he remained there for life, and was never remanded to his regiment?

EARL GRANVILLE thought, it would be desirable to postpone this question, as the whole subject of the Staff was under the consideration of the Government. He, therefore, deprecated any discussion upon it at present.

VISCOUNT HARDINGE asked when the papers moved for would be laid upon the table?

EARL GRANVILLE: Probably to-morrow.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH asked the Government, in laying the papers on this subject upon the table, to publish, in extenso, the letter of Lord Canning, of which, as yet, only an extract had been produced. He hoped the whole despatch might be printed entire, without injury to the public service.

Motion agreed to.

ITALY.—NAPLES.—RUMOURED INTERFERENCE OF FRANCE.—QUESTION.

LORD BROUGHAM (who had attempted to put this Question before the Orders of the Day) said:—My Lords, the experience of this evening teaches us that in order to put a Question to the Government on any subject, however urgent or important, it is necessary on every occasion to give notice of the question, and have it printed amongst the Orders of the Day. Such a course will be very inconvenient, and will often give rise to long and unnecessary discussions; for I have observed that when questions are asked without notice, they are at once answered, and there is an end of them; but that when notice is given they almost invariably lead to debates, which may sometimes be of long duration. The Question I am about to put to my noble Friend, the Lord President, arises from an impression that has prevailed for the last two days, both in Paris and London, and which has created very considerable alarm in both cities. I hope and trust that I shall receive as distinct a denial of it as my noble Friend and his colleagues are capable of giving;—but, in my opinion, their denial of having received any information or notice upon this subject from the other side of the water will be in itself a substantial contradiction of the report. It has been said, both in Paris and London, during the last two days, that the French Government are either sending, or are preparing to send, a very considerable force to the south of Italy—to the kingdom of Naples. [The Earl of ELLENBOROUGH: A military force?] A military force. A naval force they have already there, consisting of seven ships; but the despatch of a military force, as I am reminded by the noble Earl, stands in a totally different position, and naturally creates very considerable anxiety and alarm. I confess, for my own part, that I do not partake of that alarm; because, even if it were true that there is a force despatched, or about to be despatched, to the kingdom of Naples, I am perfectly convinced that it is an impossibility such force should be despatched for the purpose of interposing between the King of Naples—I can now, happily, only call him the King of Naples; and not the King of the Two Sicilies—it is utterly and absolutely impossible that any force should be sent for the purpose of protecting him against his former subjects in Sicily; or of protecting him, I will venture to hope, against his subjects on the mainland. I do not believe, therefore, that if this measure is in contemplation, or if it is begun to be executed—that it could be for any one purpose connected with the King of Naples, with respect to his subjects on the mainland, or the restitution of his dominion in the island of Sicily. What might be the object of the movement, if unhappily it were about to take place, I will not venture even to conjecture, but I am only satisfied and comforted in a firm and entire belief that it cannot be for the protection of the King of Naples. My Lords, I say, therefore, first, that I cannot believe there is any foundation for the rumour. If it had any foundation, some notice must have been given of it to Her Majesty's Government, and, upon finding that they have no intimation whatever from Paris on the subject, I shall believe it to be entirely erroneous. I confess I shall be glad to find I am right, and that the report is groundless; and I rejoice to think that I shall hear from my noble Friend opposite that it is so; but if not, the alarm I feel is not for the liberties of Sicily or of Naples, but it is lest there may be some intention entertained by the French Government of interfering, either with the Duchies, or with Sardinia, or with the Pope, or with Venice, and lest, therefore, there should be danger to the peace of Europe.

EARL GRANVILLE: I regret that the noble and learned Lord should have been put to the inconvenience of waiting until now in order to submit his Question to the Government. There is some difference between giving any notice of a question and inscribing the formal notice to be printed with the Votes previously to the day on which the question is to be asked. Now, the noble and learned Lord has never given me the slightest intimation of his intention to put this question. It is, I think, convenient, not only to Members of the Cabinet, but to the public, that notice should be given of any question of importance, inasmuch as it often happens that the Member of the Government of whom the question is to be asked finds it necessary to communicate with the head of the Department to which the subject specially refers, in order to be enabled to make a complete and satisfactory reply. If I had stated what I knew when the noble and learned Lord first put the question to me, I could only have stated my individual belief that Her Majesty's Government had received no such information as that to which the noble and learned Lord has alluded, and that it would be inconsistent with all the declarations we have received on the subject from the Emperor of the French. I have had an opportunity, however, through the delay which the forms of the House have occasioned, of communicating with my noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs on the matter, and I am enabled to state upon his authority that there is no foundation for the rumour of any French military force having been sent to the south of Italy, or that there is any intention of so doing. It is true the French have ships of war there, as we have, for the protection of British subjects and their property; but I repeat that I do not believe there is any intention of sending any troops there.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, it was satisfactory to find that this rumour was as great a fiction as the report that the British marines had taken possession of Castellamare.

LORD BROUGHAM: If no information has been received from Paris, or elsewhere, of such intention, it is clear to my mind that the rumour is groundless. Let us hope, therefore, that there will be not only no breach of the peace, or disturbance of the tranquillity now prevailing in Italy, excepting in the South and in Sicily, but that Sicily and the South of Italy are, the one already free, and the other nearly free, from the tyranny under which they have laboured.

House adjourned at Eight o'clock, till To-morrow, Half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, June 18, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1° Parochial Assessments; Stipendiary Magistrates; Inland Bonding; Union of Benefices; Trustees, Mortgagees, &c.

2° Criminal Lunatic Asylum.

Earl Granville

BERWICK-UPON-TWEED ELECTION.

ANSWER TO ADDRESS.

LORD CASTLEROSSE, the Comptroller of the Household, appeared at the bar with Her Majesty's Answer to the Address.

I have received the joint Address of the Two Houses of Parliament, in reference to the Report made by the Select Committee of the House of Commons appointed to try a Petition complaining of an undue Election and Return for the Borough of Berwick-upon-Tweed; and I have given directions accordingly for the appointment of Commissioners for the purpose of making the Inquiry prayed for by the Address.

ANCHORS.—QUESTION.

VISCOUNT RAYNHAM said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Why the description of Anchor reported by the Anchor Committee of 1852 as the most approved, and now used on board Her Majesty's Yacht the Victoria and Albert, has not been generally adopted in the Royal Navy?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, there was no objection to any officer having one of these anchors supplied to him if he asked for it.

VISCOUNT RAYNHAM: Why are they not in general use?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: Because they are objected to generally by the profession. There are very few officers who do not object to the use of them.

INFECTIOUS DISEASES.—PUBLIC CARRIAGES.—QUESTION.

VISCOUNT RAYNHAM said, he would now beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in order to prevent the serious consequences which at present result from persons suffering from infectious diseases being conveyed to hospitals in public carriages, regulations can be made enforcing the detention at the hospital of the carriages so used until certificates shall have been given to the Commissioners of Police to the effect that such carriages have been by proper and sufficient purification rendered incapable of spreading disease.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that under the existing Police Act there was no such power as that referred to by the noble Lord, and therefore it would be impossible that any such directions could be given without further legislation by that House. He would state to the noble Lord and the House that the subject had not escaped the attention of the Police authorities, and they had, under the authority of the Secretary of State, provided a carriage for the conveyance of persons suffering from infectious complaints, and not only for their removal, but for the removal of prisoners and all other persons infected in any manner who might be found in the common lodging-houses, which were subject to the control of the Police. He would also take that opportunity of stating that if any parochial authority, or any person locally interested, should desire to see the carriage which had been provided by the Police, he would receive permission to do so on application being made to Sir Richard Mayne at the Police Station, Bagnigge Wells Road, Clerkenwell.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, considering the advanced period of the Session and the quantity of business which still remains to be transacted I hope there will be no objection to the Motion which I have to make, in conformity with the ordinary usage, that the Government take an additional Order Day; and, as Friday is now a Motion Day, that for the rest of the Session Orders of the Day have precedence of Notices of Motion on Fridays, and Government Orders precedence of others. I hope hon. Members will have no objection to an arrangement which will tend very much to facilitate public business.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he wished to know whether the noble Lord proposes to allow the system still to continue by which questions are put on the Motion for Adjournment, and by which, in effect, one Motion has precedence over all the Orders.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: That is a matter with which Government cannot interfere; it must rest in the discretion of private Members.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he would beg to ask whether any alteration will be made by the new arrangement in the position of the Savings Bank Bill, which at present stands first in the list for Friday.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: If any alteration be made notice will be given to the House either to-night or to-morrow.

Resolved,

"That upon Friday next, and upon every succeeding Friday during the remainder of the Session, Orders of the Day have precedence of Notices of Motions, Government Orders of the Day having priority."

PROMOTIONS FROM THE RANKS.

ADDRESS MOVED.

Order for Committee (of Supply read;) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. M'EVOY said, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, in defending a recent appointment, had stated that it would be a cowardly and shabby thing if he were to pass over an officer who was perfectly qualified for the post in his gift, merely because he held a place at Court. He was now about to afford the right hon. Gentleman an opportunity of proving his ingenuousness in that remark. A practice had grown up of late years of giving an increased number of commissions to deserving non-commissioned officers, and the present Commander-in-Chief had done more in this respect than many of his predecessors. But, while men were thus promoted it was not fair that their new position should place them in circumstances of embarrassment. A man, after perhaps twenty-five years' service, on being promoted from the ranks, was not allowed to make this the ground of a claim towards a pension, though, by a rule of the War Office for which he could not find any authority, it was the custom to allow him to count half his previous service. So that a man entering the army at twenty years of age, and obtaining his commission at forty-five, would have to serve till he was sixty-five years of age, before he was entitled to retire upon full-pay. But a man at forty-five, after enduring all the fatigues and hardships of his profession, was in no condition to commence a new term of service before he could look forward to the enjoyment of a full retiring allowance. Quartermasters and paymasters—on what ground he was unable to say—were allowed to count the whole of their previous service. To the argument that the latter could not expect promotion, was to be opposed the fact that men ordinarily obtained their commissions at an age when they could not expect to rise higher than the command of a company. The sum produced by the half-pay of a captain and the investment of the price of his commission was insufficient to support him in the position to which he was entitled; and a case had come to his knowledge in which an officer who had received his promotion in the manner referred to, applied for the post of recruiting officer, for which he was perfectly eligible, but was unable to obtain it, because he was not allowed to count his former service. The cost to the State of the change which he advocated would be trifling; the aggregate amount would not, he believed, exceed the pay of one general officer.

Amendment proposed,

"To leave out from the word 'That' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She may be graciously placed to order that those Officers in the Army who have been promoted from the ranks may be allowed to reckon their previous services in the ranks, in the same manner as is now permitted to Paymasters and Quarter-masters, so as to enable them to avail themselves of the 30th section of the Royal Warrant of the 14th day of October, 1858, which regulates the retirement of Combatant Officers in the Army and Ordnance Corps,'"

—instead thereof.

COLONEL DUNNE seconded the Amendment, and said he was convinced that the sympathies of the House would be with those officers who, through their own efforts and because of distinguished service, had risen from the ranks. There was no army in which the expenses attaching to the position of an officer were greater than in the British army, and yet there was none in which the officers were treated more niggardly. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary at War would show good reason why the boon now asked for officers who had risen from the lower grades of the army should not be granted to them. It was not the rank which such men valued, but the money which would enable them to provide for their families and maintain them in the position which their good conduct had attained. The House had been told the other night of a naval officer who had refused the command of a vessel, because, as he said, he could not afford it; and he hoped that the men whose merits deserved promotion in the army would not be obliged to decline commissions when offered to them for a similar reason. Promotion ought certainly to be granted under circumstances which would render it a boon and not a punishment.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, in answer to the question which had been put to him by his hon. and gallant Friend, that he quite sympathized with him in his desire to do away with everything which was unfair to those officers who had risen by their merit from the ranks to hold commissions in Her Majesty's army; but he thought his hon. and gallant Friend did not draw a sufficient distinction between non-commissioned officers rising to be ensigns or lieutenants, as the case might be, and those who were selected to be quartermasters and paymasters. Those posts required peculiar qualifications, and very few of those who were promoted from the ranks to commissions would be found to possess those special qualifications. The peculiar advantages given to all officers who rose from the ranks should also be considered. He (Mr. Sidney Herbert) confessed that he was not certain that it was always a very great advantage to a man to be raised from the ranks; and experience had shown that although we should always keep that reward open, by which we might hope ultimately to attract a better class of men into the army, yet he believed that, in the majority of the cases, the officers so promoted regretted their promotion. Look, on the other hand, to what were the advantages which were given to a man promoted from the ranks compared with those of an officer who possessed a commission and had not been in the ranks. In the first place, a rigid examination was exacted from every officer who was preparing for a Queen's commission, and it was laid down that it must be certain that he was possessed of a certain amount of education and attainments. In the case of an officer promoted from the ranks, that rule was broken through entirely, for otherwise no man could be promoted from the ranks. Therefore, a great exception was made in favour of a man who was promoted from the ranks. When first he had the honour of filling the office of Secretary of State for War a man promoted from the ranks had out of nothing to purchase his whole outfit. A change had been made, and now £150 was allotted to every man who was promoted from the ranks in the cavalry, and £100 to every man promoted to an ensigncy in the infantry. A commissioned officer was allowed nothing. Here, again, was an advantage which the officers who had not risen from the ranks did not obtain. Further, the officer from the ranks had the advantage of being allowed to count two years in the ranks as one towards his pension or retirement as a commissioned officer. [Mr. M'Evoy: On what authority?] He could not quote the authority; but it was their universal practice at the Horse Guards, in the case of officers who rose from the ranks, to allow two years in the ranks to be counted for one of commissioned service. Here, again, was a very great advantage. If, again, they referred to the case of paymasters and quartermasters, they would find that in that service, which, as he said before, was of a peculiar nature, the service in the ranks was not counted unless there were so many years' service with the commission. The difference between the two was not so great. An officer who rose from the ranks, if he wished to dispose of his commission, was allowed £100 for every year he had held it. That did not apply to the commissioned officers, but the rule was made in favour of men who had risen from the ranks. He did not see that they could safely extend the rule so as to allow non-commissioned service to count as commissioned service beyond what was already permitted. He thought they had gone as far as it was expedient, by allowing two years to count for one, and giving those other and great advantages which it was wise and politic to give to non-commissioned officers promoted from the ranks. It should be recollected there was a very great difference between non-commissioned and commissioned service. One was the service that obeyed, the other the service that commanded. The service that commanded required the higher qualifications; the whole distinction between the ranks rested on the additional value given to the officer above the man. He did not think he would be justified in holding out a prospect that any alteration such as had been proposed would be made.

Mr. M'Evoy

COLONEL DICKSON considered that the right hon. Gentleman had overstated the case against officers who rose from the ranks, but who did not fill the position of either paymaster or quartermaster. He denied that they required less qualification than either paymasters or quartermasters. On the contrary, they generally became adjutants, and that was a post which required not only the greatest qualification but the greatest tact and manner, because it was on such an officer that the efficiency of a regiment mainly depended. The £100 allowance spoken of was given in lieu of the right to sell out, but it in no way compensated for that right; for if, for example, he held a lieutenant's commission for three years he got £300 for it on retiring, though its value was £1,100. The great advantage which the non-commissioned officer derived from his promotion was the value of the commission, and that advantage he should have the power of realizing to the fullest extent by being allowed to sell out like other officers.

COLONEL LINDSAY remarked that, as a general rule, the service wished to give an opportunity to non-commissioned officers, as far as practicable, to rise from the ranks into the position of commissioned officers. It might not be usual for non-commissioned officers to desire to obtain commissions, or that a very large promotion from the ranks was desirable; but he would leave it open to every man to have an opportunity of rising. What they wanted was that the officer should be allowed to count his service as a non-commissioned officer, in order that he might come with the greater rapidity to that position when he could retire on full pay. They also wished that service as a non-commissioned officer should be allowed to count towards the sale of the commission, that he might receive the full price of it for the benefit of his family if he had one; if he had not, the officer generally remained in the service till he advanced another step, and then retired on full pay. He thought this was a small boon to be asked for by those officers, and one that might be granted without any injury to the finances of the country. It was not likely they would ever have a larger infusion of such officers, but it was very desirable to give the opportunity of rising to as many as possible.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH rose to call the attention of the House to the stoppage of a portion of a cavalry officer's pay for forage; and said that this point had been taken up by both the late and the present Secretaries at War, but that the Treasury had in each case refused to entertain the question. He condemned the practice as anomalous and contradictory. If the Government had refused to find forage for the horses of the cavalry altogether that would have been intelligible; but he could not understand with what consistency they first professed to give the forage and took back more than half the price by this miserable deduction. It was well known that the officering of the cavalry had of late years become a difficult matter, as there were no fewer than thirty-six vacancies without applicants during the last year. There were several causes for this. In the first place, it was found that from the changes in the art of war, professional work was now demanded from the officers, so that gentlemen could no longer enter the cavalry as a mere source of amusement. The system of examination had also produced a discouraging effect. The next he was about to mention might appear a small matter, but he was satisfied it had its weight. Formerly it was only the officers of the cavalry that were allowed to wear moustaches, and hence moustaches were regarded as the badge of the aristocratic branch of the service; but now that all officers were allowed to wear them the prestige of the enjoyment of a particular privilege in that respect had gone from the cavalry service. Well, what was the course taken by the Government? They had taken certain steps in the right direction. They had reduced the price of commissions, and they had allowed officers to obtain their chargers from the regimental stud; but still there remained this great anomaly of which he complained. He had already mentioned that the objection to its removal came from the Treasury. He had always supposed that when "My Lords" of the Treasury decided on anything, it was at a real meeting of the Board with the First Lord of the Treasury at their head; and believing that he certainly had some difficulty in reconciling the narrow views expressed in the Treasury correspondence with that great knowledge of social life which the First Lord was well known to possess. But it lately came out, in the course of another discussion, that this Board, like some other Boards, was a mere fiction; that there was no meeting of "My Lords," and that the whole was done by the Secretary of the Treasury. That quite altered the case, for it was not surprising that a gentleman lately taken from commercial pursuits should be wholly unacquainted with the military service of the country. Some of his arguments were certainly very surprising. The Secretary at War stated that they had now to do with a less opulent class of officers, and it would be necessary, therefore, to reduce as much as possible their expenses. To this the reply was that the more the cost of the service was lowered the more the extra price of commissions would be enhanced, and that they must deal with this question on commercial principles. That showed a surprising want of knowledge of the world. Why, upon commercial principles no man would go into the army at all. His pay did not afford to him a reasonable annuity for the capital expended in the purchase of his commission, so that it might be said he served his country for nothing. A man went into the army for honour, for distinction, for status in society, for a few inches of ribbon or a medal, and the commercial principle was the last consideration that entered his head. He concluded by moving the following Resolution:—

Mr. Darby Griffith

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is unjust to the Officers of Cavalry, and not creditable to the Country, that a stoppage should be made from their pay of 8½d. per horse per day for the forage supplied to the horses which they are required to keep for the performance of their regimental duty, and that it is expedient that such deduction should be discontinued in future."

MR. SPEAKER said, that as the House had decided on the last Question, "that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," it was not competent for the hon. Member to move another Motion. The Question was that he do now leave the Chair.

ORDNANCE SURVEY.—CIVIL ASSISTANTS.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. DIGBY SEYMOUR rose to call the attention of the House to the position and pay of the Civil Assistants employed upon the Ordnance Survey, and more particularly to a portion of them, numbering about 700. Their complaint resolved itself into four distinct heads:—1. The insufficiency of pay as compared with that of the employés in other public departments. 2. The capriciousness of the mode of promotion in the Ordnance Survey, and the absence of any proper system of classification. 3. The absence of holidays, such as were allowed in other public Departments. 4. The hours of business, longer than in other establishments of the State. He had taken some trouble to put the Secretary of War in possession of the facts of the case, and had had the honour of receiving a lengthened reply; but as the right hon. Gentleman had not satisfied him, he wished to bring the matter under the notice of the House. He held in his hand a tabular list of the persons employed on the Ordnance Survey, and he found that the number of persons who received from 4s. to 6s. per day amounted to 145, and those who received from 2s. to 4s. per day amounted to 600, although their length of service averaged from 15 to 25 years. Between those two classes were the computers and draughtsmen—a large and most useful body. Taking the whole of the civil staff, the average pay was at the rate of 3s. 6d. a day; and, as they were not paid for Sundays, as the military staff were, taking 313 working days in the year, their average income amounted to less than £55 a year. When he turned to the military staff, he found that their incomes at an average rate of pay of 5s. a day amounted to £75 a year, and if the fuel and lodging provided were taken into account, the sapper on the military staff was much better off than the civil assistant. There were 496 persons on the military staff, and out of them 116 were superintendents, who performed no daily work whatever. The House would, he thought, be somewhat surprised at the proportion which the superintendents presented to the working staff. At Southampton there were sixty draughtsmen, and these had one captain, one lieutenant, one quarter-master-sergeant, one sergeant, and two corporals. There were thirty computers and fifty engravers, who had also a like proportion of officers as the draughtsmen. There were therefore a large number of officers, embracing lieutenant-colonels, majors, captains, lieutenants, sergeant-majors, &c., who presided over a number of persons who only amounted to about 140. The proportion between those who commanded and those who served in the military department was perfectly ridiculous. A few years ago, when the sanitary survey was being taken, a large proportion of civil assistants were employed, and they were all placed under the superintendence of two officers and two assistant-sergeants. Next look at the Topographical Office in London, where there were four commissioned and three non-commissioned officers superintending twenty-two persons, involving an expense which might be largely saved to the country. He would also ask the House to consider the position of these civil assistants as compared with other civil servants in the various departments of Somerset House. Messengers and porters received from £65 to £95 a year, and clerks commenced at £90. At the War Department the commencing salaries were £90; in the Customs, £80; and in the Long Room, £75. It was clear, therefore, that these men engaged in the survey were not paid with anything like the same liberality as the Custom House and Somerset House civil clerks. In the case of these latter, moreover, there was a regular system of promotion according to merit; but in the case of those for whom he pleaded, the sergeant or corporal did as he pleased, and merit and long service had little chance of being regarded. And lastly, they had but fourteen days' holidays, while the civil service clerks had a month, and, at the same time, their daily labour was longer. He trusted on all these grounds, that the Government would take the case of these persons into consideration.

MR. VANCE said, he could corroborate the general statements of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Southampton. He wished to know whether those men were to be entitled to the benefits of the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, the hon. and learned Gentleman's statement was founded on an entire misconception as to the facts. In answer to his statement he would refer the House to the authentic Report of the number and cost of the men, civil and military, employed upon the Ordnance Survey, from which it would be seen that the real numbers did not tally with those given by his hon. and learned Friend. In calculating the cost of the military staff he had thrown in the cost of the superintending officers; but, in calculating that of the civil staff he had omitted the cost of supervision altogether. The best answer to his observations was, perhaps, the fact that the allowance made to civilians was sufficient at all times to secure an abundant supply of labour—that they never found men leaving the service, while there were always others anxious to obtain such employment, and upon the whole they were well paid. The hon. and learned Gentleman had quite misrepresented the fact as regarded the officers. If they had nothing to do but look after the men, it would be undoubtedly true that they were too numerous and overpaid; but so far from that being the case, they had enormous numbers of plans to inspect and manage, and were responsible for the expenditure of considerable sums annually. It should be remembered, in instituting any comparison between the allowances of soldiers and civilians, that the latter had only specified duties to perform, and were not liable to be removed at any moment to some distant scene of war or to colonial service. It gave him great pleasure to find that he admitted the correctness and value of the survey, but he could assure him he was altogether mistaken in the case which he had submitted to the House. With regard to the duration of the holidays he had only to observe that those men had risen by their merit from the position of day labourers, and that there were very few people of their condition in life who could obtain even a fortnight's inaction every year.

ITALY.—FOREIGN ENLISTMENT.—THE PAPAL ARMY.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the fact of the enlistment now going on in Ireland to furnish the Pope with troops in Italy; and to ask the Government what measures they have adopted, or intend to adopt; and what official communication they have received upon the subject. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that the question was one of some importance, and was exciting considerable interest and some surprise among the people of this country. He had in his possession extracts from Irish journals of all shades of politics: some of them rejoicing at the defiance with which the proclamation issued by Her Majesty's Government had been treated, and all stating the enormous number of recruits who were leaving Ireland to join what was called "The Pope's Own." He took it for granted that in the present state of Europe Her Majesty's Government must be extremely anxious that it should be known whether they had power to prevent this flagrant violation of the law, or whether it was to be assumed that they tacitly sanctioned the proceedings which were going on. As long ago as the 28th of May, it was stated in various newspapers that Waterford and other seaports of Ireland had been made ports for what was sometimes called "emigration," but what was sometimes openly admitted to be the embarkation of recruits for the Pope's army. In the first instance it was put forward by the priests, who had taken a large part in this recruiting, that these persons were mere emigrants to Italy. Afterwards it was said that they were going to join the municipal army in Italy; and it subsequently appeared that they were enlisted for the purpose of recruiting the army which was to defend the Pope in case of any collision with his subjects. Her Majesty's Government had issued a proclamation, with a view to prevent the infraction of the law; and no sooner did it appear than the conductors of this enlistment hurled defiance at the Ministry. The newspapers boldly stated that these recruits were intended for a foreign army; and in one instance he believed a justice of the peace was present at their embarkation. This had been going on for some weeks; and some of the recruits had been presented to the Pope, had performed an obeisance to which he did not intend to refer in any terms of ridicule, and had been thanked by his Holiness for having joined his army. All this was in flagrant violation of the Act of Parliament, because he would show the House that not only the enlistment, but the procuring, or endeavouring to procure, the enlistment of persons to serve in a foreign army was an offence against the statute. The law upon the subject was as clear as law could be. In earlier times the youth of Britain were fond of going abroad to advance their interests, and frequently formed the guards of foreign sovereigns. Thus Louis XI. had his Scotch guard, as the Bourbons had their Swiss one. The first Act of Parliament upon the subject was passed in the year 1605, about the time of the Gunpowder Plot. That statute the 1st James I., cap. 4—commenced with a curious recital, which had been copied into subsequent Acts:—

Mr. Sidney Herbert

"That, forasmuch as it is found by late experience, that such as go voluntarily out of this realm to serve foreign princes, states, and potentates are, for the most part, perverted in their religion and loyalty by Jesuits and fugitives, with whom they do there converse."

And it enacted that any one who went out of the country without having taken the oath of allegiance to His Majesty should be deemed guilty of felony. There was another Act of the 9th of Geo. II., cap. 30, entitled "An Act to Prevent the Listing of His Majesty's Subjects to serve without His Majesty's Licence," which enacted that if any subject of His Majesty should enlist himself, or procure any other person to enlist, or should even attempt to procure any other person to go beyond seas, with an intent to be enlisted, to serve any foreign Prince without His Majesty's Licence he should be guilty of felony, and should suffer death without benefit of clergy. These were Acts of great severity; they had now become to a certain extent obsolete; and he admitted that he could find no case in which they had been enforced. The Act of Parliament which was now in force was the Act of 59th Geo. III., cap. 69, called "The Foreign Enlistment Act." It was introduced by Sir Samuel Shepherd, at that time Attorney General, and supported by Mr. Canning, and was intended to prevent persons going to assist the States of South America, which were then at war with Spain. The question was much discussed in that House, but ultimately the Act passed, and its provisions had been enforced. It might be suspended by an Order in Council; and in the year 1835 it was so suspended, in order that the subjects of the English Crown might enter the army of Queen Isabella of Spain, who was then at war with her uncle, Don Carlos. The matter was discussed in the House of Commons, the suspension of the Act being opposed by Lord Mahon, but after a debate the Order in Council was sustained. The law was now distinct and clear that it was an offence to enlist in the service of any foreign prince for any purpose whatever, and that those who procured or incited to that enlistment were guilty of a misdemeanour punishable by fine and imprisonment. The proceedings which had been carried on lately in Ireland had excited attention both in this country and Europe, and it was important that the Government should state whether or not they had power to put a stop to this enlistment. There could be no want of evidence. Numerous journals had published their defiance of the Proclamation. The priests had enlisted the men in the broad daylight; a magistrate had countenanced their embarkation: they had a depôt in London, in the neighbourhood of Tower-hill, and the offenders might be caught in flagrante delicto. Her Majesty's Government professed to observe neutrality abroad, and it was therefore important that they should state whether it was the will or the power which they wanted to stop the embarkation of the persons who were engaging in what was called a "crusade,"—an enterprise which had all the folly and none of the sublimity of the crusades which were preached by St. Bernard and Peter the Hermit,—and should inform the country what steps they intended to take in the matter. At present it appeared as though the Government were unable to prevent a violation of the law, or that they were making no serious efforts for its prevention. A good deal was said upon a previous occasion about a subscription for Garibaldi, and the Solicitor General had given an opinion as to its legality with which some other lawyers did not agree: but whatever doubt might exist as to whether the contribution of money to that subscription was or was not an offence at common law, there could be no question that the enlistment of persons to serve in the Pope's army, without a suspension of the Foreign Enlistment Act by an Order in Council, was a direct violation of the Act of Parliament. He hoped that he had brought this matter before the House with temper and moderation. He respected the religion of every one; but religious enthusiasm might carry men too far, and he thought it was the duty of the Government to let the House know whether they had the power to put a stop to this enlistment, and whether or not it was carried on with their sanction and approbation.

MR. CARDWELL said, he had no complaint to make of the temper in which his hon. and learned Friend had brought this subject before the House. He should best respond to the spirit in which his hon. Friend had acted by confining himself to a simple statement of what were the facts of the case as far as they were known to him, and what had been the conduct of the Government. About the 26th of May last the Government were first informed that persons were being engaged in Ireland, under pretence, as it was at first stated, of going to make a railroad at Ancona, but, as was suspected and believed, for the purpose of their being enrolled in the army which was being raised for the service of the Pope. The Government immediately acted upon that knowledge, and caused, not a proclamation, but a police notice, containing an accurate statement of what was the law on the subject of foreign enlistment, to be universally circulated throughout the length and breadth of Ireland. Why it should be ridiculed he did not know; it was a simple statement of the terms of the Act of Parliament, and was intended to inform the people what they were prohibited by law from doing, and what the penalty would be if they continued to do the acts so prohibited. At the same time orders were given to the constabulary to enforce the law. Those orders had never been in any degree enfeebled by any instructions or want of instructions of the Government, and they were the orders under which the constabulary had acted from that day to the present. The Government had received continual reports from the constabulary officers, and those reports had been regularly submitted to the legal advisers of the Crown. He was very glad to have to reply to his hon. and learned Friend, because, as no one was better acquainted than he was with the proceedings of courts of law, no one could better appreciate the difference between statements in newspapers and the evidence necessary to sustain a prosecution. All he could say was that when statements had reached the Government which afforded the least reason to believe that further inquiry might furnish evidence which would sustain a prosecution, he had always directed that further inquiry should be made, more especially if the evidence was against, not the individuals offering for service, but the much more culpable persons constituting themselves agents for obtaining recruits for the Papal service. There had not, however, been a single case in which the legal advisers of the Crown thought it possible that the Crown could institute a prosecution. The Government had, therefore, not taken any such step, and he was quite sure that his hon. and learned Friend well knew that to institute a prosecution upon statements in newspapers, upon rumours, and upon hearsay evidence which could not be substantiated in a court of justice, was not the duty of the Government, and would not conduce to the honour and dignity of the Crown. With regard to a dépôt in London, he believed that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department was without any evidence to justify him in instituting a prosecution in London as the Irish Government up to the present moment were without evidence to justify them in instituting a prosecution in Ireland. What they had done was this—they had given fair notice of what were the prohibitions of the law, and what were the penalties by which those prohibitions were supported. They had given instructions to the police and to all the authorities under their command to maintain the dignity of the law and to support it. They had not had any evidence on which it was possible to institute a prosecution, and they had certainly not taken the course of bringing into court a case founded upon rumour or newspaper testimony, which would recoil on the authority of the law in the shape of a series of ridiculous failures, and bring the Crown and Government into contempt.

Mr. Cardwell

MR. VINCENT SCULLY understood the law to be correctly laid down by the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone, that all persons who procured or incited others to enlist in a foreign army were guilty of misdemeanour. He thought it very unfortunate that such a state of things should arise, and that any persons, whether from religious or any other enthusiasm, should be tempted to desert their own country—if indeed the Irish people could be said to have any country to desert. He was not prepared to deny that numbers of persons, who would be excellent subjects if kept at home, were going out to take part in supporting the temporal dominion of his Holiness the Pope. He had seen notices to that effect in the newspapers, and he had just cut out one extract. [Laughter.] Ex uno disce omnes. It was from the last number from Dublin of the Catholic Telegraph, giving the account from one of these young men of their proceedings:—

“I must certainly admit, however, that up to the present moment we have been treated as gentlemen—travelling by sea as first-class passengers, by rail as second class, and putting up at the very best hotels, where we always obtained the choicest bill of fare the house could afford. We visited every place of amusement, and every object worthy of notice as we passed through England, Belgium, Prussia, Saxony, Westphalia, Bohemia, Austria, and Italy; in short, everything we wished for that money could procure we had it for asking.”

That was more than they could get in Ireland. They happened to get into trouble about passports, and were put in prison for three days; but the writer said:—

“In fact, we were never so sorry for anything as at being discharged from custody, as we were very well content with such prison diet as roast fowl, green peas, and a pint of wine for breakfast; soup and macaroni, meat, (roast and boiled) and a pudding, also washed down with a pint of wine, for dinner: coffee and bread at 7 o'clock; and supper—a repetition of the breakfast—at 10 P.M. We were not at all pleased at being released from such punishment, I can assure you.”

He then went on to speak of the low price of cigars, and concluded with “Remember me to all the boys.” In an extract from the Clonmel Chronicle it was stated that eleven very fine fellows started by the railway en route for Rome; and a little lower down that fourteen more emigrants for the same locality arrived at the terminus. “What is rather curious is that none of them had any baggage." Twenty-five more left Clonmel on Tuesday, making 50 altogether. In another extract from the Tipperary Vindicator it was stated that 70 athletic young fellows left Thurles. "They all stood 6 feet or thereabouts, and one was 6 feet 5½ inches." Then it was stated that 70 more left, and then 50 of the bold Tipperary peasants; then 40 from Ballingarry and Killenaule; then 25 from Clonmel and 100 from Sligo, making altogether 355. It was very unfortunate that they should leave the country. They were very much wanted at home. They would be much more useful at home, and it would be very easy for the Government to keep them at home if they set the right way about it. The Wanderer, of Vienna, published a letter from Ancona, which said, "The Irish have had a fight among themselves." They could have had that at home. "And they wounded some of the gendarmes who interfered to separate them. The delegate has hitherto treated the Irish like princes, and their pretensions are in consequence unbounded. Every soldier insists on having his own room, table, &c. It is to be feared, after all, the Pontifical Government will be under the necessity of inviting these gentlemen to go home again." He took advantage of a recess occasioned by the Reform Bill, and there being nothing to do here of any consequence, to go over to the county of Tipperary and to see the peasantry. Many of them possessed of as good reasoning powers as hon. Members, without at all disparaging them. They asked, "Would he subscribe to Garibaldi?" He said he would not give a shilling to Garibaldi. "Would he subscribe to the other side?" he was then asked, and he said he would not give a shilling for either side to succeed, but he would give a large sum to stop them from cutting each others throats. Who knew anything about the affairs of Italy? He did not believe that any one knew which side was right. He understood, or at least he ought to understand, Ireland, but if the Orangemen and the Ribbonmen were flying at one another he would not give a shilling that either should succeed. He believed that both would be in the wrong. He would give a large sum of money to put both down, and he believed it was very much the same state of things in Italy. Gentlemen in that House were also carried away by their enthusiasm. Their Protestant feelings were excited.

.VOL. CLIX. [THIRD SERIES.]

They were for putting down the Pope, and constantly urging the heads of the Government to meddle in affairs which did not concern them. No Government, whether Sardinian, Neapolitan, or Papal, believed that this Government were observing the principle of non-intervention with regard to Italy. He had asked the noble Lord some weeks since whether the feelings of Roman Catholics would be respected by a Ministry exclusively composed of Protestants, and whether he was prepared to recognize the principle of absolute non-intervention, more especially as regarded the dominions and sovereignty of his Holiness the Pope. The noble Lord took every occasion to insult his Holiness. They had a specimen last week, when the observations of the noble Lord, with his calm, benignant temper, were infinitely more insulting than the famous "mummeries of superstition" in the celebrated Durham letter. He had never said a word in defence of the rights of Roman Catholics, which he would not also say in defence of Protestants, or any other denomination, if he thought they were being persecuted. What the Roman Catholics wished for was simple justice, and that the Government should not use their power and influence in either direction. It was the persuasion that the Pope and his subjects were not getting fair play, and that the weight of the English Government was thrown into the balance against them, that brought on these enlistments. Not very long ago he was endeavouring to enforce the duty of non-intervention, in a quarrel which he could not understand, on an intelligent peasant in Ireland, when all of sudden the man turned the argument against him by saying, "What do you say, then, to the proceedings of your friends Lord Palmerston and Lord John Russell?" Being thus identified with the two noble Lords, he could only quote in English what the noble Viscount (Viscount Palmerston) said the other night in Latin,—

"Pudet hæc opprobria nobis Et dici potuisse et non potuisse refelli."

—" 'Tis true, 'tis pity, pity 'tis 'tis true."

Or, in other words :—

"We blush that such disgraces
Can be flung into our faces;
And that we are not able To say they are a fable."

After the language used by the noble Lord the other evening, it was impossible to say that the Government were impartial. Referring to the Pope and the King of Naples, the noble Lord said :—

U

“ Those Governments forget that they are themselves the real and original authors and instigators of those movements, and if their prayer were granted and steps taken to promote and accomplish the object they desired (unless, which is very unlikely, they were prepared to alter their own courses), the first, most effectual, and only necessary step would be their own removal.”

By firebrand language of this description, in the House of Commons, the Government prevented the influence of men of moderate opinions like himself having any effect. He certainly had a right, he thought, to claim that title. He had exercised his own independent judgment on these matters, and he believed that he was the only Roman Catholic Member, not in the Government, who had not yielded to the pressure put upon him—and as much pressure had been put upon him as on any one, —to say that the maintenance of the temporal dominion of the Pope was essential to the exercise of his spiritual jurisdiction. Such incendiary language used by the Government paralyzed the action of moderate Roman Catholic gentlemen. Though the Government was entirely Protestant, it ought to respect the feelings of a large portion of the Queen's subjects. This kind of interference was never exercised with regard to Protestant Powers. Had the English Government ever interfered with the terrible bigotry of Sweden, or with the Russian persecutions of Roman Catholics? It was always used against Roman Catholic Powers for Protestant purposes. So long as this system continued, so long would the state of things described by the hon. Member for Marylebone continue. Let the Government desist from the use of such language as this, and let them come down here to-morrow and pass a good and just Land Bill, and then, and not till then, Irishmen would stop at home.

Mr. M'MAHON said, he must complain that, though the Government had expressed their readiness to prosecute people in Ireland for aiding the Pope, they had shown no readiness to put down other violations of the law which were taking place in this country, namely, conspiracies in this country to assist Garibaldi and his friends by subscriptions. There could be no doubt that Garibaldi and his friends were in open rebellion against a Sovereign who was in alliance with this country, and no lawyer would say that to meet openly and publicly to get up subscriptions to assist Garibaldi in overturning the power of an Ally was an indictable offence by our laws. The Scotch law repressed offences against the State with a much stronger hand, and this was an offence clearly punishable by the Scotch law; yet only the other day a meeting was held at Edinburgh, attended by men of the greatest mark in that City, at which Resolutions were passed expressing sympathy with the Sicilians, and a subscription was opened. Among the subscribers were such men as Lord Kinnaird, William Patrick, Esq., Lieutenant-Colonel Somerville, and Commissary-General Wemyss. These gentlemen had as openly violated the Scotch law as the Irish law was violated by the recruits. He certainly thought that if such things were allowed to be done against a Sovereign Ally, it would be a gross inconsistency if Irishmen were prosecuted for assisting a Sovereign Ally. Apart from the merits of the contest both sides ought to be treated with perfect impartiality. He was surprised that the Government should treat as it did the Court of Rome, for there was not a single Ally of this country to whom we were more indebted for long, true, and faithful service. He therefore trusted the Government would act towards the See of Rome with the same impartiality that it would exhibit towards the more powerful of its Allies.

Mr. Vincent Scully

THE WEEDON INQUIRY.

OBSERVATIONS.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he wished to call attention to the proceedings of the Weedon Commission, and to the expense incurred by it; together with the Report of the Auditors of the Treasury on that expenditure. He had obtained a Committee some years ago to inquire into the working of that establishment, and into the mode of taking contracts on behalf of the Government. The Committee was re-appointed in the next Session, when he had no longer a seat in the House; but as some defalcations became apparent in the course of the Inquiry, the House interfered, and a Royal Commission was appointed to inquire into the circumstances. But, instead of committing that investigation to military men, or even to officers connected with the Civil Service, gentlemen were chosen, of undoubted respectability, who had, of course, done their best, but who, he ventured to think, were not qualified for conducting the Inquiry.

The Commissioners appeared to believe that Mr. Elliot in discontinuing the system of book-keeping enjoined by the orders of the Department to which he belonged had only committed a trivial offence; but if these books had remained in existence it would have been impossible for the disastrous consequences which they all lamented to have occurred. Considerable doubt existed whether the Commissioners had not exceeded their powers, and a lengthened correspondence with the War Office ensued; one of the steps taken by them being to withdraw their accounts from the hands of Mr. Commissary Adams and his staff of military assistants, and to place them in those of Mr. Jay, a professional accountant. The Bill of that gentleman came to a sum exceeding £8,000; to which was to be added the preliminary expenditure by Mr. Adams, and the cost of the inquiry itself. This would raise the cost of the inquiry to something like £12,000. The claim was referred to the auditor, Mr. Arbuthnot, who commented warmly upon it, and maintained that half the amount demanded would be ample compensation. The objections to the claim of Mr. Jay, who was a member of the firm of Quilter, Ball, and Co., were—first, that instead of the accounts being furnished in October, as Commissary Adams had undertaken, they were not delivered till the July following; the expenses, according to the plan of Commissary Adams, would only have been £900, instead of the enormous charge which was now preferred; and, finally, the auditor declared that the accounts as presented by Mr. Jay had no practical value whatever. Some very ludicrous mistakes were pointed out. For instance, in totting up a certain number of thousands of pairs of boots a quantity of bootlaces was included to make up the requisite total—the value of the boots being 8s. 10d. a pair, whereas the bootlaces only cost about 1s. a thousand. It was for the country to say whether this demand, preferred under such circumstances, should be acquiesced in. The Military Estimates, and particularly the civil portion, were becoming so enormous that the country must pay attention to the subject. It was no use talking in the abstract of economy unless the House entered practically into the consideration of the question. Were some 30,000 men, and a condition of defences which might be gathered from the demand of £12,000,000. to render them efficient—results adequate to a war expenditure of £15,000,000? The country could not afford to go on with this rate of expenditure; more attention must be paid to the details of expenditure. It was not by debates on such small subjects as promotions from the ranks, that any improvement would be effected; it was the larger subjects that required investigation. Better organization in the whole system was required. Let them look at the order and economy that pervaded every branch of the French establishments, and take a lesson therefrom.

MR. TURNER assured the House that it was with very great reluctance that he intruded himself upon their attention for a few minutes, because he was not one of those who was in the habit of needless talk of hindering the progress of public business. But having been engaged during four months of a recess after a hard Session in the investigation to which the gallant Colonel had alluded, and having given his best attention to the subject, without any prejudice, but with a sincere desire to bend his mind to a difficult subject, he did not expect that he should be spoken of by the gallant Officer as having involved the country in needless expense. He received a request from the then Secretary for War that he would allow himself to be nominated as the mercantile member of the Commission, and he was told that there would be associated with him one of the police magistrates and an officer of the army of nearly fifty years' standing. He consented very reluctantly, but not until he had consulted Sir Benjamin Hawes, one of the Under Secretaries for War, who said he thought the inquiry might be over in a fortnight. He informed Sir Benjamin Hawes that if he supposed he should go through with an inquiry of that sort in a fortnight he had mistaken his man; that he was determined that a searching investigation should be made; that he should enter upon the inquiry with no prejudice for or against the War Office or towards the old Colonels, who were desirous, he believed, of going back to the old system of clothing the army—he did not allude to the gallant Colonel who had brought forward this Question. He added that he had no prejudice either against the army contractors, but he was determined to have a thorough investigation; and he accepted the office. When the Commissioners arrived at Weedon, it found Commissary General Adams, with eight Commissaries and a staff of clerks, making out an account. But the Commission, at its first meeting at Weedon, informed the authorities at the War Office that they would not be at all satisfied with any examination of the accounts by the officials of the War Office, and that it was their intention to have an independent accountant. The Commissioners were informed that Mr. Commissary Adams with about twenty clerks were investigating the accounts; but he (Mr. Turner) said, notwithstanding that, they would have an independent accountant, and he himself put this question to Mr. Ramsay, a high official in the War Office:—

"I suppose it will be satisfactory to the authorities at the War Office as it will be to us that there should be a thorough investigation of the account-keeping at Weedon by an independent man, who has no connection with the War Office?" and the answer was, "Quite so."

As the evidence was daily reported to the War Office, and not a word was ever said to stop them from having an independent inquiry, he said that from the outset of the inquiry they had the sanction of the War Office for such an investigation. When they went down to Weedon they found things much in the state they were likely to be. There was Mr. Commissary Adams there with his clerks investigating the accounts, and at the close of a statement in writing which he gave to them prior to giving his evidence, he said,

"It must be observed that even the accounts thus prepared"—he was referring to the accounts he was engaged upon—"cannot be deemed satisfactory public accounts until it has been thoroughly ascertained in the course of the examination at the War Office that all purchases and all transactions with contractors and the army packers in Mark Lane have been properly accounted for. It must also be observed that the present accounts are drawn up from a mass of documents, a very large number of which are defective, one-half of them without any examination whatever, and there is no guarantee that they represent all the transactions at the dépôt."

Now, how could such an account be deemed satisfactory? When they came to examine him he was asked this question:—

"You have had considerable experience no doubt in accounts. Did you ever in the course of your experience find anything so disgraceful in the mode of keeping accounts in any stores?"

And the answer was,

"There has been no keeping of accounts at all." "Do you not think that if any private establishment acted upon the system of non-book-keeping, it would in a short time be in the Court of Bankruptcy?" And his answer was, "I think it is very likely they would."

Again he was asked,

Mr. Turner

"Are the vouchers to which you have alluded not valid vouchers?" And the answer was, "To some of them there are no signatures. There are 700 or 800 objectionable vouchers altogether."

When the Commissioners returned to London they made a representation to the War Office that they could not be satisfied with accounts made up of such unsatisfactory materials, and that it would be better that the accountant who had been engaged up to that time on the system of keeping accounts should go into the matter in a mercantile manner; and there was no question about it that they had the consent of the then Secretary for War (General Peel) to have that investigation. Commissary General Adams and all his Staff were dismissed, and the books were placed in the hands of the first accountants in London—Quilter, Ball, and Jay—and they went through the accounts to the time that Captain Gordon took charge of the dépôt at Weedon. They had made a very heavy charge—too heavy he thought—but the investigation extended through all the transactions at Weedon since that dépôt was established, and they had at all events accomplished this matter: they had shown that after all there was no very great defalcation of stores at Weedon, and that the articles for which the Treasury paid were delivered. The accounts, after all the labour bestowed upon them, were not quite satisfactory, inasmuch as there were some little discrepancies in the balances; but on the whole he was satisfied there had been a valid accounting for the articles at Weedon. He was one of the Commissioners, and to him the inquiry was satisfactory. No doubt they had been blamed by many parties for the lenient way in which it was said they had dealt with the authorities at Weedon; but it should be remembered that the Commissioners were not appointed to support any system or party in office, but were appointed for the purpose of examining the accounts and books; they had done so diligently and faithfully, and had presented a most faithful Report. In this labour they had sacrificed their time, and two of them at least had suffered in their health. He thought it was now very unfair that the Commissioners should be blamed, and strange that they were not better supported by the authorities. The Commission was issued during a Conservative Government, and possibly there might have been some disposition to look into the bad system of keeping the accounts by their predecessors. But since the present Government had been in power they had not looked upon the Report of the Commissioners very favourably, and recently the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury had referred to "that unfortunate Weedon Commission." No doubt it had been unfortunate to many; to colonels, contractors, and the Government officials; it had also been unfortunate to the Commissioners, who, after having devoted a long time to a laborious and troublesome investigation, had not, at least so far as he was concerned, received the slightest thanks for what they had done. He would, however, appeal to the House, if he did not to the Government, to say that they had performed their duty faithfully, honestly, and well.

MR. MONSELL said, that having paid the utmost attention to the labours of the Commission, he was of opinion the hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the House, as well as his Colleagues, had displayed during the inquiry a great deal of patience and industry, and merited the thanks as well of the House of Commons as of the country. His principal object in rising was, however, to call the attention of the Secretary for War to the circumstance that in a paper which had been placed in the hands of Members that morning an item was set down of £105,000 as the Vote for the purchases of cavalry horses. Now, it appeared from the same paper that when, in 1858, two new regiments were added to the cavalry the sum voted for the purchase of horses was only £81,000, and in 1859, which might be considered an ordinary year, £55,000. Why it should be £105,000 for a similar purpose this year, when no augmentation in the number of men was about to be made, he was at a loss to understand.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT, adverting to the subject of the Weedon Inquiry, said, he should not detain the House by entering into it at any length, inasmuch as it had on a former occasion been fully discussed, and inasmuch as he—not having been in office at the time of the appointment of the Commission—could speak upon the question with which it had to deal with comparatively little authority. He must, however, assure the hon. Gentleman behind him (Mr. Turner) that he was mistaken in supposing the Government did not entertain a due sense of the services which the Commission had gratuitously rendered to the public, in endeavouring, at a very great cost of time and labour, to elucidate details of a very complicated chaacter. It was, he believed, the fact that at the time when the great consolidation of some of the public Departments took place the capital mistake was committed of the War Office imposing their system of accounts on the Ordnance, instead of the Ordnance imparting their system to the War Office; for the Ordnance system was much more efficient for purposes of this kind. His predecessor in office had, he might add, in his opinion, made a very good selection of Gentlemen to serve on the Commission, and had very properly left the inquiry in their hands. If a larger expenditure had been incurred than would appear to have been justified, still it must be borne in mind that the question must not be measured by money results, for the sum ascertained to have been lost by the malversations at Weedon amounted, he believed, to little more than £250. Still there had been very great neglect there, and the confusion of accounts had since been rectified.

In answer to the remarks of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Monsell), he might observe that he thought he could show him some documents which went to prove that cavalry horses lasted longer in this country than in foreign services, although they were more worked. The hon. Gentleman said that no augmentation of the cavalry was in contemplation for the present year; but then there were two regiments from India which must be rehoused; while it should not be forgotten that there had been an advance in the price of all descriptions of horses.

COLONEL GILPIN, in reply to some observations of the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Turner), stated that having been a Member of the Contract Committee, he did not think there was a particle of evidence to show that the Colonels were desirous of returning to the old system, and having observed that one advantage of that system was that the loss, if the clothing were rejected, fell upon the Colonels and the contractors instead of on the public, as at present, bore testimony to the admirable quality of the clothing supplied this year.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY drew attention to the difficulty which lay in the way of ascertaining the exact mode in which the sums voted under the head of Army Estimates were expended. The House had not the slightest assurance that the Estimates as voted, corresponded with the expenditure. Comparing the present Estimates with the expenditure for the army for the year ending the 31st of March, 1859, he found that the latter furnished no sufficient guide in dealing with the subject. Last year, for instance, the money which was expended for the army was £12,527,000; the money voted £12,011,000; the expenditure being £516,000 in excess of that amount. This was a most important fact; but there was something still more formidable that required attention. Under the Appropriation Act the War Office might, with the consent of the Treasury, apply the surplus in the case of one grant, to a different purpose from that which had been originally contemplated. The consequence was, that when once a sum of money exceeding the wants of the country under the particular head under which it was voted, was granted by the House of Commons, the Government were in a position to do as they pleased with any surplus that might remain by applying it under any other head; and he found that last year no less than £1,281,000 had thus been spent without any authority from Parliament in connection with various items. The Vote for the Militia was a striking example of this evil. In 1859 the sum voted for the Militia was £159,000, but the sum expended was £881,000. If the House was to exercise any control over the public expenditure, they must insist on Estimates prepared with the greatest care and accuracy, and alter that clause in the Appropriation Act which authorized deviations in the application of sums voted for one purpose to another without distinct sanction to each departare. If Estimates were loosely framed, the time they spent in discussing them must be entirely thrown away. He could not sit down without expressing his belief that the Member for Manchester and his colleagues, who had acted as Commissioners on the Weedon inquiry, had met with very scant justice. A more laborious Commission, or one which had performed its duty more faithfully, never sat. It was extremely unfortunate that so much exertion should have ended in a question as to who should pay an accountant's bill, although he must say that the account was a most extravagant one. But that in no way could derogate from the honourable and patriotic manner in which the Member for Manchester and his colleagues had discharged a very odious duty.

MR. W. WILLIAMS quite agreed with the hon. Baronet that the mode of getting up the Army Estimates was most unsatisfactory. He had known instances in which hundreds of thousands of pounds had been taken from one Vote and applied to another without Parliamentary sanction. A Vote that was unpopular might be put down at £100,000 less than was known to be required, while another Vote that was popular was estimated at so much more, the balance being afterwards applied as the War Office thought proper. [Mr. SIDNEY HERBERT: With the consent of the Treasury.] No doubt that was so; but the principle was indefensible. Three or four years ago the then Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir George Lewis) promised that the system should be altered; but no change whatever had yet taken place. He hoped the time was not far distant when the House would take the power from every Department to apply the amount of one Vote to the discharge of another; and he should be glad if the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham would bring in a Bill to do away with the very objectionable practice. As to the consent of the Treasury that was a mere matter of form, and it was given without investigation.

Sir Henry Willoughby

SIR FREDERIC SMITH thought the hon. Baronet and the Member for Lambeth complained of the Army Estimates without reason. They were given in great detail; they occupied 152 pages, and it was impossible that Estimates could be drawn up with more accuracy. As to the appropriation of the balance of one Vote to make up a deficiency in another, that was a matter for which the Treasury was responsible, not the Secretary for War. With regard to the rate of cost of cavalry horses in this and foreign countries, his conclusion did not entirely accord with that of the right hon. Gentleman, and he hoped the Secretary for War would endeavour to curb this expense as much as possible. He might add that the sale of horses from regiments was not in all cases conducted with a due regard to economy.

COLONEL SYKES said, he must also complain of the manner in which the surplus of one Vote was applied to another without the authority of the House. It had the effect of inducing the House to grant the money without much discussion, and Estimates were prepared in order to meet the views of the House; for instance, an Estimate not likely to be relished by the House was made as light as possible, while on the other hand an Estimate not likely to be questioned was made high, thus the Estimates did not represent the sums truly required for the objects mentioned. This question was discussed three Sessions ago in a very animated manner, and it was then understood that the course should not be pursued any longer. He thought the House ought to exercise some control over the matter.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY.—ARMY ESTIMATES.

House in Committee: Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

(1.) £131,224, to complete the sum for Departments of Secretary of State for War and General Commanding-in-Chief.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, if his hon. and gallant Friend, the Member for Chatham (Sir F. Smith), would compare the details of the Estimates of 1859 with the actual expenditure, he would find they were not so accurate as he evidently imagined them to be. In that year the House had voted £182,977 for the same purpose as that now under discussion; but the Government had actually spent £192,000. He wished the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sidney Herbert) would explain whether the same variation was likely to exist this year between Estimate and actual expenditure; because, if so, it was really a waste of time to discuss the Estimates.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, it appeared that the cost of the Departments of the Secretary for War, and of the Commander-in-Chief, was considerably larger in amount than before the union of the offices; and the present Estimates were considerably in advance of those of last year. The figures for the War Office were this year £9,510; for the Office of the Commander-in-Chief, £1,705; between £10,000 and £11,000 together. The Secretary for War had declared himself responsible for the acts of the Commander-in-Chief. He doubted, however, whether he had much influence of the high personages at the head of the army. He ought to be responsible for all.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, the reason of the increase of the Estimate of this year was, because the Estimate of last year was found insufficient, owing to the increased demands upon the Staff, which was increased accordingly; and for which, therefore, an amount was required to be voted. He would take that occasion to make a few remarks on a Return which had been presented to the House as to the temporary clerks in the War Office. There were 125 of them. But that arrangement had not been made by the right hon. Gentleman the present Secretary for War. It appeared that one gentleman, fifty-eight years of age, was appointed in 1847, and, although he had performed thirteen years service, he was only a temporary clerk. Then there were fourteen clerks who were thirty-five years of age, who had been temporary clerks for six years, thirty-three for five years, and others for different periods. He thought that the time had now come when these gentlemen should be permanently employed; inasmuch as, without permanent employment, men were not very zealous in the performance of their duties. He trusted that this temporary system of employment was not to go on for ever. The cost of clerks had been raised from £15,000 last year, to £21,000 this year; and he thought it was desirable to know how long this increase was to continue?

COLONEL GILPIN wished for an explanation of the charge for three classes of messengers.

COLONEL DICKSON said, it was a misnomer to call these temporary messengers, as they appeared in the Estimates regularly every year.

COLONEL SYKES pointed out an incongruity in the charges for the head clerks in the Commander-in-Chief's department. The first clerk received £1,000 a year; the second, £800; but the third, £975, or £175 more than his senior in office. Besides this, the third clerk was this year to receive £50 above his salary last year, while there was no augmentation in the case of the second clerk.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT begged, in the first instance, to refer to the remarks of the hon. Baronet, the Member for Evesham, with regard to the payment from the surplus of one Vote into the deficiency of another. That could not be done, except under the sanction of the Treasury. The hon. Member for Lambeth said it was done, no doubt, upon the authority of the Secretary of State. On the contrary, the Treasury exercised a very rigorous supervision; and he frankly admitted very properly so; although they had refused him to do things which very often, he thought, might be advantageous for the public service. But he thought they were right in maintaining the rule, that although there might be an addition made from the surplus of one Vote to cover the deficiency of another, on a work sanctioned by Parliament, it must never be done on a work not sanctioned. When Gentlemen talked of laying on the table an estimate of £15,000,000, and expected that they could make every Vote come right, it was expecting what no man could do with his private income.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY: My right hon. Friend quite misunderstood me. I said when any variation occurred, you might come to the House of Commons and get a Vote.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, the House might not be sitting, and to wait for the Session would be too late. Last year there was a sum of money applied to increase the amount of machinery for making rifle guns at Woolwich, which was a surplus upon another Vote. He thought it an urgent service, and was most anxious to have the means of producing rifle guns for the navy. If he had waited until Parliament met, a great deal of valuable time must have been lost. At the same time he admitted that the Treasury properly exercised a strong practical supervision. On the other hand, it was clear that, with an estimate of nearly £15,000,000 upon a service scattered all over the globe, for the army in every colony, possession, or protectorate, of which the accounts did not come in until after the financial year had closed, no human foresight could produce a perfectly exact estimate. Practically what would be thought of the public officer who, upon a question of that kind, would refuse to take the responsibility of diverting the surplus of one Vote to cover the deficiency of another, when the service was an urgent one, which he would be properly blamed, if he had not undertaken to execute. With regard to the excess of the Estimates, he found that every year there had been an expectation of a reduction in the number of temporary clerks, &c., and yet the reduction never was made. The Estimate was for what the establishment actually cost last year; and although it appeared to him that there might possibly be a diminution in the amount of writing and correspondence connected with the War Office, yet he liked to be on the safe side. With regard to the temporary clerks, he was entirely of opinion with the gallant Officer (Sir Frederick Smith); and the War Office, in fact, made a representation to the Treasury that it would be much better, instead of that enormous number of temporary clerks, to have a larger establishment, and get rid of the employment of temporary clerks to such an extent. It was not wholly a disadvantage to the public service, because they ascertained, by reports from the different branches, who should be allowed to compete for the permanent establishment; but he frankly admitted that the system was carried to excess in the War Office. The Treasury had appointed a very able Committee to examine into the subject, and very properly refused to give any answer until the Committee had reported.

Mr. Sidney Herbert

COLONEL NORTH asked, if the age of the clerks interfered with their competing?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, if they stayed beyond a certain age it did; but those who were most fit had the advantage of competing before that time arrived. The number of messengers employed, arose from the enormous amount of business going on. He did not believe Gentlemen had any idea of the vast increase in the business last year. It was not caused merely by the additional force; but he believed the enormous facility given for writing, and the habit of writing, which was spreading everywhere, and pervading the whole population, increased the business of most Government offices to an extent which was almost inconceivable. He was not able to explain at present the cause of the larger salary of the second Assistant Secretary in the Commander-in-Chief's office.

COLONEL DUNNE said, the appropriations ought to be printed with the Estimates, and not in a separate paper.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, it was the excessive amounts of the appropriations that he complained of.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £249,005 to complete the sum for Manufacturing Departments, &c.

COLONEL NORTH asked why the officers of the military store and barrack department and the clerk of the works should not be placed in Vote 3, and obtain the advantage of being placed upon the permanent staff of the army.

MR. MONSELL had observed that it was proposed to give the superintendent of the small arms department a special allowance of £300 a year in addition to what he had hitherto received. Of the great ability of that hon. and gallant officer, Colonel Dickson, and the manner in which he discharged the important trust committed to him in that department, he could not speak too highly; and he perceived that the amount of money expended in these factories was £200,000 a year. But he likewise saw that £100,000 was expended on the Royal laboratory, and he thought that the gallant officer who presided over this department ought also to have an increased allowance. The duties of his office were heavier, and also perhaps more important than those of the small arms department, and he (Mr. Monsell) could not conceive why he did not receive a like increased allowance to that of the other gallant officer. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman would give such an explanation as would show that he was not dissatisfied with the manner in which the gallant officer performed his duties.

COLONEL GILPIN complained of the injustice of allowing only 1½d. a day for lodging money in a garrison town; and asked how the money had been expended which was voted some years ago for the furnishing of the mess-rooms and public rooms in barracks.

MR. W. WILLIAMS wished to know why we continued two military officers, one at Liège and the other at Solingen, at a salary of £700, besides their military pay. He thought that, with our small-arm factory, and with the aid of the Birmingham gunmakers, we could obtain small arms enough in our own country without resorting to foreign factories. It had been stated that we sent over our plans for rifles to Liège during the Russian war, but that we did not get a single rifle from them—they were, in fact, made over to the Russians.

COLONEL LINDSAY wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the position of married women in regiments. It was admitted that a certain number of women was necessary in a regiment, and permission was given to soldiers to marry to the extent of 6 in 100, for whom accommodation was found in the barracks when that was possible. But accommodation for married people in barracks was rare, and the lodging-money, to which allusion had been made, was far too small. He therefore suggested that the position of these married women should be more recognized than it was, that rooms in the style of model lodging-houses should be attached to barracks for the accommodation of the married soldiers, and till that was done some increase in the allowance for lodging-money should be made. If this were done, the men would not be driven to resort to the very worst part of the town.

MR. MONSELL denied the statement of the hon. Member for Lambeth that the Russians got hold of a single musket manufactured for us during the late war. The rifles manufactured at Liège were from 5s. to 6s. cheaper than those manufactured at Birmingham, and though he believed that the Birmingham guns were quite equal to those of Liège, yet it did so happen that in every trial between them the Liège guns beat the Birmingham ones.

CAPTAIN JERVIS expressed his belief, in spite of what had been said, that the Birmingham rifles would hold their own against the world. As to the lodging-money, he thought the question was one of a much broader nature than had yet been started—namely, whether they should throw obstructions in the way of the soldier marrying, or whether he was to be left free to marry, as the citizens in all countries in the world were. Within the last ten years 3,000 soldiers had been admitted to the hospitals at Woolwich whose services to the country would not, in all probability, have been thus lost if, like other citizens, they had been allowed to settle down quietly.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, the hon. and gallant Member ought to know that in France no man was allowed to marry till he had gone through his allotted period of service as a soldier. Every commanding officer knew that his greatest difficulty on a march, or still more on being ordered on foreign service, was the incumbrance of soldiers' wives with their baggage. It was a life of unhappiness, of trial, and of privation for the women, and the more the soldiers were dissuaded from marrying until nearly the end of their service the better would their service be performed.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he was on the whole averse to giving military rank to store-keepers. He thought there were too many quasi military men with military rank already. With regard to the salaries of Major Boxer and Colonel Dickson, he would be the last man to depreciate the services of the former, for he believed a more energetic officer was nowhere to be found. But the services of Colonel Dickson covered a vast deal of ground. He could suggest, however, to his right hon. Friend that he would not do better than leave Major Boxer in the hands of the Government—his merits would be sufficiently appreciated and rewarded. As to the lodging-money, it was a very difficult and a very expensive question. That money varied on different stations, Woolwich, he believed, being one of the worst; and he had, therefore, taken a vote of £30,000 this year, which he proposed to expend on the construction of barracks for married men at Woolwich. He would not enter into the married soldiers' question. It had been often discussed, and had never been brought to a satisfactory conclusion; but this he might say, that as now all the men were on short service—they entered the army at eighteen and might leave it at twenty-eight—there was not the same hardship in refusing permission to marry as when the men entered the army for life. As to the officers who were at Liège and Solingen, he would remind the hon. Member for Lambeth that we had at present large contracts executing there, and the officers referred to were there for the purposes of inspection. As to the barrack furniture, they were trying the experiment of supplying some of the barracks with furniture, for which the officers would be charged a percentage, and he hoped it would be successful.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £550,234 to complete the sum for Wages of Artificers, &c.

SIR JOSEPH PAXTON called the attention of the House to the great increase that had taken place in the number of artificers employed. Last year there were 8,000, now there were 13,000. He hoped that when the time came for dispensing with their services, they would not be turned adrift in masses, as they were at the close of the Russian war.

MR. F. PEEL said, he feared that the columns in the Estimates which proposed to state the number of persons employed in the several manufacturing departments did not give accurate information. Under the head of laboratories it appeared that in the current year there were to be employed 1,154 persons more than last year, and if they supposed that their wages on the average would be £40 each, that would require an increased sum of about £46,000 or £50,000; whereas the sum taken this year was less than last year by £2,400. In the carriage department he observed that the increase in the number of persons employed over last year was 350, while the decrease in the cost was as much as £10,000. He also wished to ask a question with respect to the carriage department. As far as he understood there was a difference between the revised and the original Estimates. There was an increase in the force of 2,000 men, costing about £240,000 additional, which sum was met by the reduction of £80,000 each on three Votes—one the Miscellaneous Vote, one the stores Vote, and a third in this, the carriage department. He wished to ask what was the work which it was proposed to execute by means of the sum of £80,000, which it was now found possible to dispense with?

Mr. Sidney Herbert

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, it was true that with an increase in the number of hands, there was a diminution in the amount of the Vote; and that circumstance had arisen from the fact that many of the persons employed were boys, who were engaged in the manufacture of small-arms ammunition, and who, of course, did not receive a high rate of wages. The reduction in the carriage department had been effected in the following manner. It was found that carriages could be constructed more rapidly than they were required; but it was deemed advisable not to dismiss any of the men, but merely to diminish the amount of overtime.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) £210,000 to complete the sum for Cloth-ing, &c.

COLONEL DUNNE called attention to the confusion at present existing in the accounts in the War Department with regard to clothing. Clothing ordered last April had not yet been delivered; and he should propose the Vote be suspended until some explanation had been afforded. He wished to get the actual expense of the clothing which did not appear.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH suggested that next year the number of men should be placed opposite the amount voted, so that the Committee might know whether there had been economy in the Clothing Department or not.

COLONEL DUNNE asked what was the actual cost of clothing for the Line.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said the cost was £4 5s. per man.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) £851,377 to complete the sum for Provisions, &c.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, he could not understand why the barrack furniture should cost so much every year, as it lasted a long time, and the soldiers themselves had generally to pay for the repair of it.

SIR JOSEPH PAXTON asked for an explanation of the increase in the Forage and Fuel Departments.

COLONEL DICKSON hoped that the Secretary for War would take steps to give cavalry officers their forage free, and also to protect the men from the awful mulctings to which they were subjected on the score of barrack damages.

COLONEL NORTH asked why commanding officers of cavalry regiments did not receive command money like infantry officers?

SIR WILLIAM RUSSELL said, the cost of the repairs of barrack furniture was more than met by the charges made on every regiment, and he was afraid this was only to be accounted for by some great waste in the service.

COLONEL DUNNE said, if the officer in charge, when taking up the barracks, would only govern them properly, it would be impossible for improper charges to be afterwards brought.

COLONEL DICKSON said, there never yet was a regiment in which, at the end of every month, deductions for barrack damages were not made from every man's pay.

Vote agreed to.

(6). £1,365,088 to complete the sum for Warlike Stores.

MR. MONSELL asked why an additional sum of £300,000 was this year required for the purchase and repair of small arms, the amount this year being £615,051, instead of £322,592. In the Vote for iron ordnance, shot, shell, &c., there was also a very great increase. He wished to know what portion of that amount had been applied to the manufacture of Armstrong guns, and how much in the purchase of smooth-bore guns, to be afterwards rifled either on Sir William Armstrong's or some other patent. He understood that none of the smooth-bores which had been rifled had given satisfactory results, and that some of them had burst.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH remarked that the sum asked for Miscellaneous Stores in the present Estimate was £713,438, while last year it was only £621,354. When so many other items were given in detail he thought this was a case in which fuller information might be given.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE also referred to the large increase in the Miscellaneous Estimates, particularly those for India. He also wished to know when the Returns ordered of the account between the Indian Government and English War Office would be laid upon the table.

COLONEL DUNNE said, it appeared that 120,000 rifles had been supplied to the Volunteers. Now, these were very delicate weapons, and he wished to ask whether any steps had been taken for ensuring their safe custody in their present hands.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, it would be impossible to print in the Estimates all the items of which the Vote for miscellaneous stores was composed; but it might, perhaps, be desirable to class them under certain heads. The large sum which was charged for small arms arose from the circumstance that last year the trade did not deliver the whole number they had contracted for, and there was, therefore, an unusually large delivery this year. Besides the Estimate for 1,000 Armstrong guns, they had also made provision for the manufacture of a number of smooth-bored guns of heavy weight, for which, under certain circumstances, rifled ordnance could not be substituted. He thought the arms were safer in the hands of the Volunteers than of ordinary recruits: moreover, the Volunteers were bound to repair any damage which was done to the arms placed in their hands. The payments from the Indian Government for stores were now made more rapidly than in former times; but the settlement of the general military accounts with India could not be completed until after the lapse of three or four years.

COLONEL SYKES complained that, although on the whole Estimate there was an increase of £950,000, the House was put in possession of no information to show that it was necessary.

SIR JOSEPH PAXTON said, he had been informed that the Armstrong gun had cost the country, directly or indirectly, a sum of £1,000,000. Now, he had no objection to make to that outlay if the arm was likely to perform the services that had been supposed. But he was anxious to know whether the right hon. Gentleman had turned his attention to the Whitworth guns, which had proved to be most efficient weapons. With respect to the Whitworth rifle, he wished to state that he had received a letter from Mr. Whitworth, in which that gentleman declared that he could manufacture that instrument at Enfield as cheaply as the rifles which were at present made there; and as the Whitworth rifle had stood the test of all competition it was desirable that that declaration should be put to some practical test. No doubt Sir William Armstrong had expended a very large sum of money in bringing his gun to its present perfection: but so also Mr. Whitworth had expended £30,000 or £40,000 on his. Now as Mr. Whitworth must turn this outlay to account for some country or other, he hoped it would be for England, and that the War Office would retain Mr. Whitworth as they had Sir William Armstrong. If our Government did not purchase Mr. Whitworth's invention, he had no doubt some other country would.

MR. MONSELL condemned the manner in which the gun-factory at Woolwich was at present governed. The gallant officer who was formerly at the head of the factory had been removed to make way for Sir William Armstrong.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT explained that Sir William Armstrong was Director of the Rifled Ordnance, not of the whole gun-factory, and that his appointment to that office and the removal of Colonel Wilmot were quite distinct.

MR. MONSELL believed the appointment of Sir William Armstrong necessarily led to the removal of the gallant officer. The objection to the present arrangement was, that if the gun of Mr. Whitworth or of any other inventor proved to be superior to that of Sir William Armstrong, and were purchased by the Government, the manufacture of it would have to be confided to a rival inventor. Mr. Anderson, he knew, was the resident head of the factory, but still he was subordinate to Sir William.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH wished to know whether it was proposed that there should be a trial for range or accuracy of the Armstrong and of the Whitworth guns.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, Mr. Whitworth had been in communication with the Government; he had, indeed, received considerable assistance from it. Mr. Whitworth proposed two things,—that the Government should try his gun, or buy it; on the whole, the Government had decided on buying the gun without trying it. If on trial the Whitworth gun should prove the superior arm, Mr. Whitworth would supply a little additional machinery to the Government manufactory which would enable the Government to make the gun without difficulty, Mr. Whitworth receiving a certain royalty on each gun. As to the Whitworth rifle, it was certainly a very good weapon; but it cost £10, while the Enfield rifle cost only £2 18s. The Government must hesitate before it decided on adopting the more costly article. The life of a rifle is estimated to be about ten years; and there should always be in store 500,000; to replace the arms now in use by the Whitworth rifle, and have the proper number stored in reserve, would cost £10,000,000. Mr. Whitworth was trying a less expensive process of making the rifle barrels, by which, if it succeeded, a great advantage would be gained. He thought the Government would be acting unwisely if, when the present weapon was in advance of that of all other armies, it changed it for one more than three times its cost. It had been stated that the Armstrong gun was very expensive, that it had already cost the country £1,000,000; but he believed it would cost less at last than at first. The brass 12-pounders that originally cost £250, were now manufactured for £90 and £100. Part of the Vote for ammunition was applied to shot and shell for the Armstrong gun; it was very expensive, as were other shells and fuses; but the destruction caused by the Armstrong shells was much greater.

Sir Joseph Paxton

SIR FREDERIC SMITH suggested the expediency of putting a certain number, at all events, of Whitworth rifles, into the hands of our troops. The British soldier was the most costly one in Europe, and he also performed the largest amount of duty; and it would be true economy to arm him in the most efficient manner.

LORD FERMOY understood the Government had decided on first buying the Whitworth gun and trying it afterwards. Surely the merits of the gun would be an ingredient of the price. To ordinary minds it seemed a strange way of doing business.

COLONEL SYKES thought it not quite decided whether the Enfield rifle was the best weapon. It fired rapidly, but he understood grew foul very rapidly also. He was not aware whether the Whitworth rifle was liable to this defect in the same degree.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he doubted whether the Whitworth rifle might not foul even more quickly than the Enfield, since the diameter of its bore was smaller.

Vote agreed to.

(7.) £206,500, Civil Buildings.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH asked for explanations relative to the total estimated cost of the store establishments at Fort Toul, at Guernsey and Alderney, amounting altogether to £36,000, and £15,000 of which was for the present year. He should like to know how it came to pass that it would cost so large a sum, which in itself was sufficient to construct a small fort. At Woolwich Arsenal there was also a proposed charge of £2,000 for a new painters' shop, £3,000 for a cart and waggon shed, £8,000 for a landing and shipping shed, and £12,000 for a new magazine establishment. There was also £50,000 taken for a school of gunnery at Shoeburyness—which was about the price of a small fortress. Unless satisfactory explanations were given on these points he thought the works ought not to be undertaken.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, it was necessary that the store establishments at Fort Touraille should be surrounded by a defensive inclosure. The charge for the new painters' shop might seem considerable, but it was to cover a larger space, and when they remembered what a large amount of painting had to be done it could not be considered excessive. The waggon shed would be found convenient for the accommodation of the carts of the military train. The shipping wharf was also indispensable for the new magazine establishment. It would effect a great saving, as it would form a permanent magazine, and supersede the necessity of sending the powder by floating lighters up the river. As regarded the school of gunnery at Shoeburyness he had no intention whatever of stopping the progress of the works. The school was for the instruction of our troops and artillery force, and the money could not be better expended. It was an institution from which the army would derive the greatest benefit. He should be sorry to see the Vote curtailed, as it would prevent them from going on as rapidly as possible.

Vote agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £707,607, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of Barracks, at Home and Abroad, which will come in course of payment during the Year ending on the 31st day of March, 1861, inclusive:"—

COLONEL NORTH took occasion to ask whether in the new hospital at Netley it was intended accommodation should be afforded for the lunatic soldiers of the army? While upon that subject he should wish to draw the attention of the House to the case of a poor soldier who had become a lunatic in consequence of wounds he had received in the service of his country. The case, which had occurred at Rochester, had come on for hearing before the mayor.

This man was set adrift in the streets of Chatham with a non-commissioned officer in plain clothes to watch him. But suppose he had done some one an injury? It was disgraceful to this country to treat thus a soldier who might have lost his reason from sun-stroke, or from wounds received in the service of his country. He thought the overseers of Rochester quite right in refusing to maintain all the lunatics discharged from the military hospital. He had sat upon the Committee for inquiring into the sanitary arrangements of the army, and there was no point on which the Committee were so unanimous as on the recommendation that there should be a lunatic asylum for the army; and the Committee, after a full consideration of the subject, recommended that a portion of the hospital at Netley should be set aside for lunatics. Sir J. Liddell told the Committee that in the navy a sailor was taken care of from the moment he was seized until he was restored to reason. One of the Inspectors-General of the army said he found that when a lunatic soldier disobeyed the orders he received from civilians set over him he said, "I do not know you; you are not my officer, and I have nothing to say to you." If lunatic sailors were so well taken care of, why should there not also exist a lunatic asylum for soldiers?

MR. MONSELL inquired what necessity there was for expending £120,000 in erecting a new hospital, and purchasing land at Woolwich. Even were it required, was it right to go on expending at so formidable a rate?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, there were two items in regard to which it appeared either that the columns were not added up correctly, or else that the Estimates had been much exceeded by the actual expenditure. The estimated cost of the New Staff College at Sandhurst was £75,000. It appeared that £20,000 had been already voted, that £25,000 was now asked for, and that £40,000 was wanted to complete the college, being £10,000 more than the original estimate. Then, in the next page, there was a Vote for erecting new barracks at Chelsea. The original estimate was £140,000. The amount already voted was £120,000, the sum now asked for was £30,000 and the further amount required was £110,000. Here the estimated cost appeared to be £140,000, and the expenditure £260,000. This Vote required some explanation.

Then there was a vote for the new hospital at Netley. The total estimated cost was £292,911; the amount already voted was £285,000; the sum now proposed to be voted was £45,000, and the further amount required was £25,299. Here was an outlay of £355,000, against an estimated cost of £292,911. Some valuable instructions had been issued by the right hon. Gentleman to Engineer officers in regard to the expense of civil buildings. An opinion was gaining ground, however, that these buildings would be better attended to by the Board of Works, which had the care of all the public buildings of the country.

SIR JOSEPH PAXTON, seeing an item for £21,000 for gas at Aldershot, hoped it was not intended to introduce gas into the huts there. It was very undesirable, on sanitary grounds, to introduce gas into small and crowded buildings. He wished also to know whether the site for the barracks at Nottingham had been purchased, and whether it would be sufficiently far from the town to permit of exercising and recreation ground being provided for the soldiers. He did not think the Hotel at Fleetwood adapted for the purposes of barracks. Then as regarded Netley. He thought it had been one of the most mismanaged of all our public buildings. But he was bound to say that the right hon. Gentleman the present Secretary for War was to be exonerated from blame in this matter because he was the first to call attention to the matter, and to endeavour to arrest the further progress of the building on its present site. Land had first been purchased on the Southampton Water. Then money was asked for the foundations. Step by step the outlay had risen to £350,000, and no doubt it would amount to £400,000 before it was finished. It was a hospital for accommodating 1,000 men, and it would cost £400 per man, while in a sanitary point of view it was a most improper site for a hospital. He had visited most of the hospitals in the country, and Netley also, and he must say it was a miserable production. The sun hardly penetrated the long corridors, and it was internally ill-arranged. It appeared to be got up for a show in Southampton Water, and not as a hospital for invalided soldiers. He should like to know for how many men the new hospital at Woolwich was intended. Was it true that it was intended to erect brick instead of wood huts in the various camps in the country? There was an item of £50,000 for sanitary improvements, under barrack and hospital Commissions. His only objection to this barrack expenditure was, that we did not from the first take the bull by the horns and ask for £800,000 at once, instead of perpetually taking these additional Votes.

Sir Stafford Northcote

MAJOR HAMILTON wished to know whether the Vote for military prisons was to provide increased accommodation. He thought in the case of soldiers convicted of only military, not criminal offences, care should be taken that they were confined in prisons where military discipline was enforced, and that they should not be degraded by contamination with felons.

MR. PIGOTT approved the suggestion of the hon. Member for Coventry, that the huts at Aldershot should be constructed of brick. The huts at present were not water-tight; many of them were in a very loathsome state, infested with bugs, which rendered them almost uninhabitable by either men or officers. This annoyance should be got rid of somehow. It sometimes happened that the men were unable to appear on parade in consequence of the punishment they had undergone during the previous night. At all events, the huts should be kept clean and decent. The yards also required great attention.

COLONEL LINDSAY knew the huts at Aldershot to be in a state anything but satisfactory. They were full of fleas, bugs, and all sorts of insects. It would be a great improvement if brick huts were introduced. It was a great inconvenience that no quarters were provided for the General officer in command, who in consequence was obliged to live at a very considerable distance, and to ride ten miles every day to and from the camp. As the General officer in command (General Knollys) was about to leave that camp, he could not help observing that they owed much to him for the state of discipline into which he had brought it. He took the camp when in a state of inefficiency, and he had brought it to its present state of perfection. In doing so he had very great difficulties to encounter, which required all his firmness and all his courtesy. While he was in command of that camp the Militia were first embodied, and he had brought them to the highest state of perfection—quite equal to that of their brethren of the Line. He wished to ask a question or two. Would the right hon. Gentleman explain, with regard to married soldiers' quarters—for which £30,000 was taken this year—whether it was proposed that these quarters should be given over absolutely with certain allowances to the married soldiers who were to occupy them, or to make them pay a certain amount for the occupation of these quarters? He agreed with what had fallen from the hon. Member for Coventry (Sir Joseph Paxton) that it would have been much better to vote a large sum at once in order to carry out barrack improvements. That arrangement would have been at once more satisfactory and more economical. He had had the honour of sitting on a Committee for Barrack Improvement, and the understanding come to was that £40,000 a year should be devoted to this purpose. There was now a sum of £50,000 taken for sanitary improvements, and the other sum of £40,000 did not appear. He hoped to learn from the right hon. Gentleman that the arrangements connected with the new barracks at Chelsea were now finally terminated.

MR. CHILDERS hoped the right hon. Gentleman would explain the item of £20,000 for the purchase of the hotel at Fleetwood, which he did not think at all suitable for a barrack. £8,000 had been spent on the Coventry barracks, and 5,000 was asked for now; and there was a large sum put down for land at York to increase the barrack accommodation there; but he wished to call attention to the case of Leeds, in the same county, which was more in want of barrack accommodation than York.

COLONEL SYKES begged to call the attention of the Committee to the contingencies that arose on Votes now agreed to. If they looked to column 5, they would see that very large sums would be required in future, these sums being contingent upon others now or previously voted. For gas works at Aldershot there would next year be required £11,000, a sum of £10,000 having been already given. For a new Staff College £40,000 would be required, £20,000 having been already voted, and £25,000 being now asked for more land for barracks at Chelsea, £110,000—now asked for £30,000. For a new hospital at Woolwich there would be wanted in future £105,000, the sum now asked for being £15,000. These and other sums which he might specify would ultimately be required in consequence of sums voted this year. The fact being that the above four Votes alone would require £266,000 to complete the works.

MR. BUCHANAN asked what was to be done in reference to the proposed barracks at Glasgow? He understood that the site which had been suggested for the purpose was an inconvenient one, and that the locality fixed upon was of five times the value for which equally good ground could be procured.

COLONEL GILPIN called the attention of the Committee to the state of military hospitals. He believed that if a soldier was afflicted with lunacy and his parish could not be ascertained he was farmed out. He believed that this was not a satisfactory state of things, and the Lunacy Commissioners had strongly reported against the present system in reference to lunacy.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, the Lunatic Asylums at Fort Clarence and Chatham had been condemned, and a Commission recommended the purchase of a piece of land for a new asylum on the banks of the Medway, near Maidstone; but for some reason or other the purchase had not been completed, and the matter remained in abeyance. He observed that there was to be a new Staff College at Sandhurst, but he should like to know how £75,000 was to be expended for that purpose. With respect to the item of £10,000 for erecting rifle range huts at Gravesend, he could not understand how this outlay should be needed when there existed so much accommodation at Chatham. The army at large were much indebted to the right hon. Gentleman for the present Vote for married soldiers' quarters. The gasworks at Aldershot would greatly increase the comfort of the troops, who were often driven to the public-house because a party of twenty men were only allowed the light of two miserable candles to read or write by.

SIR MORTON PETO submitted to the right hon. Gentleman that it would be better to remove Kensington Barracks altogether, and place them either in connection with the Chelsea Barracks or in some other situation.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he would now answer the various questions that had been put to him. In reference to military lunatic asylums he recollected that the subject had been considered by the Sanitary Commission, who had made a recommendation to the Government on the subject; and were disinclined to recommend the erection of new lunatic asylums to be managed by Government authorities. He believed that it was better for the military lunatics that they should be placed in well-regulated private asylums supervised by the Lunacy Commissioners. He had no great faith in Governmental management of an asylum of this description, and particularly on this ground—that they had not a staff of men educated for that special purpose. It was no hardship to send military lunatics to private asylums, for the friends of persons in a better station of life preferred sending them to such places, and he believed that the lunatics there were well treated. As to the hospital at Netley, he did not think that the building had been spoken of in terms a bit too severe. He himself protested against the plan when it was first suggested, and a Commission of which he was a member reported against it. But the House did not support him in his objections. The truth, however, was that the building at Netley was commenced before public attention was directed to constructions of this kind. It was quite true that military hospitals were not well adapted for their purpose; but if from that statement it was inferred that civil hospitals were one whit better, the inference was quite wrong, for there were some of the large hospitals in London that would cap anything that existed in the worst military hospitals. The Government were now building barracks that would make incomparably better hospitals than many of those now in existence; for instance, the barracks for the Guards at Chelsea. He believed that they would be excellent barracks, but he was sure they would make incomparably better hospitals than the generality of the Metropolitan hospitals. Netly Hospital had been very expensive in its construction, and the expensive part of the building rendered it unfit for a hospital. There were long corridors with deep rooms with windows at the end facing the North East, and no side ventilation; whereas, now that common sense was being applied to these subjects, it was well recognized that the proper treatment of the sick required the greatest possible admission of fresh air. The late Secretary for the Treasury opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote) had pointed out some difficulties in reference to military buildings, and said, "Why do you not go to the Board of Works and let them build for you, or why not go to a civil architect?" Now, the fact was, that wherever the Engineers had built barracks in competition with civilians they had built them both better and cheaper than the civilians. That they should build them better was but natural, seeing that they were better acquainted than civilians could be with the habits and requirements of soldiers. In the time of Lord Panmure barracks were built by competition, and the result was this:—The Infantry barracks at Devonport were built at a cost of £70 a man; those at Preston at £80 a man; those at Gosport at £91 a man; those at Aldershot, the cheapest barracks they had, at £51 a man; and those at Berwick at £96 a man. The tenders by civilians for the infantry were £140 per man, another £200, and another £212. For the cavalry in the same proportion, £195, £196, and £198. The Staff College was the next thing alluded to. At the Staff College there was accommodation for forty officers, each officer having a sitting-room and small dormitory; accommodation for forty-one servants and eighty-one horses, with libraries, hall of study, lecture-rooms, &c. All that, of course, was a serious addition to the expense of the building.

Mr. Sidney Herbert

COLONEL NORTH said, in his day the Staff officers used the room of the cadets.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that was quite true, but it was intended to employ Sandhurst more extensively, where young men were to pass their time in order to go through the army. It had been observed that in some cases that the figures did not tally in the Estimates. One or two of the differences were obviously misprints. In the case of the London and Chelsea barracks the total estimated amount for the building was £140,000; and the sum of £120,000 which was taken last year was for the site alone, but he was happy to say that it had been obtained for a great deal less money. Another case was that of Gravesend. The sum stated as being spent last year was £17,000 in the purchase of land, and in that case of course the figures did not tally. With regard to the Euston Hotel at Fleetwood, that was intended not for a barrack, but to be a duplication of the establishment at Hythe, as the latter place was already overdone, and it had been represented that a similar establishment in the North would be advisable, and that this hotel could be easily converted into officers' quarters. York and Nottingham were in the same position; a small sum had been taken for additional buildings to each. Both were cavalry barracks; and the Government thought it better to have a few large barracks than a number of small ones distributed over the country, as it was obviously much better for discipline and in all other respects, and was more economical. At Leeds the barrack was in a bad situation for the purpose, and it was a question whether it was not better to sell the site, which was valuable for other purposes, than to spend more money upon it. At Edinburgh estimates had been put forth from time to time for the purchase of a site for barracks, but the modern Athenians objected to spoiling the picturesque appearance of the neighbourhood, and put forth a design for a building of a highly ornamental character—one something resembling that House—which would cost a very large sum of money, but they did not propose to furnish the additional money that would be required to carry out their plan. He thought, therefore, it was better to give up the barracks at the Castle, and to look for another site outside the town. At Glasgow it had been proposed to purchase a site upon which had been erected a lunatic asylum; but, although very ornamental, the building was not suited for barracks, and therefore he thought it would be wise to look out for a site outside the town. Woolwich Hospital had been referred to, but he hoped that at least the Estimate for that hospitals would be left untouched. The garrison there was continually increasing, and the choice was between building new barracks or a new hospital. The present hospital was well fitted for barracks, and it was proposed to build a new hospital on a more eligible site for the purpose. It had been said that the improvements in barracks and married quarters were not carried out with sufficient rapidity; but there was immense pressure for various expenditure, and caution was necessary. He found that 2,327 barrack rooms and 349 hospital wards had been already ventilated, besides various other sanitary improvements, so that it could not be said the authorities had been idle or dilatory.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, that he understood that there was a gas company at Aldershot that had offered to supply gas on very liberal terms to the Government. He had been informed by disinterested parties that gas could be supplied to the barracks at Aldershot far more advantageously than the Government were likely to supply it themselves. It would be satisfactory to hear from the right hon. Gentleman if that point had been considered.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he believed at this moment the subject was under consideration. It was a question whether the Government should build the works and have them worked by contract.

GENERAL UPTON complained of land having been taken near the quarters of the Guards, which did not leave the men space sufficient to fling a quoit.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM asked of what material the barracks at Hong Kong were to be built, and whether the necessity for their construction arose from the Chinese war.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT replied that it had been proposed to remove the troops at Hong Kong to a higher level, and a few huts had been erected as an experiment, but he could not say what material would be used.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH thanked the right hon. Gentleman for the handsome manner in which he had spoken of the Engineer officers employed in public works, more especially as the memorandum issued some time ago had given great pain to them.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he thought it desirable that where there was any alteration from the original Estimate, attention should be called to it by a marginal Vote. He referred more particularly to the Vote for the Staff College.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he never knew money thrown away in a worse manner than that £70,000 for the Staff College. He thought the Staff College one of the greatest pieces of extravagance of the day. Qualification never was a reason for getting employment on the Staff, and he believed (having been in the College himself) that in twenty years not more than sixteen officers from the College had been employed. He wished, also, to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the Vote of £5,000 for gymnasiums at the Curragh, and £10,000 for rifle ranges. £5,000 ought to be enough for twenty gymnasiums. They were distributing rifle arms in all directions; was it proposed to prepare rifle ranges for all branches of the army and the Volunteers as well? He wished to know what steps were being taken towards procuring ground for the construction of these rifle ranges.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH called attention to the various Votes for purchases of land mentioned in the Estimates, as, for instance, in the case of a hospital at Woolwich, and of a battery at Glasgow. He thought they ought to have specific details of the lands purchased and the sums paid for them as separate items.

MR. HENLEY regretted to hear the decision which the right hon. Gentleman had announced with regard to the treatment of lunatic soldiers. The condition of such persons in what was called the hospital at Chatham was as little satisfactory as that of the inmates of any similar establishment in the country. He understood that the right hon. Gentleman now proposed to take these unfortunate persons from the hospital at Chatham and scatter them through the various private asylums. He ought, however, to remember that the Legislature had compelled the various authorities in counties and boroughs to take the pauper lunatics out of such places, and to provide accommodation for them. The manner in which a poor lunatic soldier had been turned out in the neighbourhood of Chatham, in order to raise a legal question as regarded the parochial authorities, was not a good sample of Government treatment of these poor creatures.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he had not spoken of an intention to do anything. He had spoken of the existing practice, and in doing so had not said that the men removed from Chatham were scattered in private asylums throughout the country. They were removed to one asylum.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE requested an explanation respecting a sum of £5,000 taken for the erection of a gymnasium on the Curragh.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT: Not for the Curragh only, but for gymnasia at the different stations.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE thought these gymnasia totally unnecessary, and his experience of them was that they were places at which men became ruptured and received injuries which unfitted them for soldiers.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, the Government sent an officer to Paris and Berlin to inquire into the system of gymnastics in use there, and it was found that the French had paid particular attention to gymnastics for the purpose of developing the strength and activity of their soldiers.

Colonel Dunne

The system gave wonderful power to men who were not naturally very athletic or vigorous, and it was determined to adopt it to a moderate extent in this country. Of course, if men were allowed to frequent these gymnasia without proper control they would be liable to accidents; but, in point of fact, they would never use them except at stated hours, and under the eye of an officer who was competent to direct their exercise, and who would see that they did not expose themselves to unnecessary risk. The French soldiers subjected to this training were able to clear formidable palisades, to climb walls where there seemed to be no hold, and thus acquired a development of the muscular system which could not be attained by ordinary exercise. With regard to the question put by the hon. Member (Mr. A. Smith), it might be desirable for the future to distinguish in the Estimates between the cost of land and of buildings.

COLONEL LINDSAY said, it was most important to provide soldiers in and about their quarters with means of recreation, which at the same time developed their muscular power. Some years ago the late Colonel Hood established a gymnasium for the use of one of the battalions of Guards. It was under proper supervision; to the best of his belief, but one, if one, accident occurred there, and the training they received added much to the physical efficiency of the men.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE persisted in thinking this sum of £5,000 an unnecessary expenditure. Soldiers did not like any exercise which assumed the shape of drill. If you wanted to give them exercise, let them play at cricket, or any other healthy amusement of the kind. He should move the reduction of the Vote by this sum.

COLONEL PERCY HERBERT was surprised that a Gentleman who had once been in the service should oppose this Vote. If there was one thing more desirable than another, it was to give soldiers plenty of occupation, and to keep them out of the pothouse.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: The hon. Gentleman has convinced me. I shall divide upon this Vote.

COLONEL KNOX asked what the right hon. Gentleman intended to do about the barracks at Chelsea. The plans of the barracks had been modified and altered until they had become extremely expensive, while in other respects he believed the alterations to be for the worse. Was it proposed to begin these barracks at once? ["Divide!"] The hon. Member who called "divide" represented a northern constituency, and cared nothing about the soldier except to get as much out of him as possible. He stood there, however, as a representative of the army, and would not be put down by a mercantile man in any such way.

MAJOR PARKER said, there was an item of £10,000 for rifle ranges. If you began to pay for these things for the Volunteers, the Rifle Volunteer movement would lose its present character.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT replied that these ranges were purchased for military stations, and not for Volunteers. The plans of the Chelsea barracks had been submitted to military men, who had thought highly of them. A Vote was asked for on account of them, and tenders were on the point of being taken for their erection.

MR. CONINGHAM understood there was to be a removal of depôts from Woolwich to a situation further northwards, and yet buildings appeared to be proceeded with at Woolwich at a rate very alarming in respect to the public purse.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that though some depôts of arms and ammunition might be removed from Woolwich, that place would still continue a very great military station, and the head-quarters of the Artillery.

MR. W. WILLIAMS observed, that there were several items for making roads and drains, amounting in all to a large amount. If the soldiers were employed on that work and paid for it they would be better occupied than in gymnasiums.

MR. PIGOTT said, he had been pointed out, particularly by the hon. and gallant Member for Marlow (Colonel Knox), for some observation he was supposed to have made; but if the gallant officer had been connected with the mercantile world he would have been more punctual in his attendance in that House, and would have known that the matter alluded to by him had already been explained once or twice by the Secretary for War. If a division took place, he should vote with the hon. Member for Liskeard. This was only the commencement of a large expenditure, and if they began with £5,000 they would soon get up to £500,000.

COLONEL KNOX said, he had not alluded to the hon. Gentleman.

COLONEL DICKSON expressed his intention to vote with the hon. Member for Liskeard. There were many things on which this money could be spent more important to the army than gymnasiums. He trusted that some stop would be put to the expenditure of money on huts at Aldershot. If barracks were built in other parts the troops could be collected for two or three months at a time together under different commanders, and that would serve all the desired purpose.

COLONEL NORTH supported the item which had been objected to. The object of every officer was to give some amusement to the soldiers.

MAJOR KNOX said, he trusted that the Secretary for War would declare that this item was only the commencement of a system.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That the item of £5,000, for the erection of Gymnasiums, Recreation Grounds, &c., be omitted from the proposed Vote."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 18; Noes 154: Majority 136.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £277,547, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of the Educational and Scientific Branches, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1861, inclusive."

MR. CHILDERS called attention to the item of £29,000 for the prosecution of the Ordnance Survey in England. He understood that in that amount was included a sum to defray the preliminary arrangements for completing the survey of the whole of England and Wales on a 25-inch scale. He thought the country owed a deep debt of gratitude to Colonel James for his conduct of the survey. But, as the expense of a survey on the enlarged scale, was estimated at no less a sum than £1,450,000, he thought the Committee should pause before embarking in so costly an undertaking; and, in order to raise the question, he moved that the Vote should be reduced by the sum of £10,000. He had no objection to the survey in England and Wales being completed on a 6-inch scale.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the item of £29,000 for the prosecution of the Survey in England, be reduced by the sum of £10,000."

MR. CARDWELL said, it would be in the recollection of the Committee that about three years ago this subject was very much discussed, and that Lord Panmure, who then held the office of Secretary for War, appointed a Crown Commission to inquire and report. The Commissioners were unanimous in thinking that the expense of taking a survey upon a 25-inch scale exceeded by so very little the cost of a survey upon a 6-inch scale, that in regard to all new surveys it should be considered the least economical and most wasteful course to adopt a 6-inch instead of a 25-inch scale. A 25-inch scale could be reduced with ease to any scale whatever, so that it possessed the advantage of a 6-inch scale with scarcely any additional expense. It should be remembered that a 6-inch scale was far beyond the limits of the size of a map, and therefore could never be available in that character. If a map was wanted, let a 1-inch scale be adopted. A 6-inch scale was fitted, not for a map, but for a plan, or what they called on the Continent a cadastre. The evidence was conclusive and the report unanimous, and he believed that with regard to the survey of cultivated tracks on the 25-inch scale being preferable to a survey on the 6-inch scale there would be no difference of opinion among those who read the evidence taken before that Commission.

COLONEL DUNNE remembered the discussions that had formerly taken place on this Vote, and he thought it had been settled that the 25-inch scale was only to be applied to certain parts of Scotland. It now appeared it was to be applied to England too, and if so, of course to Ireland. He wished to know what would be the expense of this change of plan over the whole kingdom.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH thought that 25 was an unfortunate number, and that 24 inches would have been better, because it would have been the multiple of six inches. He could not understand what the rural districts could want with the 25-inch scale; and when it was considered that a survey on a large scale for the purpose of tithe commutation had been recently made, he thought the expense unjustifiable.

MR. MONSELL said, there would be a 1-inch map for England, a 6-inch for Ireland, and a 25-inch for a considerable part of Scotland. There was no question between the 25-inch and the 6-inch, because the former was much more useful and a very little more expensive. But the question was whether it was worth while that the whole of England should be surveyed over again on the 25-inch scale. If the three kingdoms were to be all surveyed on the 25-inch scale, it would cost some millions of money, and he suggested that the Committee should now report progress, and not seriously discuss the matter in this incidental manner, without notice, after midnight.

Mr. Cardwell

MR. JOSEPH LOCKE had a distinct recollection of the discussion that took place formerly on this subject, and he understood that the conclusion come to was, that the parts of Scotland then under survey should be completed on the 25-inch scale, and no more. Since then, however, the survey on the 25-inch scale had been extended to other parts, he believed, without the authority of this House. It now appeared that it was to be extended to England, and in all probability to Ireland. He admitted that the question was a difficult one, but for that very reason he thought it was a strange thing to attempt to commit the House to the expense by a Vote of this kind. He would support the Motion for reporting progress.

MR. ELLICE (Coventry) thought the Committee ought not to consent to this Vote without being fully aware that a 25-inch scale for England and Ireland meant not only an entirely new survey, but the maintenance of a permanent establishment for the perpetual correction of that survey. A 25-inch survey was nothing more nor less than a map of a man's estate, marking all the lanes, the trees, the hedges, drains, and a variety of features which were continually changing, so that what was a correct survey this year was anything but correct next year. The Committee ought, therefore, to take into consideration that not only was it asked to sanction a first expenditure of a good million, but to saddle the country to all time with the maintenance of an expensive permanent department.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT would postpone the Vote, but hoped the Committee would proceed with some of the unopposed Votes.

Motion, and Original Question, by leave, withdrawn.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again on Wednesday next.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHARITIES BILL.

Order for Consideration read.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that he had several times called the attention of the House to the fact of this Bill standing on the Orders of the Day almost at the bottom of the list, day by day, and he was afraid the boast of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Bowyer) would be realized—namely, that he would pass this Bill through the House without discussion. That observation was made in reply to an observation of his own. He had asked the Attorney General to explain the nature of the Amendments to the House on the previous stage; but in the absence of the Attorney General, of his right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge, this Bill, on the Motion of the hon. Member for Dundalk, was passed through the stage of Committee, which he looked upon as an attempt to force the Bill through the House, and he trusted that the House would not consent to pass the Bill without giving the fullest opportunity of considering the Amendments. The subject had been for seven years before the House, and it was too bad that it should be now passed at the far-end of the Session without discussion, which would, in point of fact, be entirely abrogating the functions of the House. He therefore moved the adjournment of the debate.

MR. BOWYER said, that his only object was to ensure some legislation before the existing Act expired, which would be on the 4th of July. He should have preferred permanent legislation; but if that could not be obtained they must pass the Suspension Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that he quite agreed with the hon. Member for Warwickshire that this important measure should not be hurried through without discussion, and he was surprised to find it had passed through Committee the other night, having fully intended to have made some explanation of the Amendments.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

House adjourned at half-after One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, June 19, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—3^d Infants Marriage Act Amendment.

VOL. CLIX. [THIRD SERIES.]

CHURCH RATES ABOLITION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD LYVEDEN said, that in moving the second reading of a Bill for the abolition of Church Rates, he felt that he must crave more than a usual portion of their Lordships' indulgence. He was aware he should be obliged, in the discharge of the duty he had undertaken, to utter opinions adverse to those entertained by many noble Lords then present, and fearing that much he had to say would be uncongenial to their feelings and sentiments, he had cause to apprehend that they might visit upon the cause the awkwardness of the advocate who promoted it. When the noble Duke below him brought this subject forward in 1858, the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby), the leader of the Conservative party, said he should like to see the Peer who would be bold enough to undertake the task he had now risen to perform. But so far from being a reproach to him that he now came forward to declare his opinions in their Lordships' House, it would be rather a reproach to him if he failed to support in that House the principles which he had conscientiously sustained elsewhere during thirty years of Parliamentary life, and which he held in common with many with whom he had always acted, and who had placed in him entire confidence. He could not also but remember the ups and downs that had befallen all political questions in the present generation, but which, after causing as much division as the measure which he had now the boldness to present to their Lordships, had been ultimately settled by enactment according to the popular views. A few years before the passing of the Reform Bill of 1832 it was impossible to excite public interest in the subject of reform, and Parliament refused to transfer the franchise from East Retford to Birmingham. The Government of Lord Melbourne were expelled from office in 1841 for proposing a fixed duty of 8s. on corn, and in 1846 the corn laws were swept away from the statute book. The conduct of Parliament upon the admission of the Jews to seats in the Legislature was even more analogous to the present case. In 1841 the Jewish Civil Disabilities Removal Bill was introduced and thrown out. In 1845 it was carried by Lord Chancellor Lyndhurst. In 1848 the second reading of the Bill for admitting the Jews to Parliament was carried in the other House by a majority of 70. In 1851 the Bill was read a second time by a majority of 25. It was re-introduced in 1853, and in 1858 the Bill was again brought up to their Lordships' House. The door was then left ajar by their Lordships by which the Jews were allowed to gain admission into the other House. The present Bill might also meet with repeated rejections, but he trusted would ultimately meet with similar success. Their Lordships had predicted all sorts of danger from the admission of the Jews to Parliament—it was said to be not only a question affecting the Church of England, but even the ark of Christianity itself was said to be in peril. But what had been the result of the passing of that measure? The result of admitting the Jews had been that four or five Gentlemen of undoubted character and position had taken their seats in the other House; yet the Church was not in danger from their presence, and the ark of Christianity was still as safe as it had ever been. The remembrance of these circumstances led him to hope that at some time or other something effectual would be done on behalf of those who prayed to be relieved from the obligation of church rates. He knew it would be said of him that in coming forward to propose this Bill, he was an enemy of the Church. He could assure their Lordships that by early education and mature conviction he was a sincere friend to a Church establishment, and that in asking their Lordships to agree to this Bill he was persuaded that he was by no means the enemy of the Church, but was really promoting its continuance and popularity. The law, as it had been declared by the highest legal authorities and by the Report of the Committee, declared that the payment of church rates was a legal obligation, but that it was supported by no legal remedy. Now, that appeared to him to be a most anomalous state of things. He could understand what a religious or moral obligation was; but he confessed he could not understand what a legal obligation was without a legal remedy. He should like to know what was the value of such an obligation—what it would fetch in the market? Well, that was the position in which church rates at present stood in this country. They might say, how do these rates differ from a poor rate, or a highway rate? There was, however, a wide distinction between the two cases, as had been shown by the able evidence of Mr.

Lord Lyveden

Sotherton Estcourt—a Gentleman well qualified to give an opinion upon all such subjects, having discharged with great ability the high office of Secretary of State for the Home Department under the Government of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby). Mr. Estcourt said that the difference presented by this question was to be found in the religious element which it involved. No man's religion led him to assert that no roads should be made, but there were numbers of persons who said that there ought to be no compulsory rate for the Church. The legal duty of asking for the rate might be discharged by the churchwardens and the clergyman, but no moving power existed of compelling a church rate to be made. He would not go into the antiquarian branch of this subject, which had been fully expounded by Mr. Toulmin Smith, one of the witnesses examined before the Committee. He would, therefore, only remark that if the tax were obnoxious and odious to large classes of the community, it was of very little consequence whether it existed in the time of Alfred the Great or Edward the Confessor, when the rate was perhaps paid willingly, and when there were no Dissenters. Their Lordships were now asked to deal with an acknowledged evil. Lawyers, divines, statesmen, and politicians had for the last twenty years, agreed in declaring that church rates were a great and crying evil, and that matters could not long remain in their existing state. Looking back to the course of legislation during the last half century, it was painful to think how little had been yielded to reason, and how much to fear. In 1829, when he first entered Parliament, the claims of the Roman Catholics had just been yielded to the fear of Irish insurrection. The Reform Bill was next granted from the fear of English commotion. The Corn Laws were repealed from the fear of a famine in Ireland. He did not mention these facts by way of menace. Their Lordships might reject this Bill, and there would be no Birmingham Unions and no marchings to London; but there would be heart-burnings and hatred, the odium theologicum, animosities in parishes and brawlings in churches, and strife and religious—he would not say hatred—but discord. Attempts to effect a compromise of this question had been undertaken by such men as Lord Althorp and Mr. Walpole; and if any two men were ever formed by nature to carry out a compromise, they were the men; for they were friends of the Church, and enemies to no class—mild in manners, conciliatory in conduct—but both completely failed. Lord Althorp proposed to take £250,000 out of £550,000, which was the amount at that time raised by church rates, and put it on the land-tax, leaving the rest to be raised in the old way; but his proposal was not accepted either by Churchmen or Dissenters, and it fell to the ground. If they compared the two proposals of Lord Althorp and Mr. Walpole together, they would see how much the state of the case had altered. Lord Althorp stated the amount of the church rates at £550,000; whereas Mr. Walpole stated the amount to have fallen to £250,000, while the voluntary subscriptions were £260,000. So that while there was a great falling off in the church rates, the voluntary rate, raised to supply the deficiency, had risen to £260,000. The next compromise attempted, to which he would refer, was that of Sir John Easthope, who proposed to throw the maintenance of the fabric of the church on the pew-rents. He wished to call their Lordships' attention particularly to this proposal, because it was opposed by the members of the Church of England, on the ground that the Church of England was the Church of the poor man, and that pew-rents would interfere with his privilege. That was, no doubt, a beautiful boast; but was it a matter of fact? He feared that there was no better foundation for it, than for some of the laudations of Blackstone and De Lolme on some portions of our constitution, as it existed in former times; and it reminded him of the answer of Horne Tooke, when it was said that the law courts were open to every one, that "so was the London Tavern, if they could pay for it." On the subject of the church being open to the poor without pew-rents, he would refer to the Report of the Committee on Religious Destitution. In that Report special reference was made to three of the principal churches at the West-end of the Metropolis: St. James's, St. George's, Hanover Square, and the parish of St. Marylebone. In St. James's the Report stated the seats were all let, producing a rental of £1,400 a year, though there was no legal authority to raise more than £30 per annum by pew-rents. The same state of things existed in the other two churches; and he might observe that it was so in all the great towns of England—the pews were rented by, or appropriated to, the rich; and the poor were deprived of their proper right of accommodation. No doubt there were what were called free seats; but he believed these were generally occupied by a better class of persons than those for whom they were especially designed. He asked their Lordships if they ever saw at church, in any large town, more than one or two persons who could be strictly called poor? Those who occupied the free seats were well-dressed persons, who could easily afford to pay 6d. or 1s. for the accommodation, if they chose to do so. That was not making the Church of England the Church of the poor. He believed it was the original intention of the Church of England to do so; but it was not acted upon; and he must say that nowhere had the principle been carried out, except among the Roman Catholics. In the churches abroad it was a common thing to see the poor and the rich admitted together; the beggar and the noble worshipping side by side. And he did not know that the same thing could be witnessed in any other Church. The transference of the church rates to pew-rents was one mode of settling this question, which had been proposed: he did not, however, recommend it now; and he only mentioned it to show that there were other means besides the present of raising the funds necessary for the maintenance and repair of churches. Sir John Easthope's plan, therefore, like all the others, failed. Various other plans had been introduced by persons of different religious persuasions, and by men of all political opinions—by Mr. Packe, Mr. Sotherton Estcourt, and Mr. Miles, all eminent Conservatives; by the Marquess of Blandford, Sir William Clay, Sir Morton Peto, Mr. Alcock, Mr. Evans, Sir W. Page Wood, Mr. Puller; but every one of them had failed. That being the case, it appeared to him hopeless to endeavour to substitute anything in the place of the existing church rates. In 1855 there appeared, as a reformer of church rates, the most eminent individual who had ever acted in that capacity. He meant the most rev. Prelate below him (the Archbishop of Canterbury.) He introduced a Church rate Bill in that year; and his only reason for not proceeding with it was, that he was given to understand that legislation on such a subject could not properly originate in their Lordships' House. That Bill aimed at a compromise; but it was not a measure founded entirely on the principles of the Church of England, though it contained the most practical proposal ever made on the question. It was that, after the rejection of a church rate twice by a parish, it should cease for ever ; and he made a distinction that had never been proposed before. The most rev. Prelate proposed to exempt all the Metropolitan and Urban parishes, and to leave church rates to be collected exclusively in the rural parishes. He could not conceive a more moderate and practical scheme; and he much regretted that it was not carried into effect. It was one that he believed would have satisfied all reasonable Dissenters. But the effect of that Bill was to abandon the high ground taken up by Churchmen. Infidelity prevailed most in the Urban parishes, and there, too, Dissenters were most numerous. It was, therefore, there that the Church required all the resources it could command, and yet, in these urban parishes the most rev. Prelate proposed to give up church rates, because they could no longer be raised there. The Bill which he (Lord Lyveden) now proposed had been first introduced into their Lordships' House in 1858, when it was rejected by a very large majority ; but the noble Earl opposite (Earl Derby), who was then in power, thought the subject was of such importance that he undertook that a Bill should be introduced by the Government. In the following year, therefore, a Bill was introduced in the House of Commons by Mr. Walpole, which proposed that any one should be relieved from the obligation of paying church rates who chose to say that he was a conscientious Dissenter. The Bill contained other provisions modifying the law of mortmain, and authorizing the rate to be levied upon the owner, instead of the occupier. But the compromise failed to obtain the sanction of the House of Commons. The next step was the introduction of Sir John Trelawny's Bill, which was passing rapidly through the other House when their Lordships adopted their usual course when the Commons were pressing an unpalatable measure upon them, and appointed a Committee to consider the subject. He found no fault with the proceedings of that Committee, but would only remark that, being appointed at the end of the Session, the attendance was scanty and the evidence incomplete. The effect produced by the publication of that evidence was nevertheless considerable. Three witnesses were examined whose evidence produced great effect—Dr. Foster, Mr. Morley, and Mr. Osborne. The two first-named gentlemen frankly avowed that the abolition of church rates was not their ultimate object, but that they wished to destroy the whole Church Establishment. That avowal ought not to have caused much surprise, for it had repeatedly been made by Mr. Hume, Mr. Pellatt, Mr. Sharman Crawford, and others in the House of Commons. It was, however, made a ground of argument against the abolition of church rates that those who chiefly promoted that proceeding were anxious to go still further. He did not think there was any force in that argument, because it had not been shown how, if church rates were abolished, the position of the Dissenters to attack the Church would be strengthened. He believed it would be just the contrary, for the country could never be agitated upon a merely theoretical question. Only a real grievance such as church rates were could sustain agitation, and he thought that by yielding an equivocal, uncertain right, the position of the Church would be greatly strengthened. The Committee also examined Mr. Osborne, a Wesleyan Minister, whose evidence likewise created a great effect, for he said that he personally, and other Wesleyans, did not object to church rates, but at the same time there were no means of ascertaining the general sentiments of the body to which he belonged. That opinion, however, he (Lord Lyveden) begged leave to say was expressed in the 815 petitions that had been presented to Parliament from Wesleyan Methodists in favour of the abolition of church rates. The evidence of the witnesses whom he had mentioned had a certain effect, and was, no doubt, one of the causes of the diminished majority in the other House. But there was another cause for the decrease in the majority. If it was desired to pass liberal measures through the House of Commons the first and last Sessions of a Parliament were the most auspicious periods. In 1859, when fresh from the hustings, hon. Gentlemen were ready to vote for the abolition of church rates; but in 1860 their fervour had somewhat abated. Probably in 1861-2-or-3, as the case might be, they would again vote against church rates before reappearing upon the hustings. The Report of the Committee was drawn up with considerable care; and he (Lord Lyveden) thought it was to be regretted that the noble Duke who presided over the Committee (the Duke of Marlborough) had not thought fit to introduce a Bill founded on the Report, or to have met the present Bill by Resolutions in accordance with that Report. The principal recommendation in the Report was that persons desirous of being exempted from the payment of church rates should give notice of their objections to the churchwardens, and such persons should not be permitted to take part in any vestry called for the purpose of making or applying such rate. There was no requirement of a religious or conscientious objection, but any ground of objection whatever was to exempt a man from the rate. Objections had been made to the voluntary principle that it would be humiliating to clergymen to require them to go round their parishes to beg subscriptions. But there would be just the same humiliation if the recommendation of the Committee were carried out, for the clergymen would have to go round and invite persons not to object to the rate. A more complete voluntary system could not be conceived than the plan set forth by the Committee. He held that the Resolutions of the Committee gave up completely the whole compulsory system, and with it the whole theory of the Church of England. He had now mentioned the various compromises that had been suggested upon this subject. It was clear that compensations, compromises, and substitutes had all been exhausted, and nothing was left but to deal boldly with the question. Ever since 1834 they had had this before them as an acknowledged evil, and he thought they could no longer vote for the continuance of a state of things, which it had been admitted, even from all official benches, could no longer be maintained. Majorities might dwindle down at one time and increase at another, and he quite admitted that a majority of nine was an ominous one, as they had already rejected a Bill which had passed the Commons by that majority. He hoped, however, that he would not hear from the right rev. Bench, or from the noble Lords opposite, that they were determined to maintain a rate, the maintenance of which they had already declared to be impossible. He believed the present position of affairs to be much worse for the Church than for the Dissenters, and he did not state it upon his own authority, but upon the authority of men well qualified to express a sound judgment on the matter. Mr. Gladstone said—

Lord Lyveden

“Now, I say, in the first place, that the state of the law of church rates is a very great grievance to the Church itself. In a multitude of parishes the church rate is contested. If it is obtained amidst animosities and heartburnings, where it is so contested it inflicts far greater evil, misfortune, and impediment on the Church than it confers benefit on it; and if the rate is lost what again happens? Why, that the church is left entirely without support from the rate, and so far is put on the same footing as the fabrics belonging to other denominations of Christians; but only so far, because it is left to those denominations who are connected with other fabrics to associate themselves as a body of private individuals for the maintenance of their own fabrics, and to take into their own hands exclusively the management of the funds they may please to vote for such a purpose; but that it is not competent for the members of the Established Church to do. Take the case of a parish where the bulk of the ratepayers were indisposed to support these rates, but where a portion of them were disposed to do so. It is not competent for that part of the parishioners who are so disposed to constitute themselves into a body for the purpose of applying their means to that object, and it is beyond all doubt that if, notwithstanding these difficulties, gentlemen belonging to the Church of England choose to subscribe for the maintenance of their church, the application and disposal of the money they thus raise is not placed under their own control, but they are open to be run in upon, and to have the control of the application of their money taken out of their hands and put into the hands of the very men who perhaps the week previous had voted against the levying of a church rate. That, I say, is a great grievance to the Church.”—[3 Hansard, cxxxiv. 449.]

This was, in point of fact, a great grievance to the Church, and it was a grievance which, as long as this impost remained, it would be impossible to remedy. If, on the other hand, the rate were got rid of, a measure might be at once introduced and carried, enabling the Church to tax its own members, and no Dissenters could offer plausible objection to such a Bill, or if they did they would be laughed out of Parliament. On the contrary, he believed that if they could but get rid of this bone of contention, the Dissenters would themselves come forward and assist the Church in doing that which nothing but the existing state of the law prevented them from now doing. He deprecated agitation with respect to Church matters as much as any one could, but it was in vain to suppose that if this Bill was rejected the agitation would cease, for, on the contrary, it would be stronger than ever. But on what ground were the conscientious objections of the Dissenters now disregarded? Could anything be said against the Dissenting body on the ground of immorality and irreligion? The names of Bunyan, Baxter, Lardner, and Robert Hall would rise to every one's lips in conjunction with the names of other men whom the Church would be too glad to receive into her bosom. He would not enter into any statistics to show the relative number of Dissenters and Churchmen in this country, or the exact number of petitions presented on one side or the other. He would even assume the truth of the calculation made by that very sanguine friend of the Establishment, Dr. Hume, of Liverpool, that the members of the Church comprise 67 per cent of the population. But, he would ask, was not every one of their Lordships aware that in every large town there were numbers of Protestant Dissenters who were most anxious, on conscientious grounds, to be relieved from this impost? Why was it that Parliament did not impose an education rate? Because they thought that a compulsory impost would diminish the voluntary subscriptions. The same principle applied in the present instance; and he would ask where religion had ever been advanced by compulsory levies? Nay, was not Christianity itself more benefitted by the fiery persecution of ancient times than any religion had been by despoiling others? Probably a Dissenter would have no great objection to contribute towards the repair of a structure which he venerated and an edifice he admired; and if the compulsory rate were abolished he believed the Dissenters would be most willing to subscribe towards such an object. Sir Morton Peto, for example, had subscribed £500 towards the erection of a parish church at Plaistow, and this would be the case with many other Dissenters if the support of the Church edifices were left to depend on voluntary efforts. It was for the interests of the Church itself, then, that the removal of this impost was most to be desired, and it was Dissent which gained most by its continuance. At all events if the Bill were not passed, care should be taken to lay down what were the legal charges to be defrayed out of a church rate. The Rev. Mr. Champneys said these charges comprised the repairs of the edifice, the washing of the surplice, and the cost of the communion wine. Now, it was only natural that Dissenters should object to the last two items. Mr. Champneys had stated that when he first succeeded to his present charge he found that the washing of the surplice cost twelve guineas annually, and the communion wine eighteen guineas, there being only sixteen communicants. In that case wine appeared to have been given to the churchwardens, clergyman, and other persons; and was it surprising that, with such abuses, the Dissenters complained of paying church rates—and especially that they should complain of being obliged to pay for washing the surplice, when they considered the very wearing such a garment an empty ceremony? These were the grounds upon which he asked their Lordships to pass this measure. He should prefer a substitute if one could be found, but a substitute had been looked for in vain, and the supporters of the change, therefore, had been compelled to resort to entire abolition. It appeared to be hoped that the agitation on this question would subside. That reminded him of the man in the play whose house was on fire, and who was proceeding to assist in extinguishing the fire, when he exclaimed—"A sudden thought strikes me. Perhaps it will go out of itself." Now, this agitation would not go out of itself, and he entreated their Lordships not to relax in their endeavours to make it subside by reasonable legislation. True it was that from various causes the majority had diminished in the other House, but none of the remarkable men who had given in their adhesion to the Bill failed to support it still. It should be steadily borne in mind that the chief supporters of the measure in the other House were not Dissenters, whose wish it might be to destroy the Establishment; Churchmen were its leading advocates. The majority comprised seven Cabinet Ministers, one ex-Premier, and the present Prime Minister, of whom he should not hear from the right rev. Bench that he was an unworthy son of the Church, or that his recent appointments to the episcopal Bench had been prejudicial to the Establishment. Among other Members in that majority he recognized the rising hopes of the country. Who stood higher in public esteem than Lord Stanley? His Lordship was for the abolition of church rates, and so were Lord Ashley, Lord Grosvenor, and the Marquess of Hartington. Were those enemies of the Establishment, or were they not as sincere friends to the Church as any of their Lordships could be? He trusted that if he had not been able to carry conviction to their Lordships' minds, he had said nothing calculated to offend their religious feelings or even their political prejudices. Before he sat down, perhaps he might be allowed to address one word in the way of remonstrance to the right rev. Bench. If he were addressing an assembly of attorneys who strained to the utmost every possible technicality of the law, he would deserve to be laughed at if he engaged in any Quixotic endeavour to induce them to give up any right, however uncertain, for the sake of peace and good will. But he was now speaking to men who knew there was no exercise of the Christian virtues equal to that of self-sacrifice, and who had themselves for the benefit of the Church and the advancement of religion consented to be shorn of some portion of their episcopal revenues, and divested themselves of their feudal pomp and power. He entreated them, then, to open their arms to embrace, not to raise their hands to strike, their Dissenting brethren; but, in the words of Mr. Secretary Stanley in 1834, to consider whether the interests of the Church were advanced by the desecration of the House of God by squabbles about church rates at each succeeding Easter; or, in the words of Sir Robert Peel, whether social harmony should be allowed to be interrupted by these discussions. He beseeched them not to allow this reproach, however unjust, to remain upon these noble edifices raised by a pure religion to the worship of the true God. In the sincere and solemn conviction that if the present measure passed it would tend to make the Church more popular and to promote the interests of religion itself, he moved the second reading of the Bill.

Lord Lyveden

Moved, that the Bill be now read 2^a.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, that in rising to move an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day three months, he must congratulate the House on the temperate spirit of the noble Lord's speech; but at the same time he did not perceive that the noble Lord's arguments were founded on any more substantial grounds than these—that the measure ought to meet with their Lordships' approval because all measures of compromise had turned out failures; that church rates constituted a bone of contention, and ought to be removed; and that the noble Lord was himself an advocate for voluntarism in the most extensive form. With regard to the first ground, he asked why had all measures of compromise been such entire failures? It was, in the first place, because the rejection of those measures had proceeded from a body of persons who were arrayed against this right belonging to the Established Church, and who had declared that no compromise should be accepted but that nothing would satisfy them save the total and unconditional abolition of church rates. In reference to the noble Lord's statement, that this rate was a bone of contention, and excited dissatisfaction among the Dissenting portion of the community, and that their Lordships must be reminded what would be the feelings of the Dissenters when they heard that this Bill had been rejected, he desired their Lordships to consider, on the other hand, what would be the feeling of thousands and thousands of members of the Established Church if they saw a right which generations had sanctioned violently taken away for no better reason than because the noble Lord said that all measures of compromise had failed, and because certain persons conceived that church rates were a stumbling-block in the way of the proper development of the voluntary principle? He wished to disabuse their Lordships' minds of some of the fallacies uttered by the noble Lord. The noble Lord said that the existing state of the law was that there existed a legal obligation without a legal remedy. That was true; but why? At one time there was a legal remedy in the Ecclesiastical Courts, but the expensive and protractive nature of the proceedings there had indisposed persons to apply to those tribunals. He could not, however, admit the soundness of the noble Lord's argument, because, even if it were true that there was no legal remedy, it would be the duty of their Lordships to provide a legal remedy by legislation. The noble Lord had referred to the Wesleyan Methodists, and their testimony was of a very important character, for they numbered more than one-half of the entire Dissenting community of this country. The noble Lord spoke of petitions from persons of the Wesleyan body, and the inference from the noble Lord's remarks was, that the Wesleyans might be considered favourable, as a body, to the abolition of church rates. Now, the Wesleyan Methodists were divided into two sections, and the Old Connection, greatly outnumbering the "New," and containing all the most influential members of the body, had never raised its voice against church rates, or taken part in the agitation which had been got up to procure their abolition. Moreover, the agitation against church rates was not authorized by that important body, the Conference. The noble Lord gave, as a proof of the feeling against church rates, that the amount collected had diminished; but this fact was capable of another explanation. In many cases in which contests had been threatened through the organization which the abolitionists had formed, the rate was given up, rather than bitterness and exasperation should be introduced into parishes. It was no indication whatever of the general feeling of the people against church rates, but rather indicated the desire of churchmen themselves to keep the rate down to the lowest possible amount. The noble Lord had argued that their Lordships ought to assent to the abolition of church rates just as they had ultimately given their assent to Parliamentary Reform, to the repeal of the Corn Laws, and to the removal of Jewish Disabilities. But in the case of Parliamentary Reform there was an acknowledged evil to be remedied, and the measure by which it was proposed that that object should be attained had been carried by increasing majorities in the other branch of the Legislature. The repeal of the Corn Laws was a measure of a similar description; and it might further be said that the Irish famine had rendered it impossible to maintain the system which had been abolished. With regard to the removal of the Jewish Disabilities, he had to state that, although he had not himself concurred in the decision of their Lordships upon that point, he was ready to admit that as it was a matter which peculiarly affected the other House it could not be supposed that their Lordships would perpetually oppose the wishes of that House upon the subject. But the present question stood upon a different ground. It was one which affected the highest interests and the deepest feelings of the people of this country; it was one which affected the stability of the Established Church. Their Lordships had at a former period made a stand upon a question affecting the interests of religion — namely, the appropriation of Irish ecclesiastical property, and the success which had attended their efforts upon that occasion would, he hoped, afford an omen of the results which would follow their opposition to the present measure. He wanted to know who were in favour of the present measure of abolition. It was doubtful whether the noble Lord himself was really anxious that the Bill should pass, because, although the measure was brought up from the other House on the 30th of April, it was not until near the end of May that he announced his intention to move the second reading. Was the Church in favour of the Bill? The noble Lord had quoted the names of churchmen in the House of Commons who had voted for the measure. But did those Members represent the Church of England? The noble Lord himself had told them how singularly the opinions of Members of the House of Commons had varied upon that question, according to the amount of public pressure to which they had been exposed. But were the right rev. Prelates favourable to that proposal? And were not they to be regarded as more fitting representatives of the Church than those Members of the other House who had voted of late years in the majorities by which the Bill had been carried? Was the country itself really in favour of that abolition scheme? When the Bill was read a second time in the House of Commons, on the 8th of February, there had been only twelve petitions, with 407 signatures, presented in its favour; and the second reading had at that time been carried by a much smaller majority than that of the preceding year; that majority having fallen from upwards of seventy to only twenty-nine. The promoters of the measure felt that such a circumstance called for a renewal of agitation upon their parts; an organized system was put in force by the Liberation of Religion Society, for the purpose of obtaining a popular demonstration against church rates; and the result was, that by the 28th of March there had been presented to the other House in favour of the present Bill 4,972 petitions, containing 546,000 signatures. But the rapid success which had attended the efforts of that society were not, he contended, an evidence of the true state of public opinion. Petitions could only evince with any certainty the feeling of the country when they were presented, not in any sudden mass, but equably and steadily from different parts of the country. Was Viscount Palmerston himself in favour of the Bill? In the debate on the Bill of 1855 the noble Viscount said—

The Duke of Marlborough

“When we are talking of a measure which deeply affects great interests, and, I may almost say, universal feelings of the country, we must cast our eyes a little further than the door of this House; and we must consider whether a measure which is brought under our discussion is one which is likely to pass into law if we approve it. I certainly cannot bring myself to think that this measure, as it is now proposed by my hon. Friend, is likely to receive the sanction of both branches of the Legislature; nor do I think that it does contain such arrangements for providing for the support of the fabrics of churches as would be sufficient to secure their maintenance. . . . If I was prepared to support the measure of my hon. Friend, with some trifling alterations, I should consent to go into Committee to propose those alterations; but as I do not see in this Bill any substantial foundation upon which a measure could be framed that would be satisfactory, I think I should be acting in a manner of which the House and the country would have a right to complain if I were to support it for the sake of any momentary popularity out of doors, or of a few cheers from this side of the House. A person in my position ought not to support a measure unless he thinks that measure is likely to be successful in its future stages, especially when it deals with a question of such importance as this is to the interests, the feelings, and the deepest religious sentiments of the community. With great regret, therefore, and acting under a sense of duty, I must, as far as my personal Vote is concerned, oppose the second reading of this Bill."—[3 Hansard, cxxxviii. 687, 690.]

Such was the opinion of Lord Palmerston in 1855, and, therefore, it might well be asked whether the Government were united upon the question. The noble Lord had gone into a variety of details concerning the different compromises which had been proposed for the settlement of this question. But the question now before their Lordships was one of abolition, pure and simple. Had a case been made out for the immediate and absolute abolition of church rates? He maintained that it had not. The passing of such a measure would be a violation of Magna Charta itself—the foundation of all our liberties—which provided in express terms that the Church should be free, and have her "old rights and liberties inviolable." If church rates did not constitute one of the rights of the Church, he should like the noble Lord to inform him what did. Another reason why the present Bill should not pass was that the decision of their Lordships' House had considerably modified the question, and produced a favourable effect upon the public. Dr. Lushington stated to the Committee that since the House of Lords decided that the majority in a vestry had a right to determine whether a rate should be levied or not, the number of disputes in regard to church rates which had come under his notice had very much diminished, and that within the last seven years he recollected scarcely any. That evidence destroyed the argument of the noble Lord that the contention and ill-feeling which prevailed on this subject urgently demanded a remedy, no matter how injurious that remedy might prove to the interests of the Church. The peace of the people was not at stake, for the number of disputes in regard to church rates had diminished. Besides, if it was to be held that everything which created dispute and heart-burning should be done away with, they must proceed to abolish municipal and other elections, which certainly disturbed the public peace far more than church rates. Another most extraordinary reason which was advanced in favour of this measure was that no compromise could be found. Because they could not amend the law, they were called upon to destroy it. In the same way it might be argued that a physician, perplexed with a difficult case, for which he could discover no cure, had no resource but to put a summary end at once to the life and sufferings of the patient. The noble Lord adjured the right rev. Bench to stay the uplifted hand, and not to inflict further injury on the Dissenters. It was acknowledged, however, by the Dissenters themselves, in various little tracts and manuals which they had published, that the law as it stood was so reasonable, so equitable, so justly administered, that it was scarcely possible to lay and levy a rate where the parishioners thought proper to resist it. The noble Lord argued that the abolition of the rates would enlarge the Christian sympathies and open the purses of Churchmen in a remarkable degree, and that contributions for the purposes of the Church would flow in from every quarter. The fact was that the Church of England already depended for support on a voluntary basis to a greater extent than any other denomination in the country. From the Report of the Incorporated Society for Promoting the Enlargement, Building, and Repairing of Churches and Chapels, he learned that in 1858 grants to the amount of £13,000 were made by the Society to meet local contributions to the amount of £175,000; in 1859, the Society's grants amounted to £17,000, the local contributions being £195,000; and in 1860, the grants were £22,000 to £240,000 of local contributions. That was an example of the support which the Church derived from voluntary contributions. [Hear, hear!] He understood what those cheers meant. Noble Lords opposite believed that if so much was done for the Church already by voluntary effort, a little more might easily be accomplished. He feared that that "little more" would prove the last straw which would break the camel's back; and that, not from the want of liberality or means on the part of members of the Church, but from the irregularity of the source, voluntary contributions would fail to replace the rates. It was the peculiar advantage of the church rates that they supplied steadily an ever-recurring want which it was impossible to meet with the desirable regularity by any other means. He asked their Lordships to look also to what the Church was doing in the way of education. In 1854 the grants made by the Privy Council to meet the contributions of the Church for educational purposes amounted to £209,000, while the grants to all the other denominations amounted to only £116,000. In 1855 the Government grants to the Church were £240,000, against £129,000, to all other denominations; and in 1856, £268,000, against £155,000. Churchmen, therefore, were not niggard of their means; they did not repose upon their endowments; the ministers of the Church were actively exerting themselves to procure contributions for religious and educational purposes; and when it was said that voluntaryism was practicable for Dissenters, but was not practicable for Churchmen, he had to answer that the Church was to as great, or even a greater degree, a voluntary institution as any dissenting sect in this country. Let it be observed, too, that there were some important differences between dissenting chapels and churches devoted to the performance of the service of the Established religion. The chapels of the Dissenters were small, inexpensive buildings, those connected with the Church were large and costly. When once a church was erected in connection with the Establishment, it was solemnly dedicated to the service of religion, and must immutably remain so. On the other hand, a dissenting chapel could be removed from place to place. If the congregation fell off, the chapel could be at once shut up and disposed of. Then, again, the Church of England was essentially the Church of the poor man. The plan of providing for the sustentation of the Church by means of pew-rents was incompatible with the proper accommodation of the poor, for many localities were occupied wholly by classes too poor to pay for seats. In the midst of any poor population there were generally to be found some large factories, the proprietors of which, residing at a distance in some more agreeable or salubrious spot, and contributing liberally to the church and schools near his residence, might not be disposed to support those in the neighbourhood of their works, unless legally bound to do so. In such places church rates were the only source available for ensuring the decent performance of divine service. Such cases were pointed out in the evidence before the Committee. He had further to observe that the maintenance of the large edifices of the Established Church were often attended with extraordinary outlay. Dr. Miller, of Birmingham, stated that the restoration of the spire of his church had cost not less than £7,000. He had been enabled to raise that large sum because he was a very popular minister; but their Lordships could not, as a general rule, trust to the popularity of ministers as a resource for maintaining the great ecclesiastical edifices of this country. Again, it appeared that Mr. Yorke, of Birmingham, had restored his church at an expense of £7,000; but he stated that the demands he had to make in consequence upon his parishioners had become such a nuisance that his influence over them had considerably declined. He could go further than many of these parties in reference to the effect of the abolition of church rates in parishes. In many cases they had evidence to show that the diminution of poor rates was actually attributable to the voluntary contributions raised for the relief of the sick and poor. The minister's duty was to visit all the sick and poor in the parish. He had a district visiting society, which was supplied with funds voluntarily contributed, but once put another item in a voluntary form on the liberality of the parishioners, and these funds would inevitably suffer, and these rates would again rise. He would advert, before concluding, to the special nature of the evidence adduced before their Lordships' Committee, as regarded the ulterior objects of those persons who had sought to carry a Bill for the abolition of church rates? Some years ago he stated to their Lordships what he believed were the ulterior objects in the minds of some persons with regard to church rates, and on that occasion the noble Duke opposite stated that he did not believe there were any persons who entertained those views, and that church rates were sought to be got rid of simply and solely on the ground of finance and of their oppressiveness to our dissenting brethren. Lord John Russell, in 1854, saw a little further into this question, and his words were—

The Duke of Marlborough

"We have a national Church, we have a hereditary aristocracy, and a hereditary monarchy, and all these things will stand together. My opinion is that they will decay and fall together, and I see no reason why we should prefer the institutions of the United States. I shall, therefore, oppose this Bill as tending to subvert one of the institutions of the State."

Before the Committee appointed to inquire into this question two gentlemen were examined, who had taken part in the promotion of this Bill, as regarded their Parliamentary action. Dr. Foster, Chairman of the Parliamentary Committee of the Society for the Liberation of Religion from State Patronage and Control, was asked:—

"Will you state generally what are the objections you have to church rates, irrespective of that more vital and ultimate end that you have alluded to?"

He replied :—

"Perhaps I should preface that by saying that I do not think we have particularly encouraged any movement against church rates, any further than by assisting those who have come to us for advice with the advice that they wanted, and also by undertaking the conduct of the Parliamentary movement. With regard to our objections I should say that I think the objections of the society are derived solely from their being one means of connection between Church and State, to use a common expression."

He entertained no doubt that the Parliamentary action of this Committee had been extended to their Lordships' House, and that they had been in communication with the noble Lord who had moved the second reading of this Bill. These persons, in their authorized publication, spoke of the present measure under the significant designation of "our Bill. Were their Lordships aware of the extent of the action of this "Parliamentary Committee" upon the constituencies? Mr. Morley, a member of this Society, was asked by the Chairman the following question :—

"You stated, I believe, that you thought that even the existence of a Government depended upon this question being settled in the form in which you wish it to be settled; do you think that the existence of a Government would be imperilled by any proposition being made in the House of Commons that churchmen should have the power of rating themselves."

Mr. Morley's answer was,

"No, probably not; I merely meant to refer to the fact that there is in every constituency a representative body of the views which I have put before the Committee. The particular society to which reference has been made has correspondents in every constituency, and there is a degree of co-operation with them, not on behalf only. I beg the Committee to believe, of mere noisy talkers, but of earnest thoughtful persons, in every constituency, and in every moderately large town, and there is a course of action which candidates understand perfectly well, and which is found to be operative on this particular question."

The organization of this body was shown in the fact that in eight weeks they had caused 4,000 petitions with 500,000 signatures to be got up and presented to the other House of Parliament. It was clear from the objects avowed by the Society that even if this question should be settled to-morrow the Society would continue their exertions as long as a broad acre was left to the Church or a commuted tithe continued to be paid. Dr. Foster gave the following evidence relative to the objects of the Liberation Society :—

"Chairman: I believe you are chairman of a Society for the Liberation of Religion?—No; I am chairman of the Parliamentary Committee of that Society; its full name is the Society for the Liberation of Religion from State Patronage and Control.

"May I ask you what the objects are which the society have in view?—They are stated in a prospectus, which is printed. To state them shortly, they are these :—We wish to, what is commonly called, separate the Church from the State; we wish to take away all funds and property with which the State has endowed any religious denomination whatever; we wish also to free all denominations of persons who may happen to be under special legislation, on religious grounds, from such special legislation.

"When you speak of those whom the State has endowed will you be so good as to explain your meaning a little more fully?—I mean those who are in possession of public property.

"If I understand you rightly, your society considers that there are various laws affecting the Church which maintain its connection with the State, and whatever those laws relate to they wish to see them done away?—Yes, I think that represents our view; but your Lordships will understand me to speak entirely upon my own personal responsibility; I have not consulted with any one as to coming here.

"Has it not been in furtherance of that object that your society have taken the active part they have in the church rate question?—Yes."

He could say for himself he was most anxious that this question should be fairly, equitably, and justly settled; but the course recommended by the noble Lord (Lord Lyveden) neither satisfied the demands of justice nor sound policy. Their Lordships had undoubted evidence before them to show that the object of the organization to which he had referred was not only directed to obtain the abolition of church rates, but also the secularization, as it was called, of the entire amount of Church property which was now applicable for the religious wants and interests of the millions of poor of this country. If no compromise upon this question had hitherto been arrived at it was from no fault of the friends of the Church of England, who had proposed several compromises, but was owing to those who declared they would accept no compromise upon this question. For these reasons he thought their Lordships would not act in a manner consistent with fairness to the Church, or with justice and sound policy, if they agreed to the second reading of this Bill. He would therefore move that the Bill be read a second time on that day three months.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and insert ("this Day Three Months").

LORD WENSLEYDALE said, he wished to occupy a very few minutes to correct what he considered as a mistake of the law by his noble Friend in moving the second reading of the Bill, which it was material should be rightly understood in disposing of this Motion. His noble Friend supposed there was no legal obligation on the vestry to make a rate, and that the majority had the option to make it or not. This was an error, very prevalent, too, out of doors. A pretty general supposition was that the decision of their Lordships in the Braintree case established this. There could not be a greater mistake. The duty to repair the churches was as old as the time of Canute, whose laws declared that all the people were to do so; and in the statute of Circumspecte Agatis, passed in the 31st year of Edward III. it was declared that the Court Christian had the consonance of that subject as a spiritual matter, and was not to be interfered with. This had been the constant rule since, though there were cases in the Year Books which might lead to the supposition that the non-repair of churches might be enforced at common law; but this obligation on the parish, though enforceable by the spiritual courts only, was analogous to the obligation of parishes to repair roads, or counties to repair bridges. How was this obligation to be carried into effect? The law supplied a reasonable remedy; before the statutes were passed for that purpose, in the case of highways and bridges the inhabitants of the parish were to meet and to make a by-law for that purpose. They were like a corporation for that purpose, and the majority assembled might make a by-law, and if it was a reasonable by-law and equal to every one it bound the whole. Thus, a by-law that one was to contribute materials, another labour, another carriages, another horses, if all were equally dealt with, was binding, and could be enforced against all. The same with counties and bridges. The inhabitants had not the option to make that by-law or not as they thought fit, and if they did not choose to do so the parish or county was indictable at common law. But with respect to the repair of churches, if the vestry refused to make such a by-law, originally in any reasonable mode, but for many years back by imposing church rates, the only remedy was by proceeding in the Ecclesiastical Court, by interdict, if the whole parish neglected that duty—a remedy which, according to his noble and learned Friend on the woolsack, in a very able pamphlet which he had published some years ago on the subject of church rates, had become ineffectual by the change of religion. The whole parish could not be excommunicated, but individuals who contumaciously refused to discharge that duty of repairing might be excommunicated. This was clearly laid down in many old authorities; and as late as in 1843 and in preceding years there would be found cases in the Ecclesiastical Courts on the subject, and particularly in the very able and elaborate judgment of Sir Herbert Jenner Fust, who held that the articles against a person for contumacy in impeding the making a church rate were admissible to proof. He was, as a Judge, concerned in all the decisions in the Braintree case. The Court of Queen's Bench held in one that a minority of the vestry, who were willing to do their duty, could make the rate, and the majority threw away their votes; but that decision, though supported by the Exchequer Chamber, was overruled by that House, and very properly so. His noble and learned Friend (Lord Cranworth), then a Baron of the Exchequer, delivered a most able and satisfactory judgment, in which he pointed out in the strongest manner why the Court of Queen's Bench was wrong in holding that the vote of less than the majority would not be unavailing; that those who refused were undoubtedly liable to be punished. It was clear, therefore, that the Ecclesiastical Court could now enforce by censure of individuals as contumacious; but the remedy was difficult and expensive, and could not be practically effective.

Lord Wensleydale

THE EARL DE GREY AND RIPON expressed his surprise that the noble Duke who had moved the Amendment, instead of discussing the compromises proposed by the Report of the Committee appointed to inquire into this subject should have rested his argument on the principle that church rates ought to be maintained as they now were, and that he should have given expression to the opinion that the law should be made such as would render it more easy to enforce their payment. The noble Duke went back as far as Magna Charta, and told them that if church rates were abolished it would be a violation of the Great Charter, which guaranteed to the Church all its rights and privileges. He was afraid that, in this sense of the term violation, the Great Charter had been very frequently violated since its promulgation, and he must say that in spite of his great veneration for Magna Charta, he would not shrink from adding this one more violation to the long list that preceded it. The noble Duke referred to the statement made by the noble Lord who opened the debate, that though payment of church rates might be a legal duty, yet there was no remedy in case of refusal to pay. It was true, said the noble Duke, that there was no penalty now, but there was a time when the jurisdiction of ecclesiastical courts was powerful, and when the legal obligation to pay could be enforced; and the noble Duke seemed to desire the return of those halcyon days, and a revival of all the ancient powers of the ecclesiastical courts. But their Lordships were not called upon to go back to the days of the Great Charter, or to the time when the ecclesiastical jurisdiction was all powerful. They had to look at this question as it was presented to them at the present moment, and at all that had taken place regarding it during the last thirty years. He must say that the noble Duke's description of the law as it now stood was not quite satisfactory, and he preferred taking it as it was described in the Report of the Committee now before him. That Report stated that, by the judgment of the House of Lords in the Braintree case, the law was declared to be that a church rate could only be assessed by a majority of the vestry; and it appeared from the evidence that for neglecting to pay there was no penalty at common law. It was this state of things, therefore, their Lordships had to deal with. The noble Duke seemed to think that there was in reality no reason why any person should be relieved from the payment of church rates. He did not mean to say the noble Duke would not be willing, as a matter of grace and favour, and because he could not help it, to relieve those who were not Members of the Church of England from the payment of church rates; but the whole course of his argument went to show that there was in reality no grievance. He seemed to think that the whole of the objections to church rates rested on the agitation of the peculiar views held by the Society for relieving the Church from State Control. But the fact was, that this was a question under discussion thirty years ago, and that during that time the grievance had been admitted by every statesman of eminence almost without exception. For thirty years there had been a succession of attempts made to settle the question, and as far back as 1834, a Bill was brought in which proposed that church rates should terminate, and that the maintenance of the fabric of the Church should be provided for in some other way. The noble Duke spoke as if the Dissenters were the only persons who opposed a compromise; but there was a time when the defenders of church rates refused compromises, which might have been accepted with advantage to the Church. A succession of compromises had been offered, but all had been rejected by the advocates of church rates; and by their own conduct they had now rendered compromise impossible. From the period of the Government of Earl Grey to that of Lord Melbourne and of Sir Robert Peel propositions had been made and rejected. At a later period a proposal had been offered with a like result. An hon. Friend of his in the other House, and a friend of the Church, proposed a plan in 1853 by which Dissenters should be registered in order to exempt them from payment of church rates. That was refused; and since then there had been various suggestions from both sides, including a Bill introduced by the noble Duke, which stated in its preamble "Whereas it is expedient to abolish church rates, &c." Although, no doubt, the noble Duke intended really to continue them for the support of the fabric. Last year the Government of the noble Earl opposite undertook to deal with the Question, and introduced a Bill which would have enabled landowners and trustees to make some permanent charge on land that they possessed or held in trust for the benefit of the Church, and church rates were to be abolished in those parishes in which such charge was made; but failing that, the Bill provided that any person who would say that he conscientiously objected to the levying of any particular church rate after it had been made, should be relieved from the payment of that particular rate. That seemed to him the clearest possible admission that there was then a grievance affecting the Dissenters which required to be got rid of; for it would not be supposed that a Conservative Government, and especially that Mr. Walpole would propose to give up anything belonging to the Church unless he were induced to do so by just and reasonable views. That Bill was rejected by a large majority; and that was the condition in which the question was left when their Lordships appointed a Committee last year. That Committee itself admitted that there was a grievance, for the Committee recommended a measure which would exempt from paying church rates persons who should simply say that they objected to pay. On looking at that Report he was led to refer to a remark of the noble Duke in reference to his noble Friend behind him, that his noble Friend (Lord Lyveden) could not be very eager in reference to this Bill, as it was introduced on April 30, and the 19th of June had now arrived. But the Report of the Committee was dated February 28, 1860, and if the noble Duke and his friends had been anxious to meet the question he ought to have done so by laying a Bill before the House, or agreeing to the second reading of this measure and then proposing Amendments in Committee. But, in truth, the noble Lords opposite did not like their own child, and wanted no compromise at all. They thought there was a temporary change of opinion in the other House, and they sought to make the most of that circumstance. That, however, was not a wise policy to adopt in reference to a great question that had been a long time in agitation. It was impossible to believe that the present state of things could continue long. There was a grievance admitted to exist which as long as it existed would cause irritation and ill feeling. The only question that could be seriously argued now was how to remedy that grievance without inflicting a greater injury on the Church of England, and to settle the question for ever—for unless some permanent settlement was effected all efforts would be useless, and the agitation and irritation which all deplored would go on increasing. Was there any compromise which was now practicable? Two suggested compromises had been alluded to. One of these was to sustain the fabric of the church out of the funds other than rates at the disposal of the Church; another proposal was that made by Sir George Grey, to substitute pew-rents for church rates. He (Earl de Grey) did not say he was enamoured of pew-rents. He agreed that it was a distinguishing characteristic of the Church of England to be considered as the "poor man's Church," and he would object as much as any one to any measure that would have a tendency to exclude the poor from their parish churches. Further, he would say that his own individual wishes were to abolish pews altogether, and that all should be seated alike; but they all knew it would be impossible to do so, as any attempt of that kind would drive people away from the churches. But if the true theory was that all seats should be open to all alike, then the appropriation of particular seats was a privilege, and if it was a privilege, then those who enjoyed it might fairly be called upon to pay for it, and thus contribute to the fund for the maintenance of the church in which the pew was occupied. The proposition of Sir George Grey received little support, owing to the extraordinary conduct of the supporters of church rates, who, after leaving Mr. Newdegate in a ridiculous minority, joined with Sir John Trelawny and his friends to defeat Sir G. Grey's proposition. Then there was the proposal to register Dissenters, or, what was very much the same thing, a statement that they objected to pay church rates; but he, as a friend of the Church, objected to any system which marked men as Dissenters and tended to prevent them from that occasional conformity which was of advantage to the Church in various ways. Such a plan would reduce the Church to the level of a sect, and would go far to destroy its national character. For these reasons he had always objected to any plan which proposed to register Dissenters. Then came the compromise proposed by the Committee of their Lordships' House; and that compromise was in reality the giving up of church rates altogether, for it was proposed to substitute for church rates what was called a "voluntary rate." [The Marquess of SALISBURY : No!] Surely a rate that a man could exempt himself from paying was a voluntary rate; and a voluntary rate seemed to him to be something like a contradiction in terms. If they acted in such a way they would, in fact, abolish the tax, whilst they would encumber themselves with a machinery which would deprive them of much voluntary support. No compromise could be effectual; they must either retain the law as it stood, or come to an abolition of church rates, and trust to voluntary efforts for the means of sustaining the fabric of the church. "But," said the noble Duke, "if you read this Report you will find that if you destroy this outwork of the Church, you will lay open all her defences, and Dr. Foster and Mr. Morley will march in triumphant." Having, however, read the evidence in that Report, he must say that it had made on his mind a totally different impression; and he came to this conclusion, that it was not true that the majority of those who desired the abolition of church rates had ulterior objects in view, although it might be the case with Dr. Foster and the Society for the Liberation of Religion. The major-city of these who opposed church rates did so on grounds applying to the rate itself, and did not desire to look beyond. In several parts of his evidence given in the Report, Mr. Morley said that the majority of Dissenters who wished for the abolition of church rates did not look for it as a step to anything beyond, though he stated that his own opinion was against the continuance of the Church Establishment. He knew Mr. Morley, and he desired to speak of him with every respect; but his opinion must not be taken to be the opinion of the majority of those who desired the abolition of church rates. A glance at the names of those who had voted for the Bill in the other House would satisfy their Lordships that there was no ground for the theory adopted by the noble Duke, that the measure had been supported by hon. Members simply from fear of their constituents. The majority in the other House had not been actuated by any such motives, and were inspired by no animosity towards the Church. Here was a grievance, the existence of which was admitted by all parties, which was felt in every parish, and the continuance of which placed in the hands of Mr. Morley, Dr. Foster, and the Liberation Society their only powerful weapon against the Established Church. If their agitation had spread, and was, as they said, a growing agitation, its growth and its continuance were, in his opinion, due mainly to the maintenance of church rates. Believing therefore, as he did, that the present system entailed a distinct hardship upon Dissenters, and that that hardship had been admitted by almost everybody whose opinion on this question was worth having; believing that the existence of the grievance inflicted great injury on the Established Church by weaning from her the affection of a large portion of the people; believing that the impost tended to destroy peace and harmony throughout the country, and to prevent that community of Christian feeling which ought to exist among various denominations of Christians; seeing no mode of compromise open, though if a feasible compromise were proposed in Committee he should gladly support it, he should feel it his duty to vote for the second reading, not only because he had always been anxious to do justice to his Dissenting fellow-subjects, but because he desired to widen the basis and to strengthen the fabric of the Church of which he was a member.

Earl de Grey and Ripon

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY:
My Lords, the noble Earl who has just sat down alluded to a Bill which I ventured to propose some years ago, and has gently adverted to an objection to which it was liable. But the very proposal of such a Bill should satisfy the noble Baron who appealed to the Members of this Bench, that there is no want of readiness on their part to agree to any measures of conciliation, which they thought consistent with their duty. There are many matters, my Lords, of grave importance connected with the subject before you, into which I shall not enter:—I will confine myself to two arguments which have been principally urged both by the noble Lord who moved the second reading, and by the noble Earl who has last spoken. These points are, first, that it would promote the best interests of the Church itself to deprive it of all external legal aid; and, secondly, that the rate is levied on Dissenters from our Church, and that it is unjust to charge them with the expenses of an Establishment to which they cannot consistently conform. My Lords, in regard to the first of these arguments, which concerns the welfare of the Church, I have no doubt that the noble Lord the mover and supporter of the Bill is sincere in his belief of the superior excellence of the voluntary principle. But it is at least singular that two parties having, unhappily, different ends in view should concur in the same argument. The noble Lord, a member of the Church, and whose object it is to benefit the Church, believes that he should best attain that object by depriving the Church of all public or legal support. The members of the Liberation Society, whose avowed object it is to overthrow the Established Church, maintain the same opinion. They affirm that the Church would be raised in its spiritual character if it were released from all connection with the State. It is a singular coincidence. But I greatly fear that in this instance the adversaries of the Church judge most correctly, and have the best means of judging. They know by experience how it weakens the best interests of a Church that the clergy should be dependent upon their congregations; and they know also that the effect of abolishing the rate would be eventually to destroy that independence which has hitherto been the characteristic of the ministers of the Church of England. My Lords, in reference to the other point, in 90 out of every 100 of our parishes the rate is a matter of course, enforced by law and custom and considered in the annual rent; and is paid without any more complaint than is made against any other tax. But, annul the law, remove the agreement with the landlord—i. e., take away the obligation, and where shall we find even the £15 or £20 which the fabric and services of the humblest church require? It sounds well in theory to boast of the excellence of the voluntary system. But it may be more correctly described as the begging system, and it is to the begging system which I object as the support of our churches, for I believe the effect, more especially upon our parochial clergy, would be very serious. The clergyman would have no other resource than to place himself under an annual obligation to his parishioners, or to provide from his own means for the repairs of his church and the maintenance of public worship. Is this the condition to which you would reduce our parochial clergy, many thousands of whom reside on benefices yielding less than £200 per annum? My Lords, when you consider how largely, according to their power, and beyond their power, the clergy do now contribute towards the schools and clubs and various charitable plans which are in operation in almost every parish, you surely will not impose upon them the additional tax of supporting the churches in which they officiate, and providing the expenses indispensable to the decent worship of God. Very few words will suffice in alluding to the more common and hackneyed argument for the abolition—namely, the injustice done to Dissenters by charging them with the expenses of a Church to which they do not belong. My Lords, I will not resort to the natural reply, that they hold the property on which the rate is levied on this condition. The argument is incontrovertible. But I confess that I earnestly desire the success of a measure which shall annihilate the plausible objection, and put an end to a question which has been so long debated, and will continue to be debated while the debateable ground remains. I trust that Parliament will enact a law which shall make a rate compulsory upon Churchmen, and upon Churchmen only—a rate so far voluntary that it shall not attach upon Dissenters, and so far compulsory that the members of the Church shall pay an equal share towards the maintenance of the church and the proper performances of the services, according to the rateable value of the property which they possess or occupy. This was the conclusion to which the Select Committee alluded to by the noble Earl was brought after a full and patient inquiry. I trust it will become a legislative measure. I do not say that it is free from objection. I do not deny that it is a concession rather than a compromise. But I think that the concession may be defended, that it may be justified, as conferring a benefit on both parties. It would relieve the Dissenter from the temptation to which he is now exposed, and which must be, I think, very distressing to his conscience—the temptation to stir up strife in parishes which would otherwise be peaceful and harmonious. And it would relieve the clergy from the annoyance of such disturbances, and leave the Church to conduct its own affairs without the interference of those who do not belong to its communion. My Lords, I regret that, according to the forms and privileges of the House of Commons, such a measure cannot originate with your Lordships; but I hope that it may be introduced into the Lower House and meet with the concurrence of both Houses of Parliament. Meanwhile, my Lords, I trust that you will agree with the noble Duke and reject the Bill which is now before you.

The Archbishop of Canterbury

EARL GREY said, that the noble Lords who had addressed the House in favour of the present measure rested their support mainly upon this argument, that as church rates were not generally paid under the present law, the only compromise possible was to throw the maintenance of the fabric of the Church at once upon the voluntary contributions of its supporters; that, in fact, the churches were to be supported in the same manner as the chapels of Dissenters were, by those only who used them. If he were prepared to agree in the main conclusions of his noble Friends, still he would venture to urge their Lordships not to give their assent to the second reading of this Bill; and for this simple reason. If they were to deprive the Church of the advantage of church rates as a mode of supporting the fabric—if they were to leave the parishes of this country without any legal security for the maintenance of the ancient fabrics so dear to the hearts of the inhabitants—at all events they were bound to take care that those who were anxious to make the sacrifices necessary to maintain them should be at liberty to do so without any improper interference on the part of others. But he asked their Lordships to look at this Bill, and to observe the manner in which it was drawn. It abolished for ever church rates, but it made provision whatever in reference to the property in churches. The fabric of the Church would remain, as at present, the property of the inhabitants of the parishes, including the Dissenters. If they were to pass this Bill in its naked form, as it stood, the churches would be reduced to an anomalous and extraordinary state—the parish would be deprived of all means of levying rates for the support of the church; and, if voluntary subscriptions were collected for that purpose, the friends of the Church would have no assurance that those who refused to join in the subscriptions would not come forward to control and overrule their desire as to the manner in which the money was to be expended. It would commit the monstrous injustice of giving to those who did not contribute one farthing towards the Church the same right with those who contributed money, to declare how that money was to be appropriated. He might be told that this fault in the Bill might be remedied by an Amendment in Committee. It was, however, by no means easy to correct this evil by an Amendment in Committee. It required a very careful provision in order to secure to those who were going to take upon themselves the burden of maintaining the fabric of the church the same control of their own money. If there was really a bond fide desire to get rid of church rates, and in getting rid of them to give to those who adhered to the Church the powers of managing the Church for their own benefit, the promoters of the Bill ought themselves to have introduced a provision to that effect. If their Lordships gave this Bill a second reading they would be giving to the advocates of this unjust change the same advantage—they would admit the principle that church rates ought not to be maintained, and at the same time they would obtain no security from the other side that they would consent to a reasonable adjustment of this question. But he would not rest his argument upon such grounds. He was prepared to take a higher ground, and to maintain that the law as it stood was a just and proper law. Formerly he admitted that the law created a grievance upon Dissenters when it was held that the minority of a parish, with the consent of the churchwardens, might impose a tax upon the parish at large. But that was, no doubt, a grievance. But the law was now, as decided by the highest authorities, practically reduced to this principle—that the majority of a parish was at liberty, if they thought fit, to tax themselves for the maintenance of the ancient fabric of the church to which they were devoted. He was aware that there were other defects in the existing law which he should be glad to see remedied. In his opinion, the defects were simply these. In the first place, there was a want of restrictive conditions in respect to the applicability of church rates. The existing law, however, ought not to be made responsible for this defect. He thought, however, it would be right and proper to restrict more clearly the application of church rates to the necessary repairs of the fabric of the Church. To such a restriction he believed that the friends of the Church would readily assent. Again, it should be recollected that a great change had taken place of late years in some parishes, so that those who were now rated to church rates were not the same as those who had formerly been rated. He thought that the rates ought to be confined to those parts of the parishes for the advantage of which the churches really required to be maintained. Lastly, it was a fault of the existing law that those who imposed church rates were liable to be defeated in the carrying out of their desires by a small minority who could avail themselves of technical means to effect their object. That was a serious evil, and one which he thought demanded a remedy. But, granting that those amendments of the law were necessary, he, for one, was not prepared to say that any further change should be made in it. Let him ask, was it not consistent with the whole spirit of our Government, both local and general, that the people should have the right to tax themselves for all purposes affecting themselves? It was said that it was unjust on the minority that they should be compelled to pay a tax imposed by the will of the majority. But how would such an argument apply to the administration of Government generally? For example, he was of opinion that the war in China was unjust and impolitic; that, in fact, it was a great sin committed by this nation, and that it would bring down punishment upon it. But did he, therefore, mean for a moment to argue that he should be excused from contributing his share to the taxation which was deemed necessary to defray the cost of such a war? He never thought of urging so untenable a claim. So with regard to sanitary arrangements, lighting, and other parochial matters. In all such cases the majority were constantly in the habit of imposing burdens upon the minority—burdens, too, which were often new and unexpected. The obligation to pay church rates, on the contrary, was a burden which had existed from time immemorial; and as to the particular grievance of this tax upon Dissenters, the objection was at once disposed of by the undeniable fact that no one individual was charged with this impost who had not acquired his property expressly subject to it. Moreover, he maintained that, to abolish church rates would be to plunder, not so much the Church, as the poor inhabitants of the parish. The poor had inherited from their ancestors the right to have the church maintained for their benefit, and by abolishing church rates their Lordships would, as far as they could, deprive them of that right. It had been said that the existing state of the law was objectionable, because there were great anomalies in its exercise—that church rates were levied in some parishes and not levied in others; but what was thus termed an objection to the law was, in his opinion, its greatest recommendation. There was great variety in the circumstances of parishes. In some it was expedient that rates should be levied, in others it was equally expedient that it should not be levied. He thought it would be inexpedient to levy rates in parishes where there was a pretty equal division of the population among different religious denominations, and where, consequently, the Dissenters formed a large minority. There was also very often an objection to levy rates in towns, where there were various other means—among others pew-rents—by which provision for the maintenance of the churches could be made. In towns, to prevent confusion, pews must be appropriated to particular individuals, and in that case he saw no reason why those who were able to do so should not pay for the advantage they thus possessed. It was otherwise in the country. In many country parishes there were not more than three or four persons who could afford to pay pew-rents, which consequently, in such places, would be highly objectionable. At one time it was proposed by law to make a distinction between town and country parishes. The proposal was abandoned, because it was found impossible to distinguish with accuracy what were urban and what rural parishes. But what the law could not do the self-working machinery of the vestry could do. The vestry knew where a rate was desirable and where it was not, and the practical result of the existing system was that rates were levied in those country parishes where they were urgently required, and were not levied in towns where they were unnecessary. He should regard it, moreover, as an invasion of the liberty of the inhabitants of a parish to say that they should not be allowed, even if they thought fit, to impose a rate. In country parishes it would be impossible to meet an annually recurring expense, however small, by way of subscription. Their Lordships knew how difficult it was to collect a subscription even for a temporary purpose—some individual either refused to subscribe at all or subscribed in a very niggardly manner; his fellow-parishioners naturally disliked to give more than their fair share, and in that way the subscription failed altogether—but it was quite impossible to rely for any length of time upon the collection of subscriptions. The practical result of abolishing church rates would be that the expense in many cases would fall upon the clergyman, who was already far too severely burdened. When they were told that it was a grievance to levy church rates by the free vote of the inhabitants, he would ask their Lordships to recollect a fact which they had upon the authority of the opponents of church rates themselves—namely, that the difficulty of levying the rates was so great that any man who was determined could in a short time get rid of them in his parish. That was to a certain extent true, but if it was true what did it prove when coupled with the other fact, that only in a very small minority of country parishes had any such attempt ever been made at all? The natural inference was that the levying of rates in the vast majority of country parishes was so entirely in accord with the sense of the inhabitants that any man inclined to oppose the rate was, from very shame, compelled to hold his tongue. It had been said that church-rates were the cause of much ill-feeling and party spirit, and that their abolition would put an end to all the disputes that arose out of them. He admitted that the existing system did produce dissensions in parishes and vestries; but precisely in the same manner a lover of despotism might say that a wise Sovereign could govern a country far better than noisy people collected in a Parliament, and that free institutions were invariably attended by party divisions and great animosities. The reply was, the even with that drawback free institutions were incomparably to be preferred to the posite system. So it was true that in the country there were differences of opinion, but there were in town councils and in Parliaments. But, on the other hand, his belief was that there were some not inconsiderable advantages connected with the existing machinery for imposing church rates. The mere fact of having the question of how the church was to be maintained brought into discussion by the parishioners themselves, invested church matters with a lively interest for the people generally, and united the clergyman and his flock in the pursuit of a common object. There were many parishes in which the inhabitants took so deep an interest in the maintenance of this or that fine old church, that they readily paid large rates, even beyond what the law required. He was sorry to think that there had been growth up in the country a change in the feeling of the people towards the Church. In the county in which he lived, this change was very marked. Thirty or forty years ago the churches in his part of the country were in a state that made one ashamed that they should be seen; but now, on the contrary, there seemed to be a feeling of emulation in the various parishes as to which parish church should present the best appearance and afford the greatest accommodation to the people. He believed it would be a great evil to check that tendency and prevent the parishioners from meeting together and raising funds in the manner they now did. A great effort ought to be made by all who really loved the Church to increase its foundations and widen its basis. He saw in every direction the Church extending its means of usefulness, and when he saw that he was persuaded of the inexpediency of depriving it of this source, which could be raised in such a manner as to disarm objections. He could not help concurring to a great extent in what had been said by the noble Lord on the bench below as to the inexpediency of agreeing to the proposal alluded to in the Committee of their Lordships' House of Excluding Dissenters from taking any part in Church affairs. It appeared to him that the proposal of exempting Dissenters from rates was inconsistent with the whole principle of rates. If he were driven to a choice he would prefer that the church rates should be altogether abolished, and the control and management of the fabrics of the Church given over to those who would voluntarily maintain them, rather than that such a course as was recommended in the Report of the Committee should be adopted. But he could not admit that any just or fatal objection had been made to the present system. The law, as it now stood, worked very well in the great majority of parishes, and he, for one, could not consent to surrender what he believed to be a great principle, more especially after the revelations which were made in the evidence before the Committee, which showed how different were the ulterior views of the honest opponents, who acted from conscientious motives, and those unscrupulous persons who had entirely other objects in view. His noble Friend who introduced the Bill said it was a common fallacy to object to a measure because some of its promoters wished for a great deal more. He owned that, as a general rule, that was no reason why what was just and right should not be done; but the case was different when a great principle was involved. It was his belief that if they once conceded the principle that the inhabitants of a parish were at liberty to tax themselves, if they thought fit, for the maintenance of the fabrics of the church they would virtually concede the whole principle upon which an established Church could be upheld.

Earl Grey

THE EARL OF AIRLIE said, he was much gratified to find that a measure of this nature, which in former years had created so much irritation, could be debated in the tone and temper that had been manifested that evening. On the one hand noble Lords who a few years since maintained the law as it stood, and would admit of no change, were now willing that some compromise should be made, and the most rev. Primate had that evening expressed himself ready to support any measure which should remove the grievances under which the Dissenters laboured. On the other hand, when it was said that this measure was urged on Parliament by persons whose real desire was to destroy the Church of England, he could not agree that that was an accurate statement. Church rates were sought to be abolished purely and simply because conscientious objections had been felt towards them by a large body of Protestant Dissenters. Church rates had been spoken of as constituting a part of the patrimony of the Church, in the same way as tithes; but he could never believe that a revenue so precarious as church rates could be placed on the same footing as tithes, which were a bond fide tax on land. To class them together would supply those who wished to overthrow the Church with a dangerous argument, because in the event of church rates being abolished they would insist that tithes ought to follow. He believed that the pecuniary loss which the Church would sustain from the abolition of church rates had been much exaggerated. A very large majority of the landowners of this country were members of the Established Church, and it was, he thought, a libel and an unworthy imputation on the part of noble Lords opposite, that the money these landowners gained by the abolition of church rates they would put into their own pockets. Their Lordships had to consider whether it was worth while for the sake of the revenue raised by means of church rates to excite the discontent and irritation which this impost produced. So far as Churchmen were concerned he did not look upon this as a question of principle, and the matter now under their Lordships' consideration was what course was most desirable to be taken in the interest of the Church itself. The noble Duke (the Duke of Marlborough) said, and no doubt with truth, that a section of those who were opposed to church rates wished to overthrow the Church altogether in its relation to the State; but in all reforms there was a party who wished to go further than the rest, and it might as well be argued that at no time should there ever be any concession of Parliamentary Reform because among those who asked for Reform persons might be found who held very extreme views. An arrangement had been thought possible by which some provision should be made for maintaining the fabrics of the church. If a good measure of compromise were before their Lordships he should prefer it to the present Bill, but he should prefer the total abolition of church rates to the continuance of the present state of things. Believing that any advantage derived by the Church from compulsory rates was more than counterbalanced by the ill-feeling and heartburnings which they occasioned he should vote for the second reading of the Bill.

THE DUKE OF RUTLAND said, there were one or two points in the speech of the noble Lord who had moved the second reading of the Bill (Lord Lyveden), on which he wished to offer some observations. First, the noble Lord said, that the poor could not find accommodation in the churches in cities and towns, and that there were very few free sittings.

LORD LYVEDEN: I said that there were free sittings, but that the poor did not occupy them.

The Earl of Airlie

THE DUKE OF RUTLAND thought that if the noble Lord entered the parts of the churches in which there were free sittings, he would find a great many of them occupied by the poor, especially in the country towns. The noble Lord referred to Manchester, and stated that there was in the churches in that town a system of pew-rents established which actually prevented the poor from obtaining sittings in the churches. It seemed to him that that was an argument in favour of church rates, as opposed to pew-rents; and that if they had church rates in Manchester the result would be that provision would be made for free sittings for the poor. It might be perfectly true that there were many honest and conscientious Dissenters, who objected to the payment of church rates, and who had no ulterior views, and were actuated only by conscientious scruples; but it could not be denied that there also existed a class of Dissenters, whose object in endeavouring to obtain the abolition of church rates, was to reduce the Established Church to the simple position of a religious sect. They desired to see the Church separated from the State, and were agitating church rate abolition, solely with a view to that end. He should certainly vote against the Bill, because he believed that it would not produce peace in this country; but that it would, on the contrary, encourage Dissenters in their hostility to the Church; because he felt that if he, as a landowner, was to support it, he should be supporting a proposal to free his property from a charge with which he had inherited it, and which he was in honesty bound to defray; and, above all, because he was persuaded that the measure would deprive the poor man of a right that had been handed down to him from time immemorial.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, it was admitted on all hands that the present state of the law affecting church rates was unsatisfactory and required amendment; and, accordingly, many suggestions had been made for modifying and amending the law, though as yet none had been put forward that had proved generally acceptable. The noble Duke (the Duke of Marlborough) gave as a reason for not abolishing church rates, that the parish churches were expensive, and that clergymen did not like to go round among Churchmen for subscriptions to maintain them. He did not think that a good reason for insisting on the retention of the rates; but, after all, what was it that the Church was asked to give up? From a Return made last year, it appeared that the average rate raised during seven years in 10,000 parishes was £248,000. Divide that sum by the parishes, and it would be found that the amount was only £24 in each parish. Surely such a sum as that was not worth disputing for, and not worth the labour of collection. They were told that the relaxation of church rates would just put so much money into the pockets of the landlords. What an enormous sum this £24 a year would be to the landlords of any parish! But the fact was that if church rates were abolished, the persons on whom the new charges that the change would occasion would principally fall must necessarily be the landlords themselves. They might surely put aside altogether the idea that the fabric of the Church would be in danger if this sum of £24 were lost. He did not say there might not be in some cases some inconvenience; but it must be, after all, very immaterial. The noble Earl (Earl Grey) said he would keep up the rate for the maintenance of the fabric, but not for the small, continually recurring expenses: but it was with regard to those small expenses that the greatest difficulty existed. He thought the existence of the rates caused ill-will among the different classes of society—an evil which the money obtained would never compensate for. It was said the opposition to church rates proceeded from an organized society established for the separation of Church and State. Even if it were so, he did not think it a good argument. There were many organized societies in this country, but they generally failed if they did not take up some question that was popular. It appeared that within a period of eight weeks not fewer than 400,000 people subscribed petitions for the abolition of church rates, and surely that showed great strength on the part of the opponents of the rate. His belief was that the repeal of church rates would strengthen the Church. The question was now put as a test to candidates for seats in Parliament in all the great towns, and the result was that the members for great constituencies were given to take up a position injurious to the Established Church. He believed, therefore, that the repeal would be an advantage to the Church. It was manifestly absurd to proceed year after year with a law that could not be enforced. Their Lordships might reject this Bill, but, practically, the question was settled in towns, and was gradually settling itself in country townships. Still he thought it was unwise to give constituencies the continued opportunity of making this question a test of candidates for Parliament, and, therefore, he hoped the House would agree to the second reading. ["Divide!"]

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE:—My Lords, I would not have risen to protract this debate but that I wish to say a few words in explanation of the vote I am about to give. I came down to the House with my mind prepared to repeat the vote which I gave two years ago against a measure of a similar description; but my confidence in my ability to do so had been shaken by what has since taken place, both in this and the other House of Parliament. I have found an altered tone in the House of Commons. Many of those who in former years were anxious to devise a course which should be agreeable to Dissenters and at the same time in accordance with the feelings of the Members of the Church, now exhibit a different spirit, and all compromise is repudiated; and they have voted against the Bill avowedly with the intention of making it impossible to pass this House. Then, when I looked to this House, I found that a Committee had been appointed on the Motion of the noble Duke (the Duke of Marlborough), the result of which was a proposal that is described by the noble Earl below the gangway (Earl Grey) as worse than entire abolition, and which surrenders completely the principle of the supporters of the church-rate system. Nevertheless I frankly confess that I come to the conclusion of voting for the second reading of this Bill with great pain and hesitation, and I came down to the House, as my noble Friends near me are aware, hoping that the debate would take such a turn as would enable me to vote against the second reading. But I find that the noble Duke, the author of the Resolution on the Report of the Committee, not only moves the rejection of the Bill, but does so in a speech in which he places the maintenance of church rates on the highest pinnacle of principle, and quite abandoning that conciliatory tone which he has hitherto invariably shown in the discussion on this question both in this and in the other branch of the Legislature. I have further heard—and I have heard with great pain—from the most reverend Primate—to differ from whom is always a source of pain, both on account of his high position, his eminent abilities, and his estimable character — I heard from him a speech the tone of which was quite different from that of former speeches upon this question. The most rev. Prelate on a former occasion himself brought in a Bill abolishing church rates in parishes where the levying of a rate had been successfully resisted for two consecutive years; but now he holds that church rates should be inviolably maintained. Reference has been made to what fell from me on a former occasion. What I said then was that a great majority of those who opposed church rates were not opposed to the existence and prosperity of the Church. I see now the position in which this question is now placed. I see in my own neighbourhood the progress which the spirit of opposition to these rates is making; that, while a few years ago Dissenters were the only opponents in rural districts and small towns of 5,000 or 6,000 inhabitants, Members of the Church are now opposed to the levying of these rates, although I know Dissenters who not only support but cheerfully pay them. While I should regret that the Bill in its present shape should pass into law — [“Hear!”] — that cheer is premature, for I will give a reason for supporting the Bill — when I find noble Lords prepared to say that they will not adopt any other mode of settlement if this Bill is rejected, but will maintain church rates as at present, then I see no other practical way of bringing the question to a speedy solution than by passing the second reading of this Bill, and endeavouring in Committee to introduce such Amendments as shall reconcile the abolition of church rates with the interests of the Church of England itself. Therefore I am prepared to vote for the second reading.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: I said that while I objected to the abolition of church rates, which I believed to be essential for the maintenance of the churches, I wished that the rate should be compulsory on members of the Church alone.

THE DUKE of NEWCASTLE: Then, if church rates are abolished as regards Dissenters, and are compulsory upon members of the Church alone, it seems to me that it will be a penal tax imposed upon them.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he should not have trespassed on their Lordships' time, being well convinced in his own mind of the propriety of adhering to the opinions

The Duke of Newcastle

he had formerly expressed upon this question, had it not been for one or two statements contained in the speech of the noble Duke (the Duke of Newcastle), and which it was impossible for him to pass without observation. The noble Duke had justified the change he intended to make in his vote, though not in his opinion, wholly irrespective of the merits of the question itself, and on grounds on which, he ventured to say, the noble Duke had no sufficient foundation. The noble Duke stated that he still disapproved of the measure, and that he was extremely unwilling to see it passed into law; but that in the vague and vain expectation that some Amendment might be proposed and adopted by their Lordships, and, in the consequent sanguine expectation that it would be accepted by the other House, he proposed to vote for the second reading of a Bill which he considers dangerous in principle and hostile to the interests of the Church. “But,” said the noble Duke, “I found my change of opinion upon the altered course pursued by the House of Commons in legislating on this question.” Now the altered course pursued by the House of Commons indicated, he was happy to say, a greatly increased feeling on the part of the Members of that House for maintaining the existing law; because when he saw the majorities in that House successively diminishing from 74 to 59, and then to 29, and finally to what the noble Lord who introduced the measure (Lord Lyveden) designated as the “ominous number of 9,” he considered that it indicated a very considerable alteration of opinion on the part of the House of Commons in favour of the maintenance, at all events of the principle, of the existing law; and he must say he thought that if the noble Lord who opened the discussion had been a Member of their Lordships' House last year, and had seen the overwhelming expression of opinion by which the measure was negatived, or if he had been a Member of the House of Commons, and had seen their constantly dwindling and meagre majorities in support of it, he would have exercised that discretion which was the better part of valour, and would have abstained from inviting their Lordships to a renewed expression of opinion on the subject. The noble Duke gave as a reason for his altered vote on this occasion, that he would have voted as he had formerly done, if he had not seen on the part of its opponents in the House of Commons an absence of that conciliatory spirit that formerly characterized their proceedings. Now, he ventured to ask their Lordships, with all confidence, on which side had there been this absence of a conciliatory spirit? Why, their Lordships had been told in the opening of the debate, and with reference to the question on which they had to divide, that concession and compromise were impossible, and that it was absolutely necessary that they should choose between the maintenance of the existing law, or the absolute, unconditional, and entire abolition of church rates. And that had been the language of all parties who had supported the abolition of church rates. What, on the other hand, was the course that had been pursued by that side of their Lordships' House? One after another they had proposed this concession, and that compromise, and that course of conciliation to their opponents, but without success; and the result of all these overtures of compromise, made for the purpose of showing their good feeling and their desire not to push the principle to an extremity, had been met by the idle allegation that they had sacrificed their own principle, that they were abandoning their whole case, and bringing forward measures that in fact were worse than the total abolition of church rates. That was the spirit in which all attempts at concession, compromise, and conciliation had been met; and that being the case, he thought it was too much for the noble Duke at the last moment of the discussion to get up and say, that he had changed his vote in consequence of there being that total absence of the conciliatory spirit of which he speaks. He must also contradict the noble Duke—he did not mean contradiction in any discourteous sense of the word—but he must protest against the statement he had made, that in the recommendations of the Select Committee of the House of Lords they had practically abandoned the principle of church rates. What they had done was this—they had maintained the right of the majority of the parishioners to tax themselves for their own purposes. Now to every church rates by equal rate was opposed to voluntary contribution. They had in the same Report—and it was a point which had been passed over and been omitted to be considered—recommended that, in consideration of their taking that course, the law should be strengthened for the recovery of the compulsory rate so imposed. If they had consented for the sake of peace to an exemption of those persons who might claim exemption from the payment on the right of abstract justice—in which they did not concur—if they had consented to their exemption under these circumstances from contributing to the general burdens of the parish—they had at the same time provided that the persons so exempted should not in any degree be entitled to take part in the administration of the funds to which they did not contribute their fair and proper proportion. Perhaps that might be thought the extreme of concession; but it was one he was quite ready to justify—one he was not ashamed of, and though it was one which might not be consistent with strict justice, on the other hand they had not proposed that those who from conscientious motives, declined to contribute to the general object—they did not propose to deprive them of the rights of parishioners, but they proposed to deprive them of any power in administering or regulating the funds from contributing which they themselves had requested to be exempted. They had endeavoured to maintain the principle while they desired to modify and ameliorate the practice; but that was widely different from acting on or seceding to the proposals that were now being made, of leaving to every person the option whether they should contribute at all, or how much they should contribute, and leaving every church throughout the country liable to be closed or abandoned at the caprice of those whose bounden duty it was to maintain and support the fabric. He repudiated the idea that they had conceded the principle by the exceptions they had consented to introduce; and, on the other hand, he thought that if there had been any absence of conciliation and concession, it was not on the supporters of the existing law that that charge could in any fairness be fixed. They had endeavoured to meet their opponents half way, and more than half way; but they were told, in reply, by them that there was no alternative between the acceptance of absolute abolition or the maintenance of the present law; and if that be the alternative demanded and required, great as the objections might be to some of the provisions of the present law, and desirous as he might be to amend that law, if their opponents will permit them to do so, and which they admit will be an advantage; yet if the maintenance of the existing law, or the absolute abolition of the provision that had been made by the law from time immemorial for the maintenance of the fabric of the Established Church, and for securing the blessings of religion to every poor man in every parish throughout the kingdom were to be put in competition—if that was to be the alternative, then, without hesitation and with all its imperfections, he was for the maintenance altogether of the existing law as against any proposition whatever for the abolition of church rates.

LORD LYVEDEN said, he was quite satisfied to leave the discussion where it was, and should be only too happy if the division were as satisfactory to him as the debate had been. He felt, however, bound to reply to an observation of the noble Earl who had just sat down, in reference to his inexperience in their Lordships' House. The noble Earl had thought proper to read him a lecture, and had told him he would have exercised a better discretion if he had not persevered in the discussion of this measure, and that if he had seen the division in their Lordships' House on the last occasion of a vote of this kind, or had witnessed the altered attitude in which the Commons regarded the question, he would probably have desisted from the attempt. That was quite a new doctrine to him, and he was surprised to hear it fall from the noble Earl. He had always been led to believe the importance of small majorities and large minorities; but whether he was accompanied by a majority or a minority, be it large or small, he should not be deterred—and he hoped his conduct would not be regarded as discreditable by their Lordships, if, when thoroughly convinced of the propriety of a measure, he persevered in it whether he were backed by large majorities or by small. The noble Earl did not consider the Report of the Select Committee an abandonment of the compulsory scheme. Now, could anything be more voluntary than a system which allowed any man to object, whether with reason or without reason? He was surprised that the noble Earl, who was so powerful a reasoner, should attempt to justify the Report on that ground. He wished that he could feel as satisfied with the probable result of the division as he did with the debate, but nothing which had been said led him to abate his confidence in the voluntary system.

On Question, That ("now") stand part of the Motion? their Lordships divided:—Contents 31; Not-Contents 128: Majority 97.

The Earl of Derby

Resolved in the Negative; and Bill to be read 2^a this Day Three Months.

CONTENTS.

Newcastle, D.	Dunfermline, L.
Somerset, D.	Ebury, L.
Abingdon, E.	Foley, L. [Teller.]
Airlie, E.	Leigh, L.
Albemarle, E.	Lyveden, L. [Teller.]
De Grey, E.	Mont Eagle, L. (M. Sligo)
Ducie, E.	Mostyn, L.
Durham, E.	Portman, L.
Granville, E.	Skene, L. (E. Fife.)
Minto, E.	Somerhill, L. (M. Clan-
Spencer, E.	ricarde.)
Strafford, E.	Stanley of Alderley, L.
Leinster, V. (D. Lein-	Taunton, L.
ster.)	Teynham, L.
Belper, L.	Truro, L.
Congleton, L.	Vivian, L.
	Wodehouse, L.

NOT-CONTENTS.

Canterbury, Archbp.	Saint Germans, E.
Campbell, L. (L. Chan-	Shaftesbury, E.
cellor.)	Shrewsbury, E.
Cleveland, D.	Stradbroke, E.
Marlborough, D.	Tankerville, E.
Rutland, D.	Verulam, E.
Bath, M. [Teller.]	De Vesci, V.
Bristol, M.	Doneraile, V.
Camden, M.	Dungannon, V.
Exeter, M.	Eversley, V.
Normanby, M.	Hutchinson, V. (E. Do-
Salisbury, M.	noughmore.)
Westmeath, M.	Lifford, V.
Abergavenny, E.	Melville, V.
Amherst, E.	Sidmouth, V.
Aylesford, E.	St. Vincent, V.
Bandon, E.	Bangor, Bp.
Bantry, E.	Bath and Wells, Bp.
Beauchamp, E.	Carlisle, Bp.
Cardigan, E.	Cashel, &c., Bp.
Carnarvon, E.	Chichester, Bp.
Cathcart, E.	Derry and Raphoe, Bp.
Cawdor, E.	Durham, Bp.
Chesterfield, E.	Gloucester and Bristol,
Chichester, E.	Bp.
Dartmouth, E.	Hereford, Bp.
De La Warr, E.	Llandaff, Bp.
Derby, E.	London, Bp.
Desart, E.	Ripon, Bp.
Devon, E.	Salisbury, Bp.
Ellenborough, E.	St. David's, Bp.
Erne, E.	Winchester, Bp.
Grey, E.	Abinger, L.
Haddington, E.	Bagot, L.
Hardwicke, E.	Bateman, L.
Harrington, E.	Berners, L.
Ilchester, E.	Blayney, L.
Leven and Melville, E.	Bolton, L.
Lonsdale, E.	Boston, L.
Mayo, E.	Braybrooke, L.
Morton, E.	Brodrick, L. (V. Middle-
Nelson, E.	ton.)
Orkney, E.	Chelmsford, L.
Pomfret, E.	Churchill, L.
Portarlington, E.	Clanbrassill, L. (E.
Powis, E.	Roden.)
Romney, E.	Clinton, L.

Clonbrook, L.	Northwick, L.
Colchester, L.	Polwarth, L.
Colville of Culross, L.	Ravensthorpe, L.
[Teller.]	Rayleigh, L.
Cranworth, L.	Redesdale, L.
Crews, L.
Delamere, L.	Saltoun, L.
Denman, L.	Scarsdale, L.
De Ros, L.	Sheffield, L. (E. Sheffield.)
Dinevor, L.	Sondes, L.
Downes, L.	Southampton, L.
Egerton, L.	Stewart of Garlies, L.
Farnham, L.	(E. Galloway.)
Faversham, L.	Strathspey, L. (E. Seafield.)
Gage, L. (V. Gage.)	Talbot de Malahide, L.
Grantley, L.	Templemore, L.
Kenyon, L.	Tenterden, L.
Kingsdown, L.	Thurlow, L.
Leconfield, L.	Tyrone, L. (M. Waterford.)
Lovel and Holland, L.	Wynford, L.
(E. Egmont.) Lyttleton, L.
Maryborough, L. (E. Mornington.)

House adjourned at Half-past Ten o'clock, to Thursday next, Half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, June 19, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1° Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences (Ireland).

TENURE AND IMPROVEMENT OF LAND (IRELAND) BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clause 10 (Limited Owner entitled to Compensation for Improvements).

LORD NAAS said, he rose to move the Amendment of which had given notice—namely, in line 19, to leave out the word “Chairman,” and insert the words “one of the Judges of the Landed Estates Court.” He had always supported the principle of compensation to the improving tenant, where it could be done consistently with the rights of property. He did not think, however, that the Chairman of the County was the proper person to be intrusted with the large powers that were involved in the Bill. Chairmen of Counties were not at all in the habit of dealing with matters such as were now proposed to be decided by them. The Landed Estates Court on the contrary was daily occupied in the investigation of titles and of documents connected with land. The Judges had power to examine witnesses, and their ability and character were well known, and their decisions were always open to review. The only objection which could be brought against the proposal to make that Court the tribunal to which questions such as the Bill related to ought to be referred, was that of expense. But when the House considered that gentlemen were constantly in the habit of going before the Court to sell small portions of their property, they would see that there could be no great difficulty in requiring them to go before the same Court to make improvements, involving perhaps a much larger money value than the small sales which were frequently effected by its means.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, lines 18 and 19, to leave out the words “the Chairman,” in order to insert the words “one of the Judges of the Landed Estates Court,”—instead thereof.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he must oppose the Amendment. So far from being wanting in experience, the Assistant Barristers, who were Chairmen of the county Benches, were peculiarly adapted to the discharge of the duties created by the Bill. They were generally well acquainted with the tenure of the land in their respective districts. Besides that, the expense of putting the Act in operation in the local districts into which Ireland was divided would be very small compared with the large expenses necessarily connected with the bringing of hosts of witnesses to the Landed Estates Court in Dublin. As to the latter Court having given universal satisfaction, he dissented from the assertion. He remembered the reckless manner in which the Encumbered Estates Court originally set to work, when they sold for £15,000,000 encumbered estates of the value of £22,000,000. That he thought was anything but satisfactory.

MR. BRADY said, he could congratulate the Committee on the tone of the noble Lord in introducing his Amendment. It augured well for the satisfactory settlement of this vexed question. He thought, however, that the Amendment would involve too much expense, and he would therefore support the clause as it stood.

MR. M. O’FERRALL said, that as the questions to be decided would, in a great measure, be questions of title, the best and safest course would be to place the execution of the Act in the hands of the Judges of the Landed Estates Court, in which sat three well known and good lawyers.

MR. H. A. HERBERT said, he should support the clause as it stood. He did not see why it should be necessary that a man should be a lawyer to enable him to judge of the improvements the land would require. Even if it were decided to be necessary, the result would be the same, for the Judges would not go down and examine the land for themselves, but would rely upon the evidence of surveyors and other persons of that class. Under such circumstances he (Mr. H. A. Herbert) thought the Chairmen of Counties would be fully competent to deal with the questions involved, while they were easily accessible, and the proceedings before them were inexpensive.

MR. GEORGE said, he preferred a reference of questions like those dealt with by the Bill, affecting alike the interests of the tenant for life and the reversioner or remainder man to the Landed Estates Court, rather than to the Assistant Barristers, who were Chairmen of Quarter Sessions. He should, therefore, support the Amendment. He likewise thought the Landed Estates Court would be, on the whole, less expensive than the new tribunal which the Bill proposed to create. It would, moreover, be most inconvenient to produce title deeds and family settlements at Sessions Courts, often held on the market and fair day.

MR. DEASY expressed his gratification at the desire expressed by the Committee to settle the most important question for Ireland which was dealt with by this Bill. The desire of the Government was to establish a machinery which would be easily accessible, and at small expense; and he saw few questions likely to arise which could not be satisfactorily disposed of by the Chairmen of Counties. But if the Committee preferred that they should be settled by the Landed Estates Courts, the Government would not object.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he preferred a reference of the questions to the Landed Estates Court. He did not think the Chairmen of Quarter Sessions were fit to decide who was the limited owner of an estate, and who was entitled to the inheritance. The limited owner would not like to expose the nature of his estate in his own district.

MR. MONSELL said, the great object was to provide against the evils formerly very common where men obtained advances on account of improvements, and then put the money into their own pockets, without improving the land at all. For these reasons, he preferred the Landed Estates Court.

MR. HASSARD maintained, that the Commissioners of Public Works would be a better tribunal than either the Landed Estates Court or the Chairmen of Quarter Sessions.

MR. BUTT said, the Bill before the Committee was nothing more than an enabling Bill, and the Quarter Sessions Court would be a much better tribunal for carrying out its objects than the Landed Estates Court, which, being confined to Dublin, and, therefore, for the most part, remote from the place where the improvements were to be effected would have to carry on a difficult, expensive, and troublesome investigation. But the very worst tribunal of all would be that suggested by the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Hassard). The very worst form of Government for a country was a Government by Boards, and a country more miserably "be-boarded" than Ireland did not exist on the face of the earth. But as for the choice between the Landed Estates Court and the Court of Quarter Sessions, the latter was vastly to be preferred. If the Landed Estates Court had the control, it would be necessary that the whole of the evidence should be carried on by means of affidavits, which was universally admitted to be the very worst mode of taking evidence, and which they were trying by every possible means to get rid of. Distance, expense, and difficulty of access, all would render the Landed Estates Court much less likely to act efficiently than the Quarter Sessions Court. He should, therefore, support the original proposition.

COLONEL DICKSON said, the argument of those who supported the proposal to vest the necessary powers in the Local Courts was that they were the more easy of access. For that very reason he was opposed to the clause, because it would give facilities for encumbering estates, which, he believed, would be extremely detrimental to future inheritors of the land.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he was opposed to the original clause on the ground of the great expense it would render necessary, and also because it proposed to throw into the hands of the assistant barristers a quantity of business with which they were not only too much occupied, but were utterly incompetent to deal. He much preferred the Landed Estates Court as a cheaper and far more satisfactory tribunal to have the decision of these questions.

Mr. M. O'Ferrall

at the same time he would give them all the assistance that could be obtained, both from the Commissioners of Works and the chairmen of Counties.

Mr. LONGFIELD said, he considered the local courts very unfit, from their amatory character, to investigate titles. He wished to see a good practical working measure passed; and if he thought all the business would really be done by the chairman of the county, he would at once vote for the Bill. He had, however, conversed with many of the chairmen on this point, and they one and all agreed that they were unfitted for the duty; though some of them added that they should put in a claim for increased salary if this extra work were given them. He, therefore, preferred the Landed Estates Court. If the expense of the latter were found too great a reduced scale of fees might be instituted; but if the court were then found not to work well, the business could be transferred to the Commissioners of Public Works.

Mr. POLLARD-URQUHART said, he believed that the Landed Estates Court would be the most efficient tribunal to prevent jobbery at the expense of the successor to an estate; and he considered that that court might be easily made available for all purposes under the Bill.

Lord FERMOY said, the question was now were they to frame an act which would be used by the country. In former times the allegation was that the tenants would defraud the landlords, but now it was that the man in possession would defraud his successor. If they followed out the lawyer's plan of encumbering the Act with checks, they would spend a long time in framing an Act which would never be used in Ireland. He believed the people of Ireland would never resort to the Landed Estates Court. The Quarter Sessions Courts had always performed their business cheap and well, and if these courts were to carry out the enactments of the Bill, it would be easy to produce the necessary evidence before them in all cases.

Mr. CARDWELL said, he entirely concurred in the observations made by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Deasy), when he spoke of that portion of the Bill as principally the landlord's portion. He therefore felt himself compelled to consider it as it presented itself to the majority of the landlords in Ireland. His noble Friend (Lord Fermoyn), and other high authorities, had confirmed the reasoning which had induced his right hon. Friend and himself to frame the clause. It had been framed after full consideration of the powers of the Barristers' Courts in Ireland, and upon the Montgomery Act in operation in Scotland, though he did not believe himself that either the one tribunal or the other would entail any very serious expense upon the landlord or the limited owner, since practically the provisions of the Act would be carried into effect by the aid of local agents. His own feeling was certainly in favour of giving the jurisdiction to the local tribunal. But he was bound to acknowledge that upon the whole the vast preponderance of opinion seemed to be on the other side. Seeing, therefore, that it was the landlords' part of the Bill, and that the Government had been met by a most general desire of carrying the measure into effect in an efficient shape, and that if the unanimity were not disturbed by any difference of opinion they should be the more likely to obtain the sanction of the united Legislature. He was willing, if it appeared to be the opinion of the Committee, to defer to the prevailing view, and acquiesce in the proposed change.

Mr. MAGUIRE, Mr. BEAMISH, The O'DONOGHUE, Mr. M'MAHON, and Mr. CHESTER FORTESCUE expressed opinions in favour of the clause as it stood.

Mr. LEFROY and Mr. BAGWELL supported the Amendment.

Lord NAAS said, it should not be forgotten that the Landed Estates Court sat nearly throughout the year, whereas the Courts of the Assistant Barristers sat only a few times in the year. He must complain of the course threatened by the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone (Lord Fermoyn), because the Government had thought it better not to oppose the Amendment.

Mr. BUTT said, the responsibility of the division should not rest solely on the noble Lord. If necessary, he (Mr. Butt) would divide the Committee, because the measure would be considered nugatory by providing that the reference should be made to the Landed Estates Court.

Lord FERMOY said, he was sorry that the Government had given way on the question; but he should certainly not consent to the alteration in the clause without taking the sense of the Committee upon it.

Mr. BRETT said, he regretted that the Government had not stood firmly by the clause, and he approved of the course pursued by the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 51; Noes 127: Majority 76.

MR. LONGFIELD said, that in the absence of his hon. Friend who had given the notice (Mr. Hassard), he would move an Amendment, enabling tenants for life to make improvements upon lands, and charge the outlay upon the estate to an extent not exceeding four years' rent, in the manner provided by the Montgomery Act for Scotland.

MR. CARDWELL said, he hoped the Committee would adhere to the plan of charging all improvements upon the land by way of annuity.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he would take that opportunity of drawing attention to a provision in the Bill, by which it was provided that the portion of the estate adjacent to the lands improved should be saddled with the expense of improvements.

MR. DEASY said, the lands adjacent might participate in the benefit of the improvements, and, therefore, should be liable to a part of the expense; but no abuse could occur, for there was a tribunal to decide whether such lands would be properly chargeable with such expense.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to Amendments of which he had given notice. One was that while the Landed Estates Court should be the ultimate tribunal it should be empowered to avail itself of some local machinery, such as that of the General Valuation Office of Ireland, or the Board of Works. He suggested for the consideration of the Government whether it would not be well to place those establishments under the control of, and in the same department as, the Landed Estates Court. The clauses which he proposed to insert also would have the effect of empowering the Landed Estates Court, where necessary, to avail itself of the powers and decision of the assistant barristers. He added that if the Government opposed his Amendments he would not press them, but declared that if they were not adopted, the value of the Bill would be greatly impaired.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 11 agreed to.

Clauses 12 to 20 inclusive agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress: to sit again on Thursday next, at Twelve of the clock.

Mr. Brett

CAVALRY REGIMENTS.—QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War how many of the vacancies of Cornets of Cavalry Regiments, which were sixty-five in January, 1860, have been filled up; and whether he remains of the opinion expressed in his Letters to his Royal Highness the General Commanding-in-Chief, of the 11th November, 1859, and to the Treasury, of the 23rd of January, 1860, that the discontinuance of the stoppage of pay for forage to the Officers of the Cavalry was essential to obtaining a due succession of Officers for that branch of the service?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that thirteen of those vacancies had been filled up. He had never expressed the opinion attributed to him by the hon. Member in the second part of his question. He held the opinion that the discontinuance of the stoppage of pay for forage to the Officers of the Cavalry was but fair and just towards those Officers; but he did not think he had stated that it was necessary for the purpose of securing a succession of Officers for the regiments.

HARBOURS OF REFUGE.

RESOLUTION.

MR. LINDSAY said, he rose to move the Resolution of which he had given notice:—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to adopt at the earliest possible period the necessary measures to carry into effect the recommendations of the Commissioners appointed in 1858 to inquire into the formation of Harbours of Refuge on the coasts of Great Britain and Ireland."

A Committee had reported unanimously in favour of the establishment of Harbours of Refuge. A Royal Commission had subsequently considered the matter, and backed up the Report of the Committee; and under such circumstances he felt it was the duty of the Government to have brought forward this subject. They had, however, given answers to the various questions that had been put to them, which, if they were not evasive, certainly showed that they had no earnest feeling in this matter, and, as they had either failed or neglected to bring it forward, the duty of calling attention to the subject devolved on some independent Member. The value of the imports and exports of the country rendered the question important. Our tonnage employed in the foreign trade, including both entries inwards and outwards, was 22,000,000 tons annually; that of our coasting trade 1,000,000. Our annual exports and imports £320,000,000, exclusive of our coast trade. While trade was constantly increasing the area was limited. From the increase of trade the vessels were becoming every year more liable to danger. In the year 1854 no fewer than 1,549 persons lost their lives on the coast, without reckoning those who perished from ships foundering at sea. The average loss of life from ships stranded on the coast of the United Kingdom was 1,000; and he feared that this year it would very much exceed that amount. The amount of property lost on the shores of the United Kingdom was estimated at a million and a half sterling per annum. These important facts were brought before the House in 1857, and the House with one accord agreed to the appointment of a Committee to see if anything could be done to mitigate the fearful loss of life and property to which he had alluded. That Committee sat for two Sessions, and took evidence from all parts of the country; and in 1858 they reported to the House that they could not too strongly press on the House their conviction of the necessity, on national grounds, that the works required to remedy the present state of things should be undertaken as early as possible, and on such a system as would secure their rapid and steady progress. A Motion was soon afterwards made and unanimously agreed to, for the appointment of a Royal Commission, not to clear up any doubts that existed, but to examine the coast with a view to discover the most suitable sites for the creation of Harbours of Refuge. The hon. and gallant Member for Chatham (Sir Frederic Smith) and himself were the only Members of the House on that Commission; but the other Members were able and competent men. The Commission was presided over by Admiral Hope, who was at present in command of the fleet in China, and was occupied for a period of six months in the prosecution of the arduous labours which devolved upon it. The Commissioners met in London and agreed on certain points which they thought to be necessary elements in a good harbour. The first object they sought to attain was to fix upon sites by means of which the most would be done to save life; the next, as far possible, to save property; the third, to afford facilities for commerce; and lastly came the question of our defences.

which now occupied a considerable degree of public attention, and in connection with which it seemed desirable to secure a rendezvous suitable for our ships of war as well as a proper station for convoys. Having fixed upon those leading points, the Commission had held its first meeting at Wick, and there they found a larger trade than they expected. They found that 10,000 ships passed through the Pentland Frith annually, and that about 10,000 more passed along the coast on their way to the Baltic, to Canada, and to the United States. They found that no fewer than 1,700 boats of large size, carrying from 8,000 to 10,000 men, were engaged in the herring fishery, besides a great many more boats of smaller size. And they found that along the whole of that iron-bound coast, from Cromarty to the Pentland Frith, there was not a single harbour which—he did not say a ship—but which a herring boat could make if caught in an easterly gale of wind. The consequence was that in one of the recent gales no fewer than 120 of the hardy fishermen by whom the herring boats were manned had perished, when attempting to make the harbour of Wick in an easterly gale. If the harbour, on a limited scale which they recommended, had been erected, all those lives would have been saved. Further south, the Commission found that a large passing trade and a large fishing trade existed, and yet from Peterhead to the Frith of Forth there was no harbour which an ordinary-sized vessel could take at low water. Therefore they recommended that at Wick and Peterhead harbours should be made, partly out of local resources, for he was bound to say the people did not ask that all should be done for them out of the public revenues. At both places the people said, “We shall benefit to a considerable extent by the construction of these harbours, and for the benefit we expect to derive we are willing to pay.” They next came to the north-east coast of England, where they found that at the port of Shields, from 300 to 400 vessels sometimes left the harbour at one tide, manned by from 5,000 to 6,000 men. Going still farther south, to Flamborough Head, they found it was no uncommon thing for 500 sail of merchantmen to be taken by one grasp of the eye, if he might use the expression, and the sea appeared to be literally covered with fleets of merchant ships; and yet with this vast amount of property and life continually at stake, they found that from the Frith of Forth to the Humber, a distance of 150 miles, there was not a single port to which those vessels could in any case of necessity fly for refuge. The consequence having been that in 1857 sixty-five ships had been totally wrecked in one gale of wind, and eighty-five lives sacrificed. He might add that he had seen it somewhere stated that in the last gale no less than 300 vessels had been stranded along the shore to which he was referring, and it should be remembered that the lives which were thus lost to the country were those of our seamen, on whom England must depend to fight her battles in the hour of need. In that quarter, again, they had experienced similar liberality on the part of the inhabitants with respect to the contributing to the cost of providing the necessary harbours. As an instance of that liberality he might mention the case of the Tyne, where it would cost £1,000,000 to erect a harbour, towards which expenditure the inhabitants expressed themselves ready to contribute £750,000, if the Government will furnish £250,000. At Hartlepool £1,000,000 would be required to make a Harbour of Refuge there, and the people offered to raise half of that sum if the Government would give the other half. That, he thought, proved that the harbours they recommended would not be useless, for the people themselves, if they did not appreciate their value, would never spend their own money on their construction. Coming further south they found the remarkable harbour of Filey, where nature had done so much, and man had done nothing at all. For the sum of £800,000 that harbour could be made nearly equal to the magnificent harbour of Portland. Going south from the Thames to the Land's End, there were many harbours—Dover, Portsmouth, Portland, Plymouth, and in the Isle of Wight—all made at the cost of the Government; but they did not consider that Dover was one of those harbours likely to be of much advantage for saving either life or property in jeopardy at sea. While he would do all he could to obtain such harbours as the Commission had recommended he would do all in his power to oppose further grants of money to Dover. They would never get their money's worth either from Dover or Alderney—especially from Alderney. From the northern coast of Cornwall to the Bristol Channel they found that between Lundy Island and Bristol, there was no expenditure necessary, there being already excellent shelter; but between Land's End and Hartland Point, passed by one-fifth of the whole coasting trade of the country, with the exception of Padstow, a very dangerous harbour to take, and which would only admit small vessels under favourable circumstances, there were sixty miles of iron-bound coast, with no place of shelter. It was necessary to do something there, and the Commission were unanimous in their recommendation that a Harbour of Refuge should be made at St. Ives, which would not only be of vast utility for the preservation of life and property, but also of national importance as regards defence. For the sum of £400,000 a magnificent harbour could be constructed there. Turning to the west, south, and north coast of Ireland they found that nature had done nearly as much as on the west coast of Scotland. On the west there was the magnificent harbour of Galway; and on the south the still more magnificent harbour of Cork. On the north there were Belfast Lough, and Lough Foyle. They did not, therefore, think it necessary to recommend any grant of money for the construction of Harbours of Refuge either on the west, south, or north coast of Ireland. But on the east coast, where the principal traffic took place from Liverpool, Glasgow, and the ports on the Clyde, there was a great want of shelter. In the Bay of Carlingford, however, there was a splendid sheet of water, fit to receive the whole of the Royal Navy, but access to it was prevented by a bar or ledge of rock that might be removed for £50,000, when the Bay of Carlingford would at once become a magnificent harbour. Waterford presented similar facilities, and for the same sum of £50,000 the harbour could be made accessible at all times of the tide. The Isle of Man was the last place they visited. They found that there was not a harbour on the Island. At Douglas they were obliged to land in small boats. Yet there existed a considerable trade with Liverpool, besides the shelter that might be afforded to ships passing up and down the Channel. They felt, therefore, they might fairly call on the Government to be at the expense of making a harbour there. But the people of Douglas came forward and said "No; we feel we shall greatly benefit by the construction of the harbour, and we will willingly bear half the expense if the Government will bear the other half." The whole sum the Commission recommended should be spent was £2,365,000 for separate harbours at points where they were most needed around the whole of our shores. He did not ask the House to vote all that money at once for this purpose; but he did ask that they should adopt the Resolution that the Government should, at the earliest possible period, undertake to commence these great national and necessary works. It would take at least ten years to construct all these works; and the grants should be spread over that period. The sum required next year would not exceed £250,000, and might not reach that amount. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade might say he objected to abstract Resolutions like the present, and that it would be time to deal with the question when they had money for Harbours of Refuge and were prepared to spend it upon them; but he would remind the right hon. Gentleman that he once himself brought forward a celebrated abstract Resolution, involving the sacrifice of a much larger sum than the House was then asked to vote. The right hon. Gentleman submitted to the House an abstract Resolution in favour of the repeal of the paper duties, which was carried, and when he became a Member of the Government he used his influence in the Cabinet to put it in force; and, by that Resolution, he did not ask for a sum of £250,000 a year for ten years, but he asked the House to give up for ever £1,500,000 per annum. He (Mr. Lindsay) did not know whether the Government intended to ask the House to adopt the Report just laid on the table with regard to the defences of the country, but without wishing to anticipate discussion upon that question he must say that it touched upon the subject of his Resolution. The great defence of this country ever had been and ever would be on the waters. It was not sufficient to say that everything had been changed since the application of screws to ships of war, for whatever change had taken place in the mode of conducting warfare, we were essentially a maritime people, and our great strength must ever be on the waters. As regarded, therefore, the defence of the country, he asked the House to support his Resolution, and he did so on this ground, that while these Harbours of Refuge would provide all round the coast a rendezvous for ships of war, and stations for convoys of merchant vessels in a time of warfare, they would complete those points of defence as regarded our different ports which would be required even if £12,000,000 were expended on fortifications. There would be no end to an expenditure on fortifications; for when once they began a system of fortifying the coasts, it must be continued on both sides of the kingdom, from Land's End to John o' Groat's. And after all if they spent £12,000,000 in fortifying Dover and other places, was it likely that an enemy would land his forces before the very muzzles of the guns? Both the Committee and the Commission reported that the sum required for the works they suggested was trifling as compared with the great objects which were to be attained, and therefore he asked the House on the ground of national defence, but above all on the ground of mercy, to support his Resolution.

Mr. Lindsay

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to adopt, at the earliest possible period, the necessary measures to carry into effect the recommendations of the Commissioners appointed in 1858 to inquire into the formation of Harbours of Refuge on the Coasts of Great Britain and Ireland."

MR. FARRER, in seconding the Resolution, said he entirely concurred with the Royal Commissioners when in their Report they described this question as one of a truly national character. He would address himself principally to the part of the country with which he was connected, and in the first place he would allude to the results of that frightful hurricane, unexampled at such a period of the year, which on the morning of Whit Monday last devastated the shores of the United Kingdom. He found from The Shipping Gazette that within ten miles of Hartlepool on that morning thirty-six vessels were wrecked, involving a loss of life and property, and all of those vessels were in such a position when the storm came on, that if there had been a harbour of refuge in the locality they would have ridden it out in entire safety. Powerful steamers had been exposed to the greatest danger—one from Hamburg had been obliged to throw overboard 192 out of 200 sheep, and another from Rotterdam was compelled to slaughter her deck cargo—bullocks: both vessels were nearly foundering in sight of port. His constituents, though naturally desirous to diminish the risk of damage to property at sea, were still anxious to see means adopted to save human life. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Milner Gibson) was in the habit of frequently cruising in those waters, and he avers the importance of providing for the security of those who frequented these seas. He trusted, therefore, that the Government would consent to entertain the question, and give their attention to those ports which most required such aid. He found from The Shipping Gazette that the wreck in January were 229, in February 154, in March 166, in April 133, and in May 124, making a total of 806. He might further state that of the thirty-six vessels wrecked off Hartlepool, three were lost with their entire crews. If it was thought expedient to expend a sum of £10,000,000 or £12,000,000 in fortifications in anticipation of the possible danger of a foreign invasion, the proposal to grant for ten years an annual sum of £250,000, could scarcely be considered an unreasonable one, the desired object being the "formation of Harbours of Refuge." He had no information as to the amount of loss of human life in them; but allowing that each ship was worth £1,000, and that the damage done was to the extent of about half that sum, there would have been a destruction of property equal to £400,000, which was more than the sum proposed to be expended in forming one or two of these harbours. The Royal Commissioners, in submitting their Report to the Queen, said they did so in the firm conviction that if these harbours were carried out in the spirit of their recommendations they would prove not the least noble of the many works of benevolence which illustrated the history of Her Majesty's reign. He would ask the Government to bear that in mind, and not to view this question either with carelessness or indifference. By adopting the plan recommended by the Royal Commission they would deserve the gratitude of seamen yet unborn, and the admiration of all classes of their countrymen.

MR. BAXTER said, he hoped Her Majesty's Government were not prepared to give a hasty assent to the Motion, involving as it did an expenditure, according to the Report of the Commissioners, of £2,365,000, but in the judgment of many authorities equally competent to form an opinion on the subject, an expenditure greatly exceeding, if not double, that sum. There were serious and grave reasons why the House should pause before they accepted the Motion. The hon. Member for Sunderland had referred to the Committee on Harbours of Refuge, but that Committee was a most unfortunate appointment, inasmuch as, instead of consisting of disinterested and impartial judges, the majority, or at least a large portion, of the members represented seaports, and were directly interested in large sums of money being spent upon Harbours of Refuge. The hon. Member for Sunderland had put the annual loss of life by shipwreck on our coasts at 1,000 persons; the Commissioners estimated it at 780, and the annual loss of property at 1,500,000. But did the hon. Member maintain that a great proportion of those lives and of that property would be saved by the erection of Harbours of Refuge? That was extremely problematical. He did not deny that Harbours of Refuge would prove of some value, but it was very questionable whether there would be any material saving of life and property by the erection of the few Harbours of Refuge recommended by the Commissioners. Only a very limited number of vessels on our coasts could reasonably be expected to be in such a position, on the approach of a storm, as to be able to take advantage of those harbours. He had heard many experienced seafaring men speak against harbours of refuge, which they called "skulking holes;" and he never should forget the approbation when one of the sea captains, at the meeting held at Dundee, said, in answer to a question from the Commissioners, that he thought many more ships were lost in making for harbours than in putting out to sea. The Commissioners themselves said that in certain weather ships were only able to reach those ports which were under their lee; and, therefore, the greater the number of such ports the greater would be the saving of life. The Commissioners further said that the inevitable conclusion was that it would be advantageous to improve existing ports wherever practicable. But he understood that, instead of recommending the improvement of existing ports, the Commissioners recommended the construction of new harbours. It was his firm conviction that more losses occurred through ill-found unseaworthy ships than were occasioned by sudden gales. New and powerful vessels, if well manned, were to a great extent independent of harbours of refuge; and for coasting vessels, which would principally make use of them, it would be much more advantageous to improve those which already existed and which lay in their route, than to expend enormous sums on the construction of new harbours of refuge. This view was simply borne out by the statements in the Report of the Commissioners, and by the evidence which they had collected; but they had fully determined on this gigantic scheme of expenditure, and they accordingly recommended its adoption to the Legislature. The specific recommendations of the Commission, moreover, were open to particular objections. He regretted that Scotland should figure at the head of the rest of places on which the outlay was to be made. The Commissioners recommended that £250,000 should be expended on the little town of Wick, and £300,000 at Peterhead, and he believed he was only doing his duty in protesting against a step which was so uncalled for. It might be desirable to expend a portion of that amount at Wick for the benefit of the herring fishery, which was of importance in a national point of view, but as regarded Peterhead, it had been declared by the unanimous testimony of the witnesses examined at Dundee, that such a harbour was wholly unnecessary. The north-east coast of England, however, was the point at which it was proposed to make the largest expenditure. He did not deny the importance of the commercial interests upon the Tyne, but on the same principle every other river in the kingdom would have a right to apply for a grant of public money in proportion to its shipping. They were also asked to expend £500,000 at Hartlepool, and £800,000 at Filey Bay; but how could they justify the erection of two harbours so near each other, at a cost of £1,300,000? If they rashly agreed to sanction the expenditure of this money, they or their successors would live to declare their inability to stop an enormous expenditure such as was going on at Dover and Alderney. The Commissioners expected that the expenditure would be at an end in about ten years, but he was convinced that if they sanctioned the expenditure by their vote that night there was not one of them that would ever see the end of it. There were recommendations of the Commissioners in which he concurred, and therefore he was unable to meet the Motion with a direct negative; but believing the proposed expenditure of £2,500,000 to be, in the present financial position of the country, inexpedient, and that it would be unwise for the House of Commons to enter into any pledge on the subject, he deemed it to be his duty to move the previous question.

Mr. Farrer

MR. DODSON said, he rose to second the Amendment, because he thought the proposals advocated by the hon. Member for Sunderland were made at a very inopportune moment, and he was of opinion that it would be impolitic for the House to make any promise to incur so large an outlay as that which the Commissioners had proposed. They would have shortly to discuss the Report of the National Defences Commission, which, of course, must be more important than the question of Harbours of Refuge. It might indeed be said that to provide harbours of refuge was also a national object, but it was not so in the same degree, for the Government was not bound to take care of the defence of the country, but the Government was bound to protect the mercantile marine against storms and dangers of the sea, which were the act of God, any more than it was bound to protect the agricultural interest against damage by hailstorms. In dealing with the question before it the House should, he added, bear in mind that upon the north-east coast of England the wrecks which took place were attributable to causes which might be obviated to a considerable extent by the owners of vessels themselves, inasmuch as the principal sufferers were colliers, which were frequently sent out to sea in an unfit state. Under those circumstances, while he was of opinion that at the proper season the construction of harbours of refuge was an object to which the House might very properly give its sanction, he must decline advocating the proposed expenditure for the purpose at the present moment.

CAPTAIN TALBOT said, that as a naval officer who happened to have some experience in connection with the subject before the House, he deemed it to be his duty cordially to support the Motion of the hon. Member for Sunderland. The hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) appeared to imagine that a vessel would never be lost on our coasts if she were properly appointed and efficiently commanded; but no one who was accustomed to the sea could, he thought, accede to the justice of that proposition. It was impossible, indeed, to glance at the evidence which had been taken before the Royal Commission without perceiving that although some cases of wreck were due, in some degree, to causes such as those which he had just mentioned, yet a large number of them were to be attributed to bad weather, and many of the latter had occurred amongst first class ships fully found and manned. The hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) had pointed out to the House that property to the value of no less than £1,500,000 was annually lost on our shores; while the average loss of human life, a matter of much greater importance, was no less than 850 per annum. Without dwelling, however, on the general question, he should wish to advert for a moment to the port of Waterford, the capabilities of which he had had an opportunity of ascertaining in person. The position of that port at the south-east angle of Ireland was considered to be a most important one; it commanded the entrance to the St. George's Channel, and the Bristol Channel, and the whole of the trade of the west coast of England as well as that of the east coast of Ireland had to pass by it, while the commanders of the Liverpool ocean steamers bound for America were peremptorily ordered by the owners to take—except in cases of great emergency—the southern route. Now these vessels, on reaching the mouth of the Irish Channel, might be met by a southerly wind, in which case it would be a matter of difficulty for them to return to the English coast, whereas, if there were a safe harbour on the south coast of Ireland, they would be able to proceed thither, and, if necessary, find shelter. There was another point. From Kingston to Cork there was a great extent of coast, but no harbour at all adapted for the purposes of a harbour of refuge. He did not make these remarks from any desire to put forward the claims of Waterford, which was capable of accommodating the local shipping, but for purely national reasons. A harbour of refuge at that point was specially required. He hoped they should have a favourable vote on this subject, and that the Government would be prepared to enter on the subject in the spirit in which it had been recommended by the Royal Commission.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, that in his opinion his hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland had made out a fair case, and that the Government were really called on to take some early steps on this subject. It was not right that our brave seamen, the marrow and strength of the country, should be left to perish from dangers which were preventible. If the same accidents took place on railways as on the sea, they would have had long since Harbours of Refuge along the coast; but it was because the loss of life which was so great by shipwreck did not come fully home to them that they had overlooked the question. It was their interest as well as their duty to do so, for they could in no way more effectually promote our national defences than by the construction of Harbours of Refuge. The saving of the lives of from 800 to 1,000 seamen every year would be not only a most economical but a most wise measure of national defence, for they were the men who must fight our battles. There was no doubt that many colliers were sent to sea in an ill-found and unseaworthy state, and it was much to be desired that some means could be devised for preventing or punishing such traffic in the flesh, blood, and lives of our fellow-creatures, the owners of these vessels, by the system of insurance, saving themselves from pecuniary loss. Condign punishment should follow in every case where such a charge could be made out. He hoped the Government would accede to this Motion, so that there might be no occasion for a division. He, for one, should be ready to supply a much larger sum than that asked for, and he did not wish it to be supposed that persons who came from the interior of the country did not take an interest in the subject.

Captain Talbot

MR. BEECROFT said, this is a subject of great national importance, and I may be permitted to observe that the inhabitants of inland towns take quite as deep an interest in it as those residing in seaports. For instance, the people of the large manufacturing town which I have the honour to represent think it a positive disgrace that England, with an enormous commerce like hers, that the east coast from the Humber to the Frith of Forth should be left in a totally unprotected state. Will it be credited, that on that part of the coast there is not a single harbour capable of admitting vessels at low water? But such is the fact. The Royal Commissioners recommended Filey Bay as a most eligible site for a life and refuge harbour, which recommendation, if carried out, would be of immense service on the east coast. I have received a letter from the Leeds Chamber of Commerce on the subject, and, with the permission of the House, I will read a short extract from it:—

“This Chamber is of opinion no time should be lost in the construction of a national life harbour at Filey Bay, the necessity for which has become again evident from the disastrous results of the hurricane which recently swept over this island.”

Dr. Cortis, of Filey, writes to me thus:—

“We feel very warmly on the subject just now, half our fishermen being ruined by the loss of ten of their vessels wrecked in our bay on the 28th of May, entirely for want of a harbour.”

Along the north-east coast, extending from the Fern Islands to Flamborough Head—by a sea distance of about 100 miles only 45 per cent of the whole coasting trade of England passes, and 32 per cent of her foreign trade, coasting and foreign together, and on this part of the coast the scenes of shipwreck and loss of life are annually most heartrending and distressing. It is, therefore, of paramount importance that something should be done, and that soon. A million and a-half of property is annually lost on our coasts by shipwreck, and a lives lost from the same cause frequently exceed 1,000 in a year, no fewer than 1549 having thus perished in the year 1854. Why, only the other day, the awful destruction of fishing-boats belonging to Yarmouth and Lowestoft alone was attended with the loss of above 200 men. We cannot afford to lose year by year the valuable lives of so many brave fellows. How shall we be able to man our fleet if our were to come? We deem it to be of imperative necessity to find money for the building of ships of war, and yet we commit the suicidal policy of seeing our hardy seamen decimated year after year without attempting to make any adequate provision for their protection and safety. No doubt it will be said by the Government that the state of the finances of the country will prevent the recommendations of the Royal Commissioners being carried out at present. But I may observe that we find money for works of much less importance. This country never grudges money for works of necessity and mercy, but it does not grudge money for works which it feels are not needed. I shall cordially support the Motion of the hon. Member for Sunderland.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he was surprised that the hon. Member for Montserrat (Mr. Baxter) should have opposed this Motion, because upon referring to the evidence which was given before the Commission he found that the town he represented asked for a grant of £60,000 or £70,000 to improve its harbour, and that great efforts were made by the people of Montserrat—of which town he believed the hon. Gentleman was a native—to obtain the construction of a harbour of refuge at Arbroath, only a few miles from that port. The hon. Member for Sussex (Mr. Seddon) had opposed the Motion upon the grounds of the financial difficulties of the country and the necessity for improving our national defences. Were not our best defences the seamen of the country and a full treasury? Was it not, therefore, the worst possible policy to allow our sailors to be drowned, and to throw annually a million and a half of property into the sea? It was frightful to look at the wreck chart and observe the number of black spots off Flamborough Head, demonstrating, in a painful manner, that humanity, as well as prudence, required them to establish harbours of refuge on the north east coast. The Commission had recommended the formation of one at Hartlepool, and if that and other harbours were constructed they would be found useful in case of war both for the Royal and commercial marine. In addition to the want of a harbour for the north-east coast he thought a very strong case had been made out for one on the south-west coast at St. Ives, in the neighbourhood of which a very large amount of coasting tonnage had to pass, and which was nearly in the line from Liverpool to America. He entirely approved the scheme recommended in the Report of the Commission, and that particularly because it was founded upon the principle that the public money should not all be expended at a few places, but that assistance should be given to the improvement of a number of small harbours. Perhaps the most valuable part of that scheme was the proposal that loans should be made for the improvement of harbours upon the same plan upon which they had been granted for drainage, education, and other purposes. The harbour of Poole—the town which he had the honour to represent—was rapidly filling up because the inhabitants had no means of keeping it in proper order. They had made application to Parliament for an Act, unfortunately without success—but if the system of making loans was brought into operation not a month would elapse before they would set to work upon the improvement of their port. When the Commission was appointed it was understood that its Report would be final, and should be carried out, and he knew that some of its distinguished members would not have served on it had it been likely to prove otherwise. What more, then, had the Government to do than to decide whether or not they should act upon it? If they meant to throw it over let them say so at once, but if they meant to carry it out let there be no delay. There was no reason why the decision should be postponed until next year. If the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had a Bill let him introduce it, and allow the House to see what its provisions were. He earnestly trusted the Government would not oppose the Motion, because the majority of the House agreed in the principles upon which the Commissioners had based their Report.

MR. TAYLOR remarked that he could not concur with the Commissioners that Filey was the best point, because it was too near the Humber, but he knew from experience that two or three harbours of refuge were most necessary on the east coast. They had not too many seamen, and they ought to take care of those which they had.

MR. KENDALL said, that with reference to the remarks of the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) he wished to remind the House that not a single member of the Committee nor of the Commission had any personal interest in the expenditure which they recommended. The only object which they could have had in view was the good of their country. He believed that St. Ives well deserved the £400,000 which it was proposed to expend upon it. But Sir F. Beaufort had truly stated to Captain Sheringham that if ever there was a place which demanded the attention and assistance of the country it was Padstow. A small sum, £40,000, as recommended by the Commissioners, would do an immense deal of good. When a vessel was embayed on the iron-bound coast of Cornwall there was no harbour to get to, except Padstow. On the 26th October, the night on which the Royal Charter was wrecked, no less than twenty-four vessels, with over one hundred lives and £30,000 worth of property, were lost on the Cornwall coast. The north-west, which was the dangerous wind, was the true wind for Padstow harbour, but captains of vessels were deterred from running for it because they had to hug the point, and if they missed the true wind failed inside the point, and their vessels went to certain destruction on a quicksand. The principle, he contended, should be to assist those places which showed the greatest disposition to assist themselves, and to begin where the most good would be effected at the least cost. No small place had done so much out of its own means as Padstow. By various appliances to assist ships, eighty-one coasting vessels had been saved and only fourteen of them belonged to Padstow. If the Government had commenced by expending a small sum on Padstow, the country would have believed that they were in earnest and anxious to do more as soon as the state of the finances would permit.

Mr. Danby Seymour

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, that if he thought these harbours of refuge would really save all the property and lives which were lost by shipwreck he would vote for double the amount of money which was required to construct them. But it was a delusion to suppose that by the creation of these harbours anything like the amount of property or number of lives would be saved which were now lost. The previous year was one of the most disastrous on record as regarded the loss of life and property. More than 1,600 persons perished by shipwreck, but of that number 1,000 perished in six ships; and if they examined the circumstances under which those wrecks occurred, they would find the striking fact that they would not have been prevented by any of the harbours of refuge which were proposed. For instance, the Royal Charter passed the harbour of refuge at Holyhead, and went ashore on the coast of Anglesea; so that, unless the whole coast was one continuous harbour of refuge, such accidents would inevitably occur. Of 1,416 wrecks last year 350 had resulted from collision, and when allowance was made for ships which were lost through carelessness, which had foundered at sea, or had mistaken their position, he believed that not more than one-fourth of the entire number had been lost through stress of weather, or to which harbours of refuge could have been of any service. He warned the House that very many of the opinions and calculations in reference to harbours of refuge were based on incomplete information, and in practice would be found altogether illusory. The Government for years past had been gradually establishing really useful harbours, such as those at Portland and Holyhead, in which whole fleets could take shelter. With respect to the question of expense, he feared that the calculations of the Commission were illusory, and that the sum named would go only a short way in carrying out the scheme proposed. The north-east coast of England certainly required a harbour of refuge, but he believed if convict labour were more extensively employed, that might be economically and judiciously constructed, and the criminals themselves better disposed of than in the hulks at Bermuda. Hitherto harbours had been almost wholly improved and constructed by local enterprise, and if grants were now given to assist particular localities, he believed a very injurious influence could be exercised, and endless demands could be made for assistance of this nature. Hon. Members by supporting the present Motion ought not to be tied down to the approbation of a Report with many portions of which they disagreed. He should therefore vote in favour of the Amendment.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, I have waited very patiently, but waited in vain, to hear the opinions of Her Majesty's Government on this subject. My hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, in a very clear and convincing speech, opened the question, and in the course of it he stated that from what has passed this Session he was of opinion Her Majesty's Government never were in earnest about it. I confess that on the same grounds I have arrived at the same conclusion; and I think we have to-night a positive proof that it is a sound one. No one can deny the extreme importance of this subject or the extent to which it affects the interests of this great commercial country. There never was a question on which it more behoved the Government to form a distinct opinion; and as soon as any hon. Member had risen and made such a Motion as that which has proceeded from the hon. Member for Sunderland this evening, it was the duty of some Member of the Government to have risen and stated what their intention is. I do not know that I was ever more astonished than to see the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade sitting silent on those benches and having, in my belief, no opinion, no intention, beyond, to use a vulgar phrase, "of seeing how the cat jumps"—and either to grant this Motion if the Government cannot help it, or to resist it if they possibly can. That is the only way I can account for the strange and, I think, not very decent silence of the Government. I hold that the House of Commons and the country have peculiar claims on the Government now in office in respect of this question, because it was first agitated under the noble Viscount now at the head of the administration. It is true that it fell to me to appoint the Commission which has been referred to to-night; but why did I appoint it? In deference to the opinion of the Committee of the House of Commons, which Committee had been appointed during the period of office of the noble Lord.

I was very sorry to hear the hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), who generally addresses the House with such good sense and moderation, trying, from the necessity of adopting any line of argument by which he could support the strange Motion by which he concluded, to throw discredit on the Committee and its conduct. He said that it consisted, in a large degree, of gentlemen who were Members for outports, and who therefore had a personal interest in the question. It did not appear to occur to him who the chairman of the Committee was. It was Mr. Wilson, whom the present Government have sent out to India in a high and responsible position. Mr. Wilson drew up the Report, and an ably drawn Report it is. It was in deference to the urgent recommendation of the Committee that the late Government appointed the Royal Commission. After the late Government came into office Mr. Wilson asked questions from time to time upon the subject, and urged that no time should be lost in the appointment of that Commission. I was not reluctant. I was much impressed with the ability with which the Report was drawn up; and I was glad to have the opportunity of taking part in what appeared to me to be a great national object. I was very anxious in the selection of the Members of that Commission, and I was sorry to hear the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. A. Smith) throw blame on its proceedings. But I believe that Commission was a very great success. Whom did I place at the head of that Commission? I appointed that gallant and distinguished man who has since shed his blood at the mouth of the Peiho; and I can appeal to the two Members of the Commission, who are also Members of this House, whether the conduct of that Commission by the gallant Admiral, and the mode in which he discharged all the duties which devolved on him in connection with it, was not worthy of his high reputation and character.

These are the steps by which the question has arrived at the position we now find it—when, after receiving, in answer to repeated inquiries, only evasive statements and straggling replies, my hon. Friend has properly raised this direct issue, and asks the House of Commons to decide whether something or whether nothing shall be done to carry out the recommendations of the Commission. The Government have made no sign as to their intentions, and I believe they have no intentions. But we have this significant clue to their feelings that two hon. Gentleman immediately behind the Treasury bench have risen to move the previous question; and, with the exception of these two, and the hon. Member for Truro, not a single Gentleman has spoken to-night except in support of the Motion. Really, Sir, the course of this debate reminds me of that other memorable debate on the memorable Reform Bill, when for six nights hon. Gentleman rose in succession, with rigid impartiality, from alternate sides of the House, to give expression to the same sentiments. I have already adverted to the speech of the hon. Mover of the previous question. What were the arguments of the hon. Gentleman who seconded it? He said that storms were caused by the power of God, and, therefore we ought to do nothing to avert them. Now, when an hon. Gentleman uses an argument of this kind it is a pretty plain proof that he feels he has nothing better to say. Another of his arguments was that the finances of the country were not in a position to justify the outlay, and in this reason I suppose is to be found the cause of the hesitation shown by the Government. But what is the obvious answer to that argument. I will remind the House that the object which the hon. Member for Sunderland seeks to obtain is a great national object—no one had ventured to controvert that. Now, if we can afford to give up the duty on silks, which in such ample folds surround the persons of the wives and daughters of the middle classes—if we can afford to throw away the duties on champagne and claret, which appear only on the tables of the rich—I hope this House will not deny that we can afford £250,000 a year for the protection of this vast amount of property, and for the saving of the lives of the poor. Why the paper duty alone, which we should have lost if there had not, happily for us, been greater wisdom in other places than on the Treasury Bench—one year of the paper duty would have liquidated nearly the whole of the sum that is asked from the Government for so desirable an object as that, the expediency of which we are now discussing.

The hon. Member for Sunderland has, with great force and effect, dwelt on some of the statistics of this question. The House will, perhaps, forgive me if I touch on some others to which the hon. Gentleman slightly alluded, or which he passed over altogether. We have heard a good deal of the necessity of a harbour of refuge in the Bristol Channel. On that subject, let me remind the House of the increase of the trade at Swansea. The increase of the foreign trade at Swansea between 1851 and 1857 has risen from 60,000 tons in the former to 262,000 tons in the latter year. Is it not an urgent reason for the creation of a harbour of refuge on that unsheltered coast, when we find the trade of that one port extending with such extraordinary rapidity? And what has been the increase of our shipping from 1843 to 1857? The British shipping entered inwards and outwards during the former year was 7,181,000 tons; in the latter 13,694,000 tons. In foreign shipping the increase had been from 2,643,000 tons, in 1843 to 9,484,000 tons in 1857; so that the two put together form an aggregate increase on the fourteen years of 136 per cent. And what are the disastrous facts to which my hon. Friend has so properly called attention? In the course of the last five years the average amount of casualties that befel ships on our coast was 1000, and of this number two-fifths were a total loss. The average loss of human life exceeds 800, and the loss of property, according to the evidence of Captain Sullivan, who was anxious to make the estimate as low as possible, amounted to a million and a half a year. But then we are told by the hon. Member for Truro that all that amount of life and property will not be saved, though harbours of refuge are established. Very likely not; but let me remind the House on the other hand, that that estimate of the loss of life did not include a very touching and important part of the question—the grievous loss of life among fishermen. Let me remind the House of the frightful accounts we have had of the disastrous effects of the gale that occurred within the last fortnight. I declare I hardly ever read in the public journals a more affecting or touching story than the accounts which were published from the north of England, where some thousands of Englishmen assembled on the shore, saw ship after ship go down, and every life on board was sacrificed because there was no place of shelter near. The hon. Member for Montrose tells us that if there had been a harbour of refuge all these lives would not have been saved. Nobody says they would, and my hon. Friend (Mr. Lindsay) does not say they would; the Commission does not say they would; the Committee does not say they would. But what we and what they say is that, so far as the prudence of men can guard against the visitations of Providence, England had had, as a commercial country, she ought to have had, harbours of refuge, a large proportion of the lives who usually perish on our shores would be saved. Positive proof on such a subject is unattainable, but I think we approach near positive proof when we find that so soon as a gale threatens, the harbours of refuge formed at Holyhead and at Portland are crowded with vessels who fly there for shelter, and find it. Since the harbour at Holyhead has been formed, it has been resorted to every winter by some 200 or 300 vessels which would otherwise have been wrecking about St. George's Channel, and many of them probably lost. It is the same with regard to other harbours, and therefore it is trifling with the question to say, that if you had these harbours of refuge more lives would not be saved. Must the Government, after their conduct this year with the finances of the country, not mock the House by talking of difficulties on that score. The money they have thrown away this year would provide again and again for all that is wanted for these great national objects. I will not longer detain the House. I have stated the views I entertain on this important question, and I challenge contradiction to the conclusions at which I have arrived. I trust, if the Government does not accede to this Motion, my hon. Friend will press to a division.

Sir John Pakington

MR. MILNER GIBSON: The right hon. Baronet has fallen into an error in charging the Government with indifference to the importance of this question. The Government, considering all that has passed in reference to this question, considering the expectations that have been excited by the inquiries of a Committee of this House and the Report of a Commission, have felt it their duty to give attention to the subject, and endeavour to provide a measure which, if not carrying out the whole of the recommendations of the Commission, at any rate will make a commencement and carry out these recommendations to a certain extent. The subject was under the consideration of the Government before the Session began. But the right hon. Gentleman has to consider now not merely the general question of the advantage of having harbours of refuge on parts of the coast which are now unsheltered, but he has to consider the propriety of our passing this particular resolution on our Minutes, with a view to guide the future decisions of this House.

I understand that is the object. The right hon. Baronet, in expatiating on the great evils of the absence of harbours of refuge, mentioned two particular instances, the Mumbles in the Bristol Channel, and the great loss of life among the fishermen off Yarmouth and Lowestoft on the coast of Norfolk. In neither of those cases, if he binds himself to the Report of this Commission, will he obtain any assistance. The Mumbles scheme, which the right hon. Baronet thinks so necessary, was rejected by the Commissioners, and there is no provision in their recommendations for a harbour of refuge on that part of the coast which could be of the slightest use to the vessels suffering there from want of shelter. I mention this to show the importance of our not fettering the discretion of this House, when we come to consider the question of granting public money for harbours of refuge. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Truro put that point before us with great force. He said we are binding ourselves to a general scheme, without considering the merits of any one of the proposed works, or the amount of money they involve. Would it be just or fair to prejudice, without discussion, the claims of one particular as against the claims of another particular port, when it was a question of granting the public money? It may be well to pass abstract Resolutions, in order to indicate generally that it is necessary to do something upon a given subject. But if you pass such a Resolution as this you will bind yourselves, at the earliest possible moment, to bring in a measure to give effect to the precise recommendation of the Commissioners ["No, no!"] I confess I cannot understand the words of this Resolution to convey any other meaning, for they are—"to carry into effect the recommendation of the Commissioners to inquire into the formation of harbours of refuge upon the coasts of Great Britain and Ireland." You not only do that, but you prejudice a great number of separate questions, each of great importance; and you prejudice another very important question, as to the way in which the funds for the support of these harbours of refuge are to be provided. The hon. Member for Sunderland spoke of the harmony which prevailed between the Committee of this House and the Commission; and he quoted their agreement as an additional reason why we should bow to the authority of those two bodies. But, unfortunately, they were not in harmony. They did not agree. They differed on one most material point, and that was as to the source from whence the funds are to be derived. Whilst the Commissioners recommended that a large portion of the money should be derived from the State grants, assisted by aids from the towns and places where the harbours of refuge were to be situated, the Committee of the House of Commons recommended that three-fourths of the charge of the support of these harbours of refuge should be levied upon shipping by a passing toll, upon the principle that those who derived the benefit of them should contribute to their construction and maintenance. This is a most important difference; and I think we should be wrong to prejudge a question of such a character by passing a general Resolution that we will carry out all the recommendations of the Commission. As to the question of passing tolls, I have one observation to make. The harbour of Ramsgate is a harbour of refuge to a very large number of vessels of small tonnage, which avail themselves of it during south-westerly gales. It is supported by passing tolls. But we have at this moment a Bill before the House to abolish those passing tolls, as a burden which the shipping interest is unwilling to bear. Upon the other hand we have a Committee recommending us to establish new passing tolls for the establishment of harbours of refuge. These are difficulties attending the question; and I submit, if the Government are to consider authorities upon a question involving the expenditure of money, there is no authority which they ought more carefully to consider than that of a Committee of the House of Commons. Now, in the whole of this debate I have never heard one Gentleman hint at the idea of a Committee of this House recommending that so large a portion of expenditure upon these harbours of refuge should be borne by the shipping who are to derive benefit from them. But it ought to have been mentioned, and it is my duty, upon the part of the Government, to mention it, as a matter that must be taken into consideration by the House.

I am sorry to say that I have not found any disposition on the part of the ship-owners to contribute in the smallest degree to the support of these harbours of refuge. The chairman of the Shipowners' Society in Liverpool stated that he would rather not have harbours of refuge at all than contribute one farthing towards their construction or maintenance. This was stated before the Committee of the House of Commons, and we have never had one single application upon this important subject from ship-owners or mariners, with the exception of some recent memorials from fishermen. The applications have principally come from the localities where the proposed harbours are situate, and from persons having property, or whose interests would be promoted by the construction of these harbours in their immediate neighbourhood. It is rather discouraging, I must say, to find that the interest, for whose special benefit these harbours of refuge are to be constructed, have shown so great a reluctance to contribute a portion of the expense. It does seem to me, if harbours of refuge be necessary for passing shipping, and for the safety of our great mercantile marine, there is just as good a case why shipowners should contribute to them as they should contribute towards the support of lights, or buoys, or beacons, or any other facilities for navigation. Let me ask the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) to consider whether it is right, after what has been stated, that we should pledge ourselves, upon two most important matters—first, as to the exact mode in which the money is to be raised for the making of these harbours; and, second, the exact and particular places to which the money should be given? His ministerial experience will tell him that if he had been in office at this time, whatever might have been his own views with reference to the bringing in of a measure, he would not ask the House of Commons to bind itself deliberately by a Resolution of this character.

With regard to the cost of these harbours, as recommended, it has been, as I understand from the Report of the Committee and of the Commissioners, very much understated. The Committee recommended that in the whole about £2,000,000 should be laid out; and that it should be advanced by the Government, three-fourths being repaid by a passing toll upon ships. The Commission made an advance upon that recommendation, for they suggested that not less than £4,000,000 should be expended; but they added that probably a portion of that £4,000,000 might be obtained from local aid. No doubt Hartlepool and the Tyne would be ready to contribute a considerable sum if the Government made a contribution; but I have been informed that many of the places at which it is proposed to establish these harbours are not likely to be able to raise large sums of money for the purpose, and that the transference of their local dues would not in any way afford a security for the full advance recommended by the Commissioners. I, therefore, for one, having considered this question, believe it is wholly delusive to suppose we can obtain any considerable portion of the amount of the £4,000,000 from the localities in which it is to be spent. But if you, the House, are to pledge yourselves to the whole of this scheme, can you rely upon the estimates of it? You have never had them before you. You have never gone into the question whether the estimated expenditure has been so carefully considered and discussed as to justify the House in pledging itself to an adoption of the plan. I do not mean to say that the eminent men who have made those Estimates have not named a sufficient sum, according to the best of their judgment; but we know that when works of this kind, especially connected with water, are commenced, suggestions are made in their progress. What appears at first upon a very small scale is very apt to swell into a great one. In the case of the Holyhead Harbour you began with an Estimate of £800,000, but the probable expenditure will be £2,000,000. I therefore say that it is not at all beyond the range of probability to say that an expenditure now estimated at £4,000,000 may mount up, if you give way to all the large schemes, to £6,000,000. These are considerations which it is our duty to consider before we pledge ourselves to this Resolution.

Mr. Milner Gibson

I do not say that harbours of refuge are not desirable in themselves. There is no one in this House—and I am sure that in this I speak the sentiments of Her Majesty's Government, who more sincerely regrets the great loss of life that has taken place—probably some of it is attributable to the absence of shelter—upon the coasts of Yorkshire and Scotland. I should like to see a harbour in Wick, where the inhabitants have been prevented from making certain improvements, because they have been told that a larger scheme was under the consideration of the Government. I admit entirely that harbours of refuge might have had the effect of saving some portion of the property and lives that have been lost during the late storms; but I think an exaggerated view of their results in that direction has sometimes been taken. I have gone into a calculation of what would be the saving of life, supposing the harbour of Filey, which is the best situation for one on the eastern coast, had been in existence. I find that upon that coast during the seven years from 1850 to 1857, excluding 1855, (I do not know why the exclusion is made), there were 330 lives lost. In 1856, if Filey harbour had been made, there might have been five lives saved. This is in evidence given before the Commission. In 1857, twenty-four lives might have been saved; in 1858, three; and, in 1859, twenty-two. [Admiral DUNCOMBE: From what document is that?] It is from a careful analysis of returns from the Board of Trade. It is possible that all these people might have been saved; but the remaining lives that were lost, were lost at such a distance, and under such circumstances, that the harbour of refuge at Filey could have had no influence. The Commissioners themselves, lest the House should be misled, have distinctly pointed out how large a proportion of the losses of life and property at sea arises from circumstances which have no bearing whatever on the question of harbours of refuge. No doubt this must be so. Everybody must be aware that vessels require to be placed in the most favourable circumstances with regard to harbours of refuge in order to make them available; that there will be a vast number of ships upon an extensive coast liable to loss of property and life, though the whole of these harbours were constructed. As an illustration, I may mention that at the present moment upon the south coast of England, where there are a great number of fine natural harbours, which are better than any harbours of refuge you can construct, there is a very considerable loss of life and property. I do not know the per centage; but it was mentioned before the Committee that on the south coast something like 35 to 40 per cent of the loss of life which had taken place, had taken place there. We have no returns of sufficient accuracy to enable me to bring out an analysis sufficiently precise and certain to enable you to judge what would be the precise effects of harbours of refuge; but I, and every other man, must admit that the want of harbours of refuge, upon any coast frequented by shipping, is a great evil. It would be becoming in this country, as a great maritime nation, to do all we can, with justice to all other interests, to remedy this evil; and, on the part of the Government, I am not here to justify the putting aside of this great question ; for I entirely repudiate the notion of the right hon. Baronet, the Member for Droitwich, that the Government has any desire to evade the question, or shuffle out of it. I may state, in reference to what has fallen from the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Danby Seymour), that we have prepared a Bill to carry out some of the most important recommendations of the Commission. So far as the Board of Trade is concerned, we are not authorized to take upon ourselves to prepare a scheme for a large expenditure of public money, or to carry, in all its parts and dimensions, a great measure of this sort. That must be matter for more mature consideration ; and the state of public business during the present Session, and the number of measures with which the House has had to deal, would have prevented us from dealing with a subject of such magnitude. But we have prepared a measure for the purpose of improving existing harbours, for erecting piers, constructing harbours, and effecting those objects which the hon. Member for Poole told us were considered in many parts of the country as most important. With reference to the saving of life, it appears to me that the improvement of harbours in towns already existing, in the seats of maritime trade, must have an important effect in saving life. If we look at the wreck chart, we shall see there are groups of wrecks always to be found in the immediate neighbourhood of ports much frequented by shipping. Why is this ? Vessels arrive off the port—many of them tidal harbours—perhaps at the close of day, with heavy cargoes, the crew exhausted, and perhaps some of them sick. They all converge to a point, and loss ensues. It is, therefore, most important to create facilities for improving the entrance to those harbours ; so that when vessels arrive off them they may speedily enter, and not be driven upon the dangers of a lee shore. The Bill we are about to introduce, will have an important bearing upon this question ; and I hope the House of Commons will do us the credit of believing that we are in earnest upon this question. The Bill is ready to be laid upon the table ; and I mentioned the other night, when I answered the question of the hon. Gentleman opposite, that it should be introduced when the state of public business admitted. It is a Bill to enable existing harbours to obtain money, and to create new facilities for the purpose, through the means indicated by the hon. Member for Poole. It is not in my power to command the business of the House, or to say the measure can be passed into law this Session ; but I mention the fact that we are prepared with such a measure, and that, to a certain extent, it carries out the recommendations of the Commission. I mention this in order to rebut the charge that we have not considered this important subject, and to show that, in the opinion of the Government, it may now be dealt with.

Mr. Milner Gibson

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, that he was sorry to gather from what the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had stated that there was no intention to form harbours of refuge. As a Member both of the Commission and of the two Committees that had sat on this subject, he was able to assure the House that the Estimates had been prepared with the utmost care and deliberation. They had been drawn up by an able man, Mr. Coode, one of the Commissioners, and, as an old Engineer Officer, he could pledge himself to their accuracy. They were works of the simplest kind. Great masses of material had to be placed in a certain spot, the price was well known, and any excess on the estimates, wherein a large sum was allowed for contingencies, was almost impossible. The cost would be £250,000 a year, and, if harbours of refuge were to be made at all, they must be made on a large scale. With regard to the difference of opinions between the Committees and the Commission, adverted to by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. M. Gibson), it was simply as to the best way of obtaining the necessary funds, and that was a matter that the House of Commons itself would determine. He was quite sure that a large amount of lives might have been saved within the last few years if there had been harbours of refuge. A case came before the Commission, when not less than 700 vessels were off Flamborough Head at one time, and were many of them twice driven back, as far as the Firth of Forth, and on the second occasion several of them foundered. It was not too much to say that 1,000 vessels annually went down at sea which did not make for the shore, because their masters knew there was no place for them to run to ; whereas, if harbours of refuge existed, a very large proportion might be saved. It was not till the Commissioners found that the existing harbours could not in general be improved that they recommended the construction of others. It as, however, notorious that tidal harbours and rivers would not form harbours of refuge, because the bar prevented vessels getting in at low tide, and therefore the Tyne Commissioners intended to form a breakwater in deep water. He himself had gone down to Wick, believing that such an expenditure was unnecessary, but more fully he examined the matter there he was convinced of the necessity that the Government should provide a harbour of refuge there. Persons interested in the fishery had been anxious years ago to construct a harbour such as would answer their requirements; but, fearing that it would interfere with the formation of a larger one, the Government prevented this intention from being carried out. Years had since been lost, and he feared that responsibility attached somewhere. In each case, excellent harbours at Carlingford and Waterford could be secured; and an outlay of £75,000 on Padstow would make it fit to be entered at almost any state of the weather. As regarded the northern ports at the present moment, there were no harbours in which our ships of war could take refuge from a gale in the northern sea, without being obliged to run down as far as the Firth of Forth, and in case of war this would seriously interfere with our operations. If harbours of refuge existed at Aberdeen and Wick, this deficiency would be supplied. In the first instance, it had been supposed that the Pentland Firth might have been made use of, but many objections to it were discovered. He denied that the Commissioners had any favourite theories or pet spots; they had entered on their inquiry with a full conviction of the important trust confided to them, and with a desire of obtaining, at the least cost to the public, the greatest possible security for our marine. In every case they had what they could to induce the local authorities to come forward; and when the people of the Tyne offered to provide £50,000, they showed they were in earnest, and deserved great credit for contributing so largely to that which was not merely a local object. The same might be said of the offer of the people of Hartlepool to contribute £500,000. It was true that, as some persons thought the bight of Bay was not the best place for a harbour of refuge, because when vessels had once got in, they might be confined there for many days, the Commissioners had selected the horn of the bay, and proposed a harbour of refuge at Filey, although that was a place of no trade. But then Hartlepool, a place of very large trade, came forward and offered half a million towards the cost of works there, and that was the reason why, although Filey and Hartlepool were near each other, works were recommended at both places. He had no doubt that the work could be completed within the ten years named by the Commissioners, as there was very little fine or facing work to be done, the great portion of the larger harbours at least consisting of rubble work, which could be put together in mass. He trusted that projects so beneficial would not be lost sight of.

MR. LIDDELL said, he was sure that the country would be as much disappointed as he had been with the answer of the right hon. Gentleman. It had been complained that the Resolution proposed by the hon. Member for Sunderland was an abstract Motion, but this, he thought, constituted its chief value. This question had prominently engaged the attention of the country for years, and persons would now be confirmed in the opinion they had before entertained, that the Government did not intend to do anything. Something had been said by the right hon. Gentleman in favour of the imposition of passing tolls to defray the cost of the proposed works. But in the Committee on this subject, he had himself moved the rejection of that part of the scheme. Passing tolls was a phrase very odious to the ears of shipowners, because for many years they had been called on to contribute to the support of harbours, some of whose bars were dry, and into which at no state of the tide could a ship of more than 120 tons enter. Many shipowners, he admitted, were under the apprehension that harbours of refuge would be places where their captains might put in without their consent, and where their crews might get ashore, and various delays and expenses might arise. The only real objection made to the recommendations of the Commission was based on financial grounds. And he could not esteem that a valid objection, when the annual loss of property for want of the harbours of refuge was at the lowest estimate a million and a half of money, and the proposed annual expenditure for ten years only to prevent that great loss was no more than one-sixth of that sum. The property thus wrecked and sunk in the sea was so much taken away from the stock of reproductive capital and means of employing labour. Putting the saving of human life quite out of view, and looking at the question in the vulgarest way, as one of pounds, shillings, and pence, it was a very clear case. He must contend that the financial objection could not be a sincere one, for Parliament had during the last ten years voted no less than £2,089,000 for the two harbours of Dovor and Alderney, which could not pretend to be for the saving of life or property. Portland and Holyhead, on the contrary, were, he believed, exceedingly useful. If those who now raised the financial objection were sincere, let them refuse to spend another sixpence on Dovor or Alderney. To show that the expenditure which the hon. Member for Sunderland asked the House to sanction would be reproductive, he might mention the fact that while the cost of the Coastguard last year had been £755,000, the amount of property saved through that body was of the estimated value of £800,000; 1,200 lives having in addition been rescued through their instrumentality. The right hon. Gentleman had stated as evidence of the inutility of harbours of refuge that on the southern coast, where there were many harbours, there were also many shipwrecks. But he would remind the House that on the east coast there was no harbour of refuge for a distance of 250 miles, while one-half of all the wrecks in England occurred on the east coast, and one-quarter of them on that small portion of that coast, which represented but one thirty-sixth part of the coasts of the United Kingdom. Looking at the matter then on economical grounds, that would not be found an extravagant, but a reproductive expenditure; and looking at it in the point of view of saving human life, it was in his opinion the duty of the greatest maritime nation in the world to provide that safety for its sailors which nearly every other country took care to furnish.

SIR JOHN JOHNSTONE said, he should support the Motion. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gibson) had stated that if there were a harbour of refuge at Filey there might be a saving of five lives in the course of the year. He did not know how the right hon. Gentleman arrived at that opinion, but he thought no one who knew that part of the coast would support him in it. Two harbours of refuge ought to be formed, one to the north, and another to the south of Flamborough Head.

MR. PAULL said, he wished to observe, with reference to the Piers and Harbours

Mr. Liddell

Bill, of which he had been enabled to procure the second reading, and which had been referred to a Select Committee, that the hon. Member for Poole had, two or three weeks ago, asked the President of the Board of Trade when he would introduce the Government measure on the subject; to which question the right hon. Gentleman had replied that a measure of an analogous nature had been prepared, which he was waiting until the Select Committee alluded to had reported to bring in, thus casting upon him (Mr. Paull) the opprobrium of delaying the Government Bill; while from the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that evening it appeared that the pressure of business was so great that he had not deemed it expedient to introduce it. He might add that he had never listened to a speech which was likely to be received with more widespread dissatisfaction throughout the country than that which the right hon. Gentleman had just delivered. As the representative of St. Ives he felt very deeply interested in this subject, but he looked at the question as one of national importance, and he felt assured that the claims of St. Ives were of such importance that they must meet with consideration along with those of other ports. He found that the wrecks in the Bristol Channel in 1859 were 66, and the crews of 20 of these vessels were drowned; while in the case of six other vessels some were saved and some drowned. But if a harbour of refuge had existed at St. Ives this loss of life might have certainly been diminished. He hoped the Motion would be pressed to a division, and that it would be shown, although the Government might be remiss, the House of Commons was prepared to uphold the reports of its own Committee and the Royal Commission.

SIR MORTON PETO said, he hoped the Government would yet yield on this subject, and spare the House the necessity of a division. The mind of the Government and the country should be one with regard to it. The question admitted of no doubt; but the Government might feel they would be wrong to be hurried. There was no necessity for being so. At the same time there should be a distinct understanding that there was a sincere desire on the part of the Government to carry it out. A reference had been made that night to Holyhead, and to the estimate being so much exceeded. Why was that? It was because the plans were altered several times. When his duties called him to that part of the country during the construction of that harbour, he generally found that they were working on a plan different from that which they were working on when he paid his previous visit. They managed these matters better on the Continent than in this country. When such public questions were agitated and settled the whole thing was committed to men who thoroughly understood it. A Commission was appointed, by whom all the plans were sifted; and, instead of being a mere question of pressure of the moment they were so carefully considered that when they were once settled there was no chance of there being unsettled again. If the Government had determined to carry out these works, plans should be prepared for the whole of the harbours; they should be submitted to practical men, who should report to the Government, who should then offer the works to contractors, taking adequate security for carrying them out at a given sum. There could be no doubt of making harbours of refuge at the precise sum contracted for, just as any other public works. Nothing could be more simple. It was a mere calculation of carrying so many millions of cubic yards of stone into a given depth of water, and there was no contingency in the case which could not be estimated. He hoped the Government would feel that the country had made up its mind on this subject. Representing as he did a section of the Metropolis, he must say his constituents would see with great pleasure that this question was settled. The taxation necessary for such a purpose they would bear not unwillingly; what they objected to was taxation for which they received no value. Only last night the House had entertained the propriety of having a map of the country on the 25-inch scale, on which a million of money might be expended, whereas a quarter of a million a year for ten years was now to be considered so formidable that the Government could not face it. The country was prepared to pay a fair expenditure for the navy, the army, and public works. If the object was just, righteous, and proper, the country would find the money, and if the Chancellor of the Exchequer found himself in a deficiency next year, arising from circumstances beyond his control, instead of reproaching, they would applaud him for the public spirit he evinced in providing for such works. He had no hesitation in supporting this Motion; at the same time, as a sincere supporter of the Government, he trusted they would not put their friends to the painful position of opposing them on this question.

MR. BENTINCK said, the question before the House involved the saving of thousands of lives and millions of property. His hon. Friend (Mr. Lindsay) had remarked that the Committee and the Commission to which this question had been referred entirely concurred in their views, and that consequently nothing had been done. Probably there was no member of the House who ever heard of anything being done in consequence of the labours of a Committee and a Commission. The result of his experience had been to show the uselessness of abstract Motions, and he regretted that his hon. Friend had not brought the matter to a more practical issue. The annual amount of loss of human life was 1,000, and of property 1,500,000; but he would put all questions of that kind aside, and take it, as the Majority of the House would, as simply a question of money. Upon that ground alone it was one of the most grave questions that the House had ever had to consider. A great deal had been said about localities. There were one or two to which he wished to refer. His hon. Friend had laid great stress upon Wick. No doubt a harbour of refuge there would be of great importance to the fishermen of the place; but it was not a national necessity. The reason why so many fishermen were lost was, that they would run all risks to make their own port; but every practical man that had been near Wick in bad weather would bear him out in saying that in a national point of view a harbour of refuge there would be useless. He had always thought that the foundation of a harbour of refuge between the Isle of Wight and the Downs would be a very important national work. He would undertake to prove that more money had been wasted upon those two harbours of Dover and Alderney, within the course of the last few years, to have constructed efficiently the whole of the harbours of refuge recommended by the Royal Commissioners. They had flung hundreds and thousands of pounds sterling into the sea for harbours and fortifications at localities, the merits of which he had never heard any hon. Member in that House, except some distinguished statesmen on the Treasury bench, defend. He had heard Alderney defended by the present and preceding Boards of Admiralty. He had heard the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington), when he was at the head of the Admiralty, state that Alderney was a useful harbour for watching the proceedings at Cherbourg. Alderney was twenty-eight or thirty miles from Cherbourg, and, as a harbour of observation, it was as useless as if it were 500 miles off. The steamers that might be watching the operations of a fleet at Cherbourg would not run to Alderney, where there would be no one to whom to tell the news, but to Portland or Spithead, or wherever the fleet might be. In the event of bad weather no vessel would try to get into Alderney as a harbour of refuge, but would rather endeavour to get as far from it as possible. The fortifications in progress at Alderney were said to require 2,500 men according to some calculations, and 5,000 men according to others, to man them. But would any one tell him that, in the case of a threatened invasion, we should be likely to spare 2,500 men to garrison a barren rock, that would be perfectly useless until the war was over? The Government were therefore spending a large sum of money to construct strong fortifications that would be at the mercy of the French whenever they came to Alderney. The Government had already spent on Alderney alone £700,000 or £800,000, and the Estimates for the completion of the harbour and fortifications extended to £700,000 or £800,000 more. That would cover three years of the proposed expenditure for harbours of refuge. A scheme had been laid before the public for the construction of floating piers. He believed it was under the consideration of the Admiralty, who were about to facilitate the experiment. The projectors professed to be able by their plan to construct an efficient breakwater for an amount equal to only the interest of the principle which would be expended on a stone breakwater. The matter was, therefore, one that ought to receive the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. The question was, as he had before observed, strictly a question of money, and the only stumbling-block was that of finance. He would ask the House to recollect the amount of income voted away only a few days before for a financial experiment—he should not use a stronger word—an amount sufficient for two years of the expenditure required for the important work contemplated in the Motion of his hon. Friend. A most remarkable passage fell from the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, who always spoke with ability; but since he had sat on the Treasury bench, with considerable ingenuity. The right hon. Gentleman objected to going into details, but, as he understood his hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay), he did not want the House to be pinned to details, but to affirm a general principle. The right hon. Gentleman, however, had rather let the cat out of the bag. His right hon. Friend objected to "fettering the House in this matter," and intended to leave them entirely free "if the question is to be considered." He thought that in those last words of his right hon. Friend, the whole case of the Government was summed up. They were tantamount to an announcement to the House that the question was not to be considered, so far as the Government was concerned. His right hon. Friend asked the House not to prejudge the question. He was afraid that that was what his right hon. Friend himself had done, and that the conclusion at which he had arrived was that the Government ought not to interfere in the matter. His right hon. Friend had observed that the Commissioners asked where was the money for these harbours to be found? That was not a question for the Commissioners; it was a question for Her Majesty's Government. He had also observed that the shipowners had shown no disposition to bear their part of the expenses; but his right hon. Friend must have heard enough of the position of these shipowners to know it was reasonable that they should not be disposed to incur additional expenses. He had likewise observed that the Estimates were inaccurate. He (Mr. Bentinck) should have thought that his right hon. Friend was the last man to have touched on the question of inaccurate Estimates. It was indisputable that there was an enormous sacrifice of life and property annually through the want of those harbours. Succeeding Governments stood convicted of wasting millions of money on imaginary schemes, and when they were asked to contribute £250,000 a year for the purpose of saving that life and property, the Government threw every difficulty in the way. Under these circumstances he hoped the House of Commons would take the matter in their own hands, and support the Motion of his hon. Friend.

Mr Bentinck

Mr. BLAKE pointed out the necessity for Harbours of Refuge in Ireland, espeon the Eastern coast, along which all Atlantic traffic from Liverpool necessarily passed.

Mr. JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he thanked his hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland and would persevere with his Motion, the more so as he considered the speech delivered by the hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade upon the subject to be exceedingly unsatisfactory. He (James Elphinstone) had paid a great deal of attention to the subject, having been a member of the Committee, and having accompanied the Commission along the coast of Scotland. The case of Wick had been referred to, and he must say that to the fishing boats, 2,000 in number, making that port was one of the most extraordinary spectacles in the world. The present harbour could not accommodate them with advantage, and when it was considered that 10,000 of their best seamen manned these fishing boats, the importance of giving them protection could not be overestimated. Though Wick was not the place to select for a Harbour of Refuge, there were many considerations that ought to induce the Government to come forward in the spirit of the Commission and do something for the safety of these boats. He would recommend Peterhead as a strategic point which the Government should not overlook. It is the advanced point on the East coast, some sixty miles nearer the entrance of the Baltic than any other point on the coast; its deep bay offers great facilities for a harbour of refuge, and, in the event of war, a turning point of the coast, it is most important as a point to concentrate an advanced squadron. He would also press the claims of Filey Bay, on the English coast. The coast at Flamborough Head is strewed with the wrecks of fishermen's boats when a storm came on, because there were no means of escape for them. He regretted to hear the tone of the hon. Member for Montrose on this question. He knew that the merchants of Dundee stood aloof, but they were not backward in asking for assistance when their own interests were at stake, and yet nought they should have the last to oppose the claims of others. In 1857 five merchant ships belonging to Dundee got adrift at the North Cape, and the owners, through their representative, applied to Government and got steamers sent to their assistance. Why, then, should the merchants of Dundee oppose others when they applied for the interference of the Government? The Government admitted that there were four hundred miles of coast which they could not defend. They were about to ask the House for £12,000,000 for the defences of the dockyards, and why should not they as well ask for £15,000,000 for the construction of Harbours of Refuge. They would fill up a great portion of the intervening undefended points between their dockyards; and with the aid of a fleet of small vessels placed at these points they would be able to repel any invasion that could take place. He asked whether they ought to grudge £250,000 a year for a great object like that now proposed, when they had been throwing away their capital in the way they had done during the present Session.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I am disposed to take the hon. Baronet at his word when he says that if we ask for £12,000,000 he will give us £15,000,000. However, I can assure the House that we are as sensible as any who have spoken of the vast importance of the matter now under consideration. It is impossible for any one to have gone through the Reports of the Committee and the Commission, and to have seen the vast amount of valuable life and property which are annually lost by shipwrecks on the coast without being convinced of the absolute necessity of taking measures to provide harbours of refuge for the protection of shipping and the prevention of those disasters. Therefore, if we object to the Motion of my hon. Friend it is not in the slightest degree from any indifference upon the subject, nor from our not having made up our minds upon the matter, nor from the motives which have been imputed to my right hon. Friend (Mr. M. Gibson) that he wished to evade or to shirk the question altogether; but the reason we object to it is because it pledges the House blindfold to the whole of the recommendations of the Commission to which recommendations the present debate has shown that even those who are prepared to vote for the Motion are not prepared to give an unqualified assent. Wick is one of the points that have been adverted to. Now, is everybody agreed that Wick is a case where a great outlay should be made? The hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) says that Wick is not a place for a national harbour. Another hon. Gentleman has told us that a harbour at Wick may be useful for local purposes, but not for national uses. One hon. Gentleman says that there is no need for harbours on the south coast of England, while another hon. Member says there is the greatest need of harbours between the Foreland and Portsmouth. There is great diversity of opinion as to the different harbours, but my hon. Friend who makes this Motion calls upon the House, without consideration, without going into details, to pledge the Government to adopt the recommendations of the Commissioners in their entirety. There was great difference of opinion among the witnesses who were examined by the Commission and the Committees as to the particular localities. Some were in favour of Hartlepool, some for Filey, and some for other points. My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade has told the House that the Government have a measure prepared for the commencement, at all events, of these operations. That measure might be brought in during the present Session if the other business before the House did not seem to make it impossible to hope that it might be carried into law before the prorogation; but we are prepared to assure the House that in the next Session this matter will assume a shape in which the House will be called upon to take it practically into consideration. I will not follow the hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) into what he has said about Alderney, but I will merely observe that he has admitted that all those who have successively occupied the Treasury benches, and who from their official sources of information may be supposed to know more about the subject than hon. Members not possessed of that information, all have been of opinion that Alderney was a proper place to form a harbour. The Duke of Wellington, who may be considered a competent judge, attached the greatest importance to the fortification of Alderney in connection with Portland. But, with regard to this particular question, I assure the House that it is most unjust to the Government to state that this matter has not occupied their serious attention, that they are not fully alive to the importance of the subject, and that it is not their intention to deal with it in an efficient and practical manner. It is sufficient to know that a great number of our most valuable seamen are annually sacrificed to storms and disasters, some of whom might have been preserved were these Harbours of Refuge on the coasts. But at the same time I cannot help suspecting that a certain proportion of those calamities are traceable to ships being sent to sea insufficiently manned, or not properly found, and not in a condition to take the sea; and if on the one hand the Government is urged to take measures by providing at the public expense harbours of refuge, on the other hand I hope the owners of ships will feel the deep responsibility which rests upon them if, in order to avoid expense, they send ships to sea in a state not fit to cope with the difficulties which may arise. But not to detain the House, I can only say that I hope the House will not commit themselves to this sweeping Resolution, but will be satisfied with the assurance of the Government that this matter has received and is receiving our serious consideration, and that undoubtedly, it will be our duty in the next Session of Parliament to bring it before the House in some practical shape.

Viscount Palmerston

MR. LINDSAY, in reply, said, he was sorry he could not rest satisfied with the assurance of the noble Lord, because he could not believe the Government were in earnest, for the simple reason that they had given no proof of their sincerity. It was more than two years since the Committee appointed by the Government had reported in favour of what he asked the House to assert. It was one year since the Commissioners had reported, and nearly twelve months since his Motion had first appeared upon the paper of the House; but he had not pressed it, because he had hoped the Government would do what he conceived it was their duty to do, namely—to take the sense of the House upon the subject. There was really no difference between the Committee and the Commissioners as to essential points, and they agreed as to the necessity of establishing Harbours of Refuge. The Committee had recommended that the parties interested—the ship owners—should supply a portion of the funds in the shape of passing tolls; but the Commissioners had adopted a similar view in recommending that no grant of money should be made unless the parties interested also subscribed to the expense. If the Government had done their duty he would not have brought forward this Motion, because they had only given evasive statements; he had felt bound to ask the House to interfere. The Motion would only pledge the House to the principle of the recommendations, and not to the details; it would affirm the necessity of providing Harbours of Refuge for the saving of life and property. It was the fault of the Government that he was compelled to make this Motion, and the country was entitled to have the opinion of the House expressed upon it.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I will certainly not, after my hon. Friend has replied, attempt to enter upon the discussion of the question or reply to his reply, but there is one point upon which that reply is so calculated—of course unintentionally—to mislead the House—namely, upon what is the matter upon which we are going to vote, that I must take the liberty of calling the attention of the House to the Motion as it stands upon the paper. My hon. Friend has put a construction upon his Motion quite different from its true sense; but, if the House comes to the vote to which he invites it, it will be bound by the terms of the Resolution, and the speeches of the mover can have no effect whatever in altering the signification which its words convey. My hon. Friend says that he asks the House to pledge itself to this principle; that it is necessary to carry into effect the recommendations of the Commission or the Committee with regard to the necessity for the establishment of harbours of refuge. That is not the Motion. The Resolution says nothing whatever about the Committee; it refers only to the Commission. The Committee recommended an expenditure of two millions, the interest of three-fourths of which was to be paid out of the certain revenue of passing tolls. The Commission recommended an absolute expenditure, without any return, of two millions and a half, with a further local expenditure of a much more doubtful character, amounting to about a million and three-quarters, making a total of four millions, against two, with the source from which it is to be defrayed in a great measure uncertain. But that is not the only point. My hon. Friend says that he wants the House to affirm the necessity of establishing harbours of refuge. If he wants the House to affirm that, why did not he make a Motion to that effect? On the contrary, he moves a Motion to the effect that in the opinion of this House it is requisite to take the necessary measures for carrying into effect all the recommendations of the Commissioners. The hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) says that it is entirely wrong and absurd to lay out a shilling upon Wick, for the purpose of making it a national harbour of refuge, and he tells us in the same speech that he is going to give a cordial vote in support of the Motion of my hon. Friend, that vote being to the effect that money shall be laid out to make a national harbour at Wick. ["No, no!"] That is the grammatical construction of the Motion. [A laugh.] I am in the judgment of the House. The Resolution says that it is necessary to carry into effect the recommendations of the Commissioners, and I want to know whether it is or is not one of those recommendations that a national harbour of refuge shall be made at Wick, to a great extent with public money. That stands among the recommendations, and the hon. Member for Norfolk, who says that the recommendation is absurd, is going to vote for the Motion which declares it is necessary to take measures for carrying it into effect. The question is, whether it is wise for the House to commit itself to a Motion which at once pledges and binds it with respect to the harbours which are to be constructed, in regard to which the greatest difference of opinion exists, and with respect to the sources from which the money to be spent upon them is to be derived, the whole of which enters into and forms an essential part of the recommendation of the Commissioners. I intend strictly to observe the pledge which I gave to the House, and therefore I will not say one word in answer to the charges of insincerity which have with great levity been made against the Government by the right hon. Baronet opposite. My noble Friend has stated that the Government has a measure which they are ready to produce at the first opportunity at which they can hope to obtain for it a fair consideration, and with this statement I leave the matter in the hands of the House.

Whereupon Previous Question put, "That that question be now put."

The House divided:—Ayes 145; Noes 128: Majority 17.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved,

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to adopt, at the earliest possible period, the necessary measures to carry into effect the recommendations of the Commissioners appointed in 1858 to inquire into the formation of Harbours of Refuge on the Coasts of Great Britain and Ireland."

DIPLOMATIC SERVICE.

COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, in rising to speak to the Motion of which I have given notice I wish entirely to disclaim any intention of criticising the diplomatic appointments of the present or any other Government, still less of attempting to make a general attack upon the very respectable service with regard to which I desire that there should be some inquiry. I quite admit, and I think it is the general opinion of most persons who take an interest in the subject, that the representatives of this country at foreign Courts, and their subordinates, perform their duties very tolerably. The noble Lord the Member for Tiverton has said, before now, in this House, that they perform them as well as any body of men who are employed in a similar capacity by any other State. This may or may not be true, but it at least forms no part of my case to controvert it. I am of opinion, however, that the diplomatic service of this country, considering the prizes which it holds out, the opportunities of self-culture which it gives, and the exceptionally agreeable character of the duties which it imposes, ought to attract to it the very highest talent, and the very greatest attainments which are to be found in that large, heterogeneous, and constantly increasing class in this wealthy country, the members of which can afford to devote themselves to occupations which do not enable them to increase their fortunes. It is, however, perfectly notorious that it does not do this. Let any one take up the Foreign Office list, and see how many of the members of the diplomatic corps, from the first ambassador down to the youngest attaché, are persons who, before they entered the service, had given proof, either at our Universities, at our public schools, or elsewhere, of rare and distinguished merit. I gratefully acknowledge how much improvement has been recently effected, and that the present generation of attachés are superior to those of whom Sir Hamilton Seymour speaks in his evidence before the Committee on Official Salaries in 1850. Still nothing has as yet been done to make the service intellectually a corps d'élite. The first subject, then, into which I should wish a Committee to inquire is this:—Whether it would not be possible, gradually and tentatively—so gradually and so tentatively as not to interfere seriously with the patronage of any Minister who now sits on either of these opposing benches—to introduce the system of giving away all vacant first appointments in the diplomatic service to the most successful candidate in an examination which should stand in the same relation to the examinations now enforced, as the class do to the pass examinations at Oxford. I know it may be answered that the duties of an attaché are for the most part of a very simple kind; that you do not want a person of remarkable power to write ordinary letters, still less to register and copy despatches; but an able chief would generally contrive in one way or another to find some use for an able subordinate. I beg the House to understand that I do not by any means propose that the diplomatic service should be thrown open to competition like the Indian Civil Service. I do not think that, provided only the examination to which candidates were subjected was a judicious one, the mischiefs which most people would expect to arise would really arise from that course. I ask, however, for no sweeping change. I wish to see one attachéship—one only—every year given away by competition. I cannot doubt that after giving this system a ten years' trial, Government would find it to their advantage to extend it, but if they did not do so, nothing would be easier than to abolish the practice altogether. Anyhow, it is impossible to believe that there can be any objection to having the expediency of so moderate a proposal considered by a Committee. There is another point connected with the education of our diplomatists, to which I wish to call attention. By the recent regulations of the Foreign Office, a young man who is about to pass from the position of an unpaid to that of a paid attaché is required to prove his acquaintance with Wheaton's Elements of International Law, and History of International Law. Now Mr. Wheaton's books are very respectable and very useful books, but they are hardly sufficient to be the beginning, middle, and end of a diplomatist's training in international law. I confess, Sir, that it appears to me quite monstrous when we consider how enormously the whole modes of thought of the statesmen and publicists of Continental Europe are coloured by the jurisprudence of Rome that some seniority should not be taken, that at least the outlines of that magnificent system, and especially its terminology should be mastered by the young diplomatist. I am sure all hon. Gentlemen whose attention has been turned to this subject will agree with me, but in case I seem to some to exaggerate the importance of this branch of study, I may be permitted, perhaps, to read a few lines by the late eminent professor of civil law at Cambridge, Dr. Maine, which bear directly upon the sub-et. Nor are these remarks answered by saying that comparative ignorance of international law is of little consequence so long as the parties to international discussions completely understand each other; and, as it might be put, that Roman law may be important to the closet study of the law of nations, but is unessential as regards diplomacy. There cannot be a doubt that our success in negotiation is sometimes perceptibly affected by our neglect of Roman law; for, from this cause the public, or negotiators of other countries, constantly misunderstand each other. It is not rarely that we refuse respect or attention to diplomatic communications, as wide of the point and full of rhapsody or conceits, when, in fact, they are those imaginary imperfections simply from the juristical point of view from which they have been conceived and written. And, on the other hand, State papers of English origin, which to an Englishman's mind ought, from their strong sense and correctness, to carry all before them, will often make but an inconsiderable impression on the recipient from their not falling in with the course of thought which he incessantly pursues when dealing with a question of public law. In truth, the technicalities of Roman law are as really, though not so visibly, mixed up with questions of diplomacy as are the technicalities of special pleading with points of the English common law. So long as they cannot be disentangled English influence suffers obvious disadvantage through the imperfect communion of thought. It is undesirable that there should not be among the English public a sensible fraction which can completely decipher the documents of international transactions, but it is more than undesirable that the incapacity should extend to our statesmen and diplomatists. Whether Roman law be useful or not to English lawyers, it is a downright absurdity that, on the theatre of international affairs, England should appear by delegates unequipped with the species of knowledge which furnishes the medium of intellectual communication to the other performers on the scene. These, Sir, are eighty words, and I do trust that the Government, whether they do or do not want the Committee, will at least inquire whether they ought not to be acted on; for I am I that only a mere fraction of our existing diplomatists have ever read a page of Institutes of Gains, or Justinian. There is yet another matter with regard to which some evidence was taken before the Consular Committee; but as to which it seems desirable that we should hear something more—I mean the establishment of an Oriental College. It is strange enough that now that Haileybury is no more, we, whose connection with the East is so great, should actually have no establishment where Oriental languages are taught on a great scale. It seems hardly creditable. Every year our relations with the East are likely to increase. Every step taken either in the reform of the Turkish Empire, or, if it cannot be reformed, in its demolition, will increase our intercourse with Eastern Europe, and with Western Asia. China and Japan will become continually more important to us. The establishment of fairs in Northern India is likely, we may hope, greatly to increase our trade with the wide regions beyond the Himalaya. I do think, then, that as well for our merchants as for our consuls and our diplomatists, we should do wisely seriously to inquire whether some institution of the kind might not gradually be formed. So much for the educational part of the inquiries of the Committee. I pass to other matters. It will be in the recollection of the House that the Committee which sat in 1850 on official salaries, recommended that the number of our missions in Germany should be reduced. This recommendation was not acted upon, and most people would probably argue that in advising that there should be only one central mission, at Frankfort or elsewhere, they went too far. I confess, Sir, I think that if you so remodel your service as to have in it only persons of first-rate capacity, that I think you do well to retain your present number of missions, because every mission will then be really and truly a centre of English influence in the very highest sense of the term. If things are to be on their present footing, I am more doubtful, and I think the question might again be considered, rather more fully than in 1850, more especially with reference to the mission at Stuttgart. Then we have the question of the present mode of carrying on diplomatic relations with Rome. Might not the Report of a Committee, if in favour of any alteration of the present system, strengthen the hands of Government which wished to introduce any modification? There seems to be a common consent alike in "another place," in the press, and amongst persons who have lately been in Italy that the gentleman who at present acts for us at Rome performs his functions with extraordinary ability and with perfect success; but then it is only fair to remember that circumstances give him very peculiar advantages, and that his own qualifications are of the highest kind. Surely, without any disadvantage to the public service, the Committee which I propose might receive evidence as to whether inconvenience was experienced some years back, or is likely to be one day experienced again, by the anomalous nature of our intercourse with the Court of Rome. Another question which might be with great advantage investigated by a Committee of this House is—one to which attention was recently called—I mean as to whether the Persian mission should be under the Foreign Office or under the India Office. It will be remembered that it has been sometimes under the one, and sometimes under the other, during the course of the present century. Her Majesty's present advisers, when they acceded to power, found it in correspondence with the Indian Office. Since that time, however, by the decision of the noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government this arrangement has been altered, and it is now under the control of the Foreign Office. Now, with regard to the expediency of this arrangement there are the most diverse opinions. Some persons tell me that all the most important questions which arise in our intercourse with Persia are connected with our position in India. Others say, with equal confidence, that this is not so, and that all our most important relations with Persia are connected with the position which we occupy with regard to Russia. Far be it from me to attempt to decide which of these two views is the correct one. It is pre-eminently a question for a Committee. There is another matter which is accessory to this, I mean the question as to whether we should or should not give presents in Persia and other Eastern countries. Some say that the mission of Sir John Malcolm, who gave presents largely, produced great effect. Others maintain that Malcolm spent a vast sum of money, made much display, and did very little. They add, that although the Russians still continue to give presents, they will soon discontinue them, if they see that we are determined to do so, and ere long we shall stand just in the same position with regard to Russia at the Persian Court as we do now, and save our money. I pass, Sir, to another branch of this subject—to the expense of our embassies. Now, I am by no means a friend, as a general rule, to cutting down official salaries. It is far better policy to raise the men to the level of the pay, than to depreciate the pay to the level of the men. Put your diplomatic service on a right footing, and you may, with the utmost propriety, keep most of your salaries at their present figures; nay, you might, I am sure, with the full approbation of the country, even increase some of them. If, on the other hand, the service is to remain just as it is, I think a new Committee might with great propriety retraverse some of the ground which was traversed by the Committee on official salaries. There is one embassy, which however much you may increase the efficiency of your diplomatists, will, if the amount which is now paid is still paid, remain unless the value of money altogether changes, most scandalously overpaid. I allude, of course, to the Embassy at Paris. Let me remind the House of the exact position of this much-discussed question. In consequence of the Report of the Committee to which I have so frequently alluded, the salary of the Ambassador at Paris was reduced from £10,000 a year to £8,000 a year, but since that time it has been again raised to its former level. The noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government maintained, before the Committee on Official Salaries, that it was necessary to pay the Ambassador at Paris very highly on account of the great expense of that capital, and the propriety of the Ambassador's receiving a great many people at his house. I quite subscribe to all this, and I admit also that Paris is now more expensive than it was in 1850. What, however, is the great expense of Paris? House-rent. But the House will remember that the hotel of the British Ambassador belongs to the British Government, and has cost the British taxpayer, first and last, more than £100,000. What is the second exceptional expense of Paris? Fuel. Does the British Ambassador pay for his fuel? Not at all. That expense lurks under a convenient item—"Miscellaneous"—which we vote in the Estimates. Several servants at the Embassy are also, I believe, paid by the public. On the whole I shall not be far wrong in asserting that the salary of the Ambassador, added to his other advantages, puts him in the position of a man who has, independently of his private fortune, from £15,000 to £16,000 a year to spend in Paris, which is surely ridiculously more than what is needful. Again, Sir, it would be very desirable to have some evidence as to the expediency of continuing diplomatists for a very long time at the same Court. I confess I have great doubts about it, and some strong opinions were expressed on this subject before the consular Committee. When a man is led to consider that he will be in a particular place for a permanency, his relations with its inhabitants take insensibly a new character, and he often becomes entangled in local matters which by no means add to his efficiency as a public servant. There are a number of other questions which might be, with great advantage, reported on by a Committee. It might, for example, be considered whether there should or should not be any unpaid attachés, or whether the whole service ought not to be paid. The noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government expressed some years ago great doubts on this subject. How far, again, should the service be a close one—that is to say, within what limits ought it to be in the power of a Minister to introduce into the higher ranks of the service persons who had not gone through its lower grades. The noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs expressed an opinion on this subject before the Committee of 1850. Might we not also derive a great many useful hints, if evidence was produced before a Committee as to the diplomatic service of other countries. I have been told, for example, that the Russians endeavour as much as possible to have at their various missions persons of different kinds of excellence. Say, for instance, one man who is pre-eminently a man of society—another of letters—another particularly skilled in the routine of the chancellerie, and so on. The Swedish system has also its admirers. The Swedes, as I have been informed, consider no one below the rank of Secretary of Legation to belong, strictly speaking, to the diplomatic service at all. The attachés do the subordinate work of the Embassy, and enjoy, in return, the various advantages which their position confers, but have not necessarily a claim to promotion, and generally leave the service early. If they show marked ability, the Government has of course always the option of offering them promotion. Without, however, touching on any other questions which might be discussed, I think I have said enough to make out a good case for a friendly but full inquiry into the whole working of our diplomatic service—an inquiry at least as large as that which lately took place with regard to the consular service. It is surely a strong argument in favour of this, to say that while there have been in the course of the last fifty years several inquiries into the consular service there has never been, so far as I can learn, at any period of our history, a full inquiry by this House into our diplomatic service. The Committee on official salaries discussed only a very small part of this great subject. Some tell me that any Government will be very unwilling to grant this inquiry. I really cannot see why it should. I do not accuse any Government of improper practices. To refuse inquiry is to excite suspicion. I do not say that the service is bad, but I desire to make it admirable. There has been a great deal of talk of late years about "secret diplomacy." Some of this talk has not been wise; but it has more influence than our rulers perhaps imagine. If they want to prevent it doing evil hereafter, let them grant a full, a fair, and a free inquiry.

Mr. Grant Duff

Mr. Grant Duff

COLONEL SYKES seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the present condition of the Diplomatic Service, and the best means of increasing its efficiency."

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he was ready to acknowledge that the hon. Member had not made a personal attack upon any of the gentlemen who were engaged in the diplomatic service, but the fact which he had stated—that there was no reason for finding fault with the diplomatic service—could hardly be used as an argument for appointing a Committee of Inquiry. He believed that the proposed Committee would produce little or no result. The questions which the hon. Member had mooted were not questions to be examined by a Committee, although they might from time to time occupy the attention of the Executive Government. For example, there was no great number of persons who applied for the post of attaché, which, indeed, was not one that would generally be an object of great competition, and consequently, nothing would be gained by making it the subject of a competitive examination. Again, the hon. Member thought that more attention should be paid to the Roman law; but, without going into that matter at the present time, it might be said that there were other things required in our diplomatic service of much more importance than the knowledge of the Roman law, and, generally speaking, our diplomatic servants obtained that information which it was necessary their Government should possess, and inspired that confidence which it was desirable that Englishmen representing their country abroad should enjoy. Nor was the question whether the Persian mission should be under the Foreign or the Indian Office worth the consideration of a Committee. It was one which might be decided either way without any great risk of harm being done. The fact that no Committee had ever been appointed on the diplomatic service was a great compliment to that service. If things were going wrong let a Committee be appointed to inquire and report on the faults of the system; but if, as the hon. Member had stated, there was no fault to be found with the diplomatic service, why put hon. Gentlemen to the trouble of attending a Committee? He hoped the House would reject the Motion.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, he thought the speech of the hon. Mover of the Committee displayed great good sense and research, and if the Motion had been brought forward earlier in the Session it would have been received with considerable favour by the House. He believed that the Diplomatic Service was capable of amendment, and should be glad to see the whole system of unpaid attachés abolished altogether, but at the present late period of the Session he did not think that the discussion of that subject would be attended by any special advantage, and, therefore, he hoped the hon. Member would withdraw his Motion. The various important points raised in his speech might be considered at some future time. In the case of the consular service the appointment of a Committee was necessary, because strong representations were made and a desire for different arrangements were expressed on that matter.

MR. KINNAIRD said, that as a member of the Consular Committee, he could assure the House that upon examination the service was found to be infinitely more effective than they were led to suppose from the attacks which had been made upon it. Although the speech of his hon. Friend showed great research, he would recommend the withdrawal of the Motion.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, he would withdraw his Motion for the present, but he should take the earliest opportunity next

Lord John Russell

Session of bringing the matter more fully before the House.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MARINE STORES.—LEAVE.

MR. SPOONER moved for leave to bring in a Bill to regulate the business of Marine Store Dealers.

MR. SPEAKER said, that as it was a Bill relating to trade, it must be moved for in a Committee of the whole House.

Order for Committee read.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved,

"That the Chairman be directed to move the House, That leave be given to bring in a Bill for regulating the business of Dealers in Marine Stores."

House resumed.

Resolution reported.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. SPOONER and Mr. SCHOLEFIELD.

SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM.

COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

MR. LOWE, in moving for a Select Committee to inquire what buildings were necessary for the South Kensington Museum, explained that the collections of the Science and Art Department were first placed in Somerset House, thence removed to Marlborough House, and then carried to the building known as the Brompton Boilers. Part was now contained in an iron building, which, of all others, was least suitable, as it was not impervious to rain; part was in some offices; part was in some wooden chests, brought from Marlborough House; and part was in some house, with two walls covered with tarpauling, which was put there by the Earl of Derby's Government. Of course, some money had been spent. A sum of £15,000 had been expended on an iron building for the purposes of the Department of Science and Art, but it was used to accommodate the relics of the Exhibition of 1851, belonging to the Society of Arts. A sum of £10,000 had been spent for the Turner and Vernon Galleries, not for the purposes of the Science and Art Department, and a good and sound building erected. Another building erected at the public expense had been given up to the Sheepshanks Collection, and £10,000 had been allowed to enable the department to move from Marlborough House to South Kensington, which had been applied principally to the building of offices. It would, of course, have been quite practicable to apply for a small sum of money to patch up these buildings, but he thought the time had come when the House should inquire into the subject, cause all the facts to be laid before it, and then make up its mind as to the course it would adopt. So far from wishing to surround the matter with any secrecy, it was the object of his Motion to procure the appointment of a Committee which would go carefully into the matter and see what was best to be done. If, after due inquiry, they arrived at a determination unfavourable to this establishment, by all means let it be done away with; but let the collections belonging to the public be lodged in some place in a becoming manner. He gathered from certain indications which reached him, that there were gentlemen who desired that this institution should not be further extended; all he could say was that the subject was a legitimate one for inquiry, and that before a Committee every person would have an opportunity of giving utterance to the views which he entertained.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire and report what buildings are necessary for the South Kensington Museum."

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, the observations of the right hon. Gentleman were not at all in accordance with the notice which he had placed on the paper, from the terms of which—"to consider what buildings are necessary"—any ordinary individual would come to the conclusion that it was intended to erect more buildings at the South Kensington Museum. No other interpretation could be put upon the language than that the establishment was to be increased, though it certainly was not for its beauty, nor yet for its usefulness, if it continued to be carried on in the same spirit as at present. It afforded an illustration on a small scale of all the jobs which had ever been carried out in similar undertakings. £15,000 were expended at one time, £10,000 at another; £10,000 were laid out in removing things down there, and there was a fresh charge for putting them in their places. The right hon. Gentleman must admit that the spot was full of puddles of water, and that in every respect it was a complete failure. The wording of the proposition ought to be altered, so that the question for the Committee to determine would be whether the South Kensington Museum ought not to be done away with altogether. It was idle to talk of extending what in the eyes of a vast number of persons was a nuisance. Pictures were taken out of different galleries and put into most inconvenient places; buildings of a most unsightly character, called "the Brompton boilers," had been erected; a sum of £10,000 had been expended on a mere temporary erection, and altogether the concern was in a most woful plight. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would have no objection to alter his Motion so as to enable the Committee to consider whether the institution ought not to be done away with altogether.

MR. DILLWYN said that, agreeing in what had fallen from the hon. and learned Member (Mr. John Locke) respecting the trumpery building denominated "the Brompton boilers," he thought the matter might with advantage be referred to the Committee which was at present engaged in making inquiries with reference to the British Museum. The subject was interesting not only to that House, but to the country, and as it could not possibly receive adequate attention at that hour (five minutes to 1 o'clock), he begged to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the only effect of referring the question to the Committee charged with inquiring into the British Museum would be to preclude the possibility of any Report being made during the present Session, and would therefore be tantamount to rejecting the Motion. Although both were denominated "museums," the establishments were as distinct as if they were in separate towns, and it was not usual to vest in gentlemen who had undertaken particular duties other functions for which they were by no means prepared. He did not agree with the construction which had been put on the wording of the Motion, and he thought the language of his right hon. Friend was entirely neutral. He apprehended that it would be quite competent for the Committee, under the terms of the reference, to make any inquiry respecting the buildings at South Kensington, and if the House, before voting the Estimates wished for any information, it would be quite within its power to obtain it. But he hoped the expedient of adjournment, which seemed now to be employed in reference to every Motion which came before the House, would not be resorted to.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he had opposed the successive grants to the South Kensington Museum, and the course which he had taken was completely vindicated by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. It was but too easy to perceive that the British Museum and that at South Kensington were distinct establishments when their respective agents were seen opposing each other in a public auction room in London amid the derision of the spectators. There was a tendency to unlimited expense at Brompton, as was evinced by the largely increased stipends lately voted to the functionaries there, whose pay largely exceeded that of the officers of the British Museum—and but very trifling results had been obtained by the public. He could not help expressing his earnest desire that the Committee would not fail to inquire into the administration, for he had been told privately that if investigation were made into the mode of collection and sale of works of art, a system of jobbery would be exposed which would take the House by surprise.

MR. BLACKBURN said, he thought an inquiry should be instituted as to whether it would not be better to transfer the South Kensington Museum to the British Museum, and thus, by combining the collections, to have but one picture gallery and one museum, instead of having, as at present, several dotted about in different places. At all events the proposed inquiry was unnecessary until the Committee on the British Museum had reported.

MR. M'CANN said, that having inspected the School of Art at the Museum, he was of opinion it was calculated to do a great deal of good. He could also state that there was no room for the pictures now there, either in the British Museum or in the National Gallery. He thought the Committee should be granted.

MR. HANKEY said, he could not understand what the object of the inquiry was, and expressed a wish to know whether it was intended to have any connection with the National Gallery. Would it not embrace the Turner and Sheepshanks collections, which formed part of the National Gallery collection? But these collections had been left to the nation and were its property, and the Committee would, he contended, be placed in an anomalous position if they were to inquire where one portion of the pictures was to remain and not the other.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the Sheepshanks collection was given to the nation upon the condition that it should be exhibited at Kensington. He was willing to alter the terms of the Motion by leaving out the words "What buildings are necessary." And thus leave the Committee at liberty to consider and report generally on the question of the Museum at Kensington.

Mr. Coningham

MR. KINNAIRD said, he thought the discussion had shown the necessity of the proposed inquiry being instituted.

MR. AYRTON said, that before the British Museum Committee the proposal had been made by those who were friends of Brompton to spend some hundreds of thousands of pounds at Kensington, with no other earthly object, so far as he could ascertain, except the gratification of a few persons who used Kensington for certain purposes.

Motion and Original Question, by leave, withdrawn.

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire and report concerning the South Kensington Museum."

House adjourned at half after
One o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, June 20, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Oxford University (No. 2); Railway Cheap Trains, &c.; Dealers in Marine Stores.

2^o. Professional Oaths Abolition; Highways (South Wales); Stipendiary Magistrates; Inland Bonding.

PROFESSIONAL OATHS ABOLITION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. W. EWART, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said that the oaths intended to be abolished were unnecessary. There were a number of ancient statutes which imposed the obligation of an oath upon three professions—those of law, physic, and schoolmasters. They could be traced back to the times of James II. and William and Mary. The oaths imposed on lawyers remained. Physicians and surgeons had emancipated themselves, and with regard to schoolmasters the oaths had become obsolete. The principle of the Bill was, that in all cases where there was to judicial office, or office of trust, the professional oath ought to be withdrawn, but that where there was such office an oath should still be taken. He did not object to the oath of allegiance; but beyond that, as a general rule, no oath ought to be required. It might be said that in the oath of supremacy persons were asked to swear to an untruth, when they declared that no one had any spiritual jurisdiction or authority in this country. Putting aside the Roman Catholics, the Moravians—a body which had been regarded with great favour since the time of George II.—had a spiritual head at Herrnhut in Germany; and, therefore, no Moravian could truly make that declaration. Lord Campbell, in his Life of Lord Chancellor Harcourt, and Mr. Hallam, in his 2nd vol. of his Constitutional History, adopted the view that it would be more consonant with the dignity of the Crown that the duty of the subject should be testified simply by taking the oath of allegiance. Unnecessary oaths tempted to perjury. Those whose consciences were not sufficiently tender could violate such oaths. As the poet said—

These will recant vows made in pain, as violent and void."

If the effect of these oaths was to prevent one honest man from entering an honourable profession, it was the duty of the House to relieve him. Believing this to be a reasonable measure, he confidently asked the House to give it a second reading.

Mr. NEWDEGATE said, that the Bill had stood for the second reading about five weeks previously. The House was then very full, and he felt rather surprised when the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. Ewart) postponed it for a month, but he naturally came to the conclusion that the hon. Member did not intend to persevere with it. It now, however, appeared that he did propose to go on with it. It was a great inconvenience to hon. Members that the House should sit in the day time on Wednesday, the day on which Her Majesty held her levée, as it was impossible for a Member to attend to his duty there, and at the same time to pay his dutiful respects to Her Majesty. It was the third attempt in this Session to break up the settlement effected in 1858; but, looking to the state of the House at that moment, particularly on his own side of it (there were but two Members on the Opposition benches), he could not discuss it then, but would give notice that on going into Committee he would move that the Bill be committed that day six months.

Mr. A. MILLS said, the question was simply one of legal reform. The alteration proposed had nothing to do with the settlement of 1858, but was recommended by the benchers of the Temple ten years before, and had been supported by many high legal authorities. He regretted that the hon. Member for Dumfries retained the oath of allegiance in certain cases, but if that were thought desirable it would not, in his opinion, be a serious blot upon the Bill. Those oaths provided no real security, and only tended to degrade that sense of responsibility which persons entering professions or offices of high civil trust would feel if they were left to their own individual convictions. Instead of running any risk of imperilling that sense of moral responsibility by abolishing these restrictions, he hoped they would inaugurate a far better era in our history.

Mr. DENMAN said, of all the odd reasons he had ever heard against discussing a Bill, those advanced by the hon. Member for North Warwick were the oddest. If there was any force in them, they would lead to the conclusion that the House should not sit at all on that day. It was not true that the question had been discussed in 1858. He thought that any one who was in the habit of seeing the oaths taken in batches, term after term, in the Queen's Bench and the Bail Court at Westminster, must desire that the Bill should be passed into law. The manner, too, in which the oaths were taken before the benchers at the Inns of Court when students were called to the bar was most unseemly. He had known an instance of a most able, learned, and conscientious gentleman, and good citizen, who would not go to the bar on account of the oaths which he would be compelled to take. He thought a case had fully been made out for the Bill, and he trusted the House would agree to the second reading. With regard to retaining the oath of allegiance in certain cases, that was a question which could properly be dealt with in Committee.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: As I understand that the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) does not intend to oppose the second reading of this Bill, I cannot see that much advantage will be derived from a prolonged discussion on the present stage. With regard to my own vote, which will be in favour of the second reading, I must say that I do not attach any great importance to promissory oaths, such as are dealt with by this Bill, which cannot be made the subject of a prosecution. I do not believe that our constitution reposes for its security upon the oaths of allegiance. I dare say the House will recollect the anecdote of a French statesman who, on being called on to swear to a new constitution somewhere about the beginning of this century, remarked that that was the tenth constitution to which he had sworn in his time. The efficacy of oaths of this description may be judged of from that example. In times of disturbance such oaths are utterly valueless where the constitution does not rest, as the English constitution does, on the affections and convictions of the people. My objection to this Bill, therefore, is that it goes a very little way indeed, and that it only effects an object which, perhaps, is scarcely worth the interference of Parliament. However, I have no other objection to it, and if there are any points which require detailed consideration, the Committee will be the proper period. I trust, therefore, that the House will pass at once the second reading.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT: The value of an oath or a signature depends, of course, altogether upon the honesty of the person taking or giving it. The right hon. Gentleman has told us the story of a French statesman who had no objection to swear to any number of constitutions, and the parallel to it may be found in the anecdote, well known to all gentlemen who have been at Oxford, of the undergraduate who, when he was told on presenting himself for matriculation "You will have to sign the 39 Articles," replied "Oh, yes; 40 if you like." When you meet with persons who are ready to trifle with oaths and securities of this kind of course they cannot be of much use. I am not going to make any objection to this Bill now, but I am afraid lest in giving my assent to it I may be entrapped into assenting to a much larger measure than it appears to be on the face of it. Where we deal with matters of such importance we have a right to expect that the particular proposition before us has received proper consideration from the Government of the day. I have no doubt that the hon. Gentleman who has charge of the Bill has given great attention to it, but I hope that on the next stage the Government will be able to tell us that they have laid the matter before their law officers, and that the effect of the Bill will be confined to that which appears on the face of it to be its intention. I object myself to an oath being required on any subject but on one of the most solemn importance; but I should very reluctantly part with the power of requiring any person filling an office of any consequence in this realm to take the oath of allegiance. But, as I read this Bill it is intended to abolish the requirement to take the oath of allegiance as well as the oaths of abjuration and supremacy. I cannot tell what reasons may be offered why all the oaths should not be abolished in reference to the particular offices affected by the Bill, but at any rate we ought to have the opinion of the law officers that the operation of the Bill will not extend beyond the intent which appears on the face of it.

MR. MELLOR said, that the benchers of the Inner Temple had given no opinion on the subject of these oaths, but his own experience was entirely in favour of their abolition. Nothing could be more shocking than the levity with which they were administered and taken.

MR. HENLEY said, he agreed in the necessity of requiring from the Government the information desired by his right hon. Friend below him (Mr. S. Estcourt). The difficulty of considering the Bill was increased by the arguments of those who supported it. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State said he objected to all promissory oaths whatever; but he should like to hear from the right hon. Gentleman whether he was of opinion that the army ought no longer to take the oath of allegiance. That was a question of considerable gravity. The hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill was in favour of continuing the oaths in the case of all offices of trust, but then the question would arise what were offices of trust? As he understood that the hon. Gentleman intended to introduce considerable amendments into the Bill, he hoped that the Bill would be committed pro forma, and the amendments introduced in it before the discussions came on, so that there might not be any loss of time in discussing matters which were not really intended to stand in the Bill. As to the anecdote of the Home Secretary about the Frenchman who was so ready to take any number of oaths, he did not think Englishmen were so unscrupulous in general. In a great majority of cases they did attach importance to the oaths, even of a promissory nature, which they took.

Sir George Lewis

SIR GEORGE LEWIS explained that what he had said was, that he did not attribute any value to the general administration of the oath of allegiance to the public at large with a view of maintaining the existing constitution. He had made a remark with reference to the administration of the oath to persons holding office under the Crown, or persons in the army, either of whom were affected by this Bill.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, he would support the Bill. He thought that the danger which the right hon. Gentleman opposite had pointed out was amply guarded against.

Bill read 2^o, and committed for To-morrow.

AGGRAVATED ASSAULTS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

VISCOUNT RAYNHAM moved that the House go into Committee on this Bill.

Motion made and Question proposed, That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, he rose to move that the Bill be committed that day three months. The argument in favour of the Bill was, that the existing Act had failed; but the returns which had lately been laid on the table, showed that the present law on this subject was not inoperative, and that the powers possessed by the magistrates were sufficient. It appeared that in the last five years 123 cases had been disposed of at the City Police Courts by convictions, with from one to six months' imprisonment; at Bow Street, 75; at Clerkenwell, 301; at Lambeth, 121; at Marlborough Street, 141; at Marylebone, 101; at Southwark, 289; at the Thames Court, 153; at Worship Street, 264; at Finsbury and Wandsworth, 69; and at Greenwich and Woolwich, 220. The punishments in those cases varied from one to six months' imprisonment. But even granting that the law had failed, would the means proposed by the Bill have any effect in repressing the offence? There was difficulty enough at present in getting prosecutors to come forward; but that Bill would infinitely increase that difficulty. Was it all likely that, after being subjected to the brutal punishment of flogging, the cruel husband would return to his wife and behave better? The only petitions which had been presented in reference to the Bill were presented by the women of England against it. All our legislation of late years had been of a humanizing character; and a strong feeling had grown up lately, in reference to the use of these punishments in the army and navy, that they did not repress offences, but merely brutalized those on whom they were inflicted. But even granting that all the arguments which he had advanced were unsound, the Bill, as it stood, could not be carried into operation. The third clause gave a power of appeal to Quarter Sessions, with the privilege of being held to bail. Of course, everybody sentenced to this punishment would appeal. The first thing a man would do, when he was bailed, would be to wreak his vengeance on his unfortunate victim, and then take himself off altogether. For all these reasons, he should move that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

Amendment proposed,

"To leave out from the word 'That' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee'"

—instead thereof.

MR. HARDY said, he rose to second the Amendment. If they were to be guided by their feelings merely in these matters, there was no one who would not "— put in every honest hand a whip

"To lash the rascals naked through the world" who were guilty of such outrages. But the questions to be asked before legislating further were, had we a right to inflict a barbarous punishment like this, was it likely to repress the offence, and was there sufficient proof that the present law had been inoperative? From a return moved by the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Alderman Salomons) it appeared that at Bow Street, where the best among the Metropolitan magistrates were usually stationed, of twenty-four convictions for wife beating which had taken place during the last five years, a sentence of six months' imprisonment had only been imposed in a fourth of the cases; and of fifty-one assaults on other women in three instances only had this punishment been inflicted. The law had not even been stretched to its utmost limits in these nine cases out of a total number of seventy-five, as the magistrates had power to require, at the expiration of the sentence, that the offender should be bound over to keep the peace for an additional period of six months. At the Thames Police Court, out of 153 convictions, only twenty of the offenders had been sentenced to six months' incarceration. At Worship Street Police Court the proportion was greater; sixty-seven out of a total of 264 having undergone this lengthened imprisonment, but the number of those sentenced to hard labour was steadily diminishing. It must be borne in mind that the magistrate, if he conceived the case was one that called for severer penalties, could send it for trial before the Sessions Court, where the accused would have the benefit of having his case heard by a jury. It was unwise, he maintained, to place in the hands of a single person the uncontrolled exercise of a power which might be harshly employed in one of those moments of indignation to which every man was liable. He might add that no Metropolitan magistrate asked for these additional powers. He had obtained from Mr. Shepherd, the manager of the House of Correction in the West Riding, some particulars relating to the effects of corporal punishment as at present applied. In thirteen years previous to 1852 it appeared that 256 persons were committed to that prison, part of whose sentence was that they should be whipped. Of these 156 returned to prison in seven years afterwards, being at the rate of nearly 61 per cent. It was, therefore, plain that they were not deterred by this punishment from their evil courses. Of 40,223 persons committed under all sentences, 11,294 returned in seven years, being at the rate of 28 per cent. This showed the effects of mere imprisonment accompanied by good reformatory discipline, and ought to make the House pause before extending the punishment of the lash. The existing law had not yet been carried out in all its severity, and, if the punishment were now increased as proposed, he doubted whether women would be found to proceed against those by whom they were so cruelly beaten. Brutal as the offence undoubtedly was, the great object of the House must be to secure certainty of punishment, and he therefore felt anxious to prevent a course of legislation which their feelings might naturally lead them to pursue.

MR. PAULL said, he had come down to the House with the intention of moving the Amendment which had been more ably moved by the noble Lord. He should, therefore, give him his cordial support. He objected to the Bill, both on account of its principle and its details, and he criticised its provisions with a view of showing that, even if the House were to sanction the punishment of whipping, which he regarded as ineffectual, there were defects in the measure which must prove fatal.

Mr. Hardy

MR. W. EWART said, he would remind the House that petitions had been presented by those whom it was sought to protect, complaining of the degrading punishment which it was proposed to legalize. He had been assured by one of the ablest of the Metropolitan magistrates that the power of appeal in itself would defeat the provisions of the Bill, from the fact that the husband held the purse-strings. Believing that punishments of undue severity created a reaction in the public mind, he should, on mature consideration, vote against the further progress of the measure.

COLONEL NORTH observed that he would never consent to place in the hands of a single individual the power of flogging a fellow-creature. So much was he opposed to flogging, even in the army, that if he thought any one man could do away with it, he would abolish it altogether.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the principle which animated the House was the honourable and manly desire of preventing husbands from brutally maltreating their wives, but it was necessary to pause before they adopted the proposition embodied in the Bill of the noble Lord. That measure was framed on the simple principle which had guided our ancestors, who, when they found a particular crime becoming prevalent, increased the stringency of the law, so that ultimately our criminal code became noted for its severity. But the policy which had been adopted of late years, and which had proved more successful in the repression of crime, was to mitigate the penalty. At the beginning of last century whipping was a common punishment, and his noble Friend now sought to revive its popularity. There were other punishments which some persons, in their indignation against brutal husbands, might invite them to re-establish, such, for instance, as that of the pillory, where culprits, with their ears cut off, were made to stand. A satirical poet touched in a well-known couplet on the treatment of offenders in the last century, and of the feelings with which such spectacles were regarded:—

“ Earless on high stood unabash'd Defoe,
And Tutchin flagrant from the scourge below.”

Since the occasion on which this subject last engaged the attention of the House he had consulted the magistrates, and found them almost unanimously of opinion that, so far from diminishing, the tendency of the noble Lord's Bill would be to increase these brutal assaults. In reply to questions put by him, Mr. Hall, the chief magistrate of Bow Street, whose opinion was naturally entitled to weight, stated that the crime of beating wives had decreased. The number of cases heard at the several police courts from the 1st of May, 1858, to the 1st of May, 1859, amounted to about 192; and from the 1st of May, 1859, to the 1st of May, 1860, to 142, showing a diminution of 50 cases during the latter period. During the year ending the 1st of May, 1860, the maximum punishment of six months was not usually inflicted. In 142 cases then heard 19 offenders were sentenced to imprisonment for six months, 18 for four months, 31 for three months, 36 for two months, 29 for one month, and in the remaining cases the punishment varied from six weeks to seven days. In the same period, in addition to imprisonment, bail was required for six months in 6 cases, for four months in 1 case, for two months in 2 cases, and for one month in 1 case. It was, therefore, evident that the power of requiring recognizances, which in many cases would amount to an additional term of imprisonment, had been rarely exercised. As the noble Lord, in the new edition of his Bill, had omitted the provisions relative to a minimum of four months and a maximum of eight months' incarceration, it was unnecessary for him to trouble the House with the opinions he had received on that point, but he should like to read the answer given to the fourth query by Mr. Hall:—

"I am clearly of opinion, and I believe that every police magistrate so thinks, that it is not desirable to inflict flogging for first or second offences. My strong belief is that the existence of such a power would defeat the object in view. Even under the present Act wives reluctantly complain; but if husbands are to be subjected to corporal chastisement and long imprisonment there will be a very general disinclination to appeal to a magistrate. At present, by the interference of friends or otherwise, a reconciliation may be effected between husband and wife upon his liberation from prison, but the infliction of the degrading punishment of flogging will, I fear, destroy all chance of a renewal of kind feeling. Offenders having been whipped will probably quit the prison animated by intense and implacable hatred of their wives, whose lives may, perhaps, be placed in great peril. The more I reflect on the subject the more opposed I am to the infliction of flogging. The decrease I have mentioned during the period of a year is strong evidence of the sufficiency of the powers given by the present Aggravated Assaults Act, and I beg to call attention to the fact that only in ten cases did the magistrates consider it necessary to require bail over and above the imprisonment adjudged, and further that in no more than nineteen instances was imprisonment imposed to the extent of six months."

A letter, very much to the same effect, had been received from Mr. Paynter, also an experienced magistrate. Under the circumstances, and however much they might respect the motives which had induced the noble Lord to bring forward his Bill, it could not fail to be regarded as a mistaken and retrograde policy; and if the noble Lord still pressed the measure on the attention of the House the only course which could be adopted was to vote in favour of the Amendment.

MR. BONHAM-CARTER said, that he could not agree with all the alterations that had been made in the Bill, but he held that on a former occasion the House had unmistakably expressed its opinion in favour of the principles contained in it. The question was not merely as to the severity, but as to the applicability of the sentence. A man who was bound by all the laws of religion, not to speak of the ties of affection, to use the great physical power which he possessed for the protection of his wife, had no right to inflict torture upon her, and to keep her in a state of subservience and fear. A man who did so was worse than a brute, for no instance was found in the animal kingdom where the female was treated with that brutality which Englishmen were believed in foreign countries to exercise towards their wives. The punishment for such offences inflicted by the existing law was felt, perhaps, with even greater severity by the wife and family, whose means of support were withdrawn when the husband was put in prison, whereas the dread of a punishment, short but ignominious, might exercise a deterrent effect over that brutal class of men who could not be regarded as adults, but as grown-up and ignorant children. The arguments which they had heard urged against the principle of the Bill applied simply to the cases of women who had already suffered from their husbands' brutality; but they should also consider the vast number of women whom such an enactment as that before them would protect in future from violence and unmanly assaults. He was not in favour of inflicting the punishment of flogging for a first offence, but as that point was a matter of detail, it could be amended in Committee.

MR. DEEDES said, whatever the feeling of the House might have been on the second reading, the feeling was strongly against the Bill at that time; and he apprehended the cause of that was that the House, however anxious to put down this brutal crime, had calmly considered the proposed method of doing so, and had come to the conclusion that it would not be effective. He wished to call attention to the anomalies of the appeal clause. It appeared while that appeal was pending the offender might be liberated on bail. Of course he would go home, and he (Mr. Deedes) would like to know what sort of life the husband and wife would lead while waiting for the hearing of the appeal. He believed that no bench of Magistrates would confirm the punishment of flogging on appeal. He had no morbid horror of flogging, and he was not prepared to say that it should not be continued in the army or employed in the case of young culprits, but he believed that in this instance the noble Lord would fail in his object; and he would suggest to him to accept the general feeling of the House and withdraw his Bill.

MR. PULLER said, he was of opinion that to inflict the punishment of flogging for the first offence which a man might be betrayed into committing in the heat of passion would be somewhat too strong a measure, but there was some reason to suppose that corporal punishment was the only form of punishment which would prove efficacious in the case of the individual who was in the habit of repeating the offence. In the early part of the present reign, when several cases of assault, or threatened assault, on Her Majesty took place, the Government of the day, instead of bringing in a Bill to make the offence high treason, passed a law under the operation of which the first person guilty of the offence might be whipped, and the result had, he believed, been that there had been since no repetition of it. The House had been told that the punishment provided by the existing law had not been carried out except in a very few cases, but that was accounted for by the magistrates knowing that the long imprisonment of a husband was generally followed by the wife being sent to the workhouse. The actual result of the law as it stood was—that within the last five years 375 persons had been committed for aggravated assaults on women, one-third of such assaults being on wives. Looking, however, at the Bill before them, he could not think that such a punishment as that proposed should be inflicted at the discretion of any single magistrate. They might, however, safely be entrusted with the power of sending cases to the Quarter Sessions, and the Quarter Sessions might then inflict the punishment in question.

Mr. Deedes

MR. BRADY suggested the withdrawal of the Bill, and the introduction of another empowering the Magistrate to send the cases with which the Bill proposed to deal to the Quarter Sessions.

VISCOUNT RAYNHAM replied, it could surely not be said that the present law was effective when under it an aggravated assault took place every day in the Metropolis alone. He admitted that the lash was a degrading punishment, but it was intended for a degrading offence. He referred to the adoption of flogging as a punishment for assaulting Her Majesty, and he contended that the House ought to consider every woman as worthy of protection as our gracious Sovereign. If the House would allow the Bill to go into Committee he would propose such alterations as would prevent the offenders being at large during the pending of the appeal, and would not give a power of appeal against the flogging only, but against the sentence altogether. He was willing to withdraw the Bill if the Government would agree to support a measure for the infliction of the same punishment on the sentence of the Quarter Sessions.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 57; Noes 174: Majority 117.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Bill put off for three months.

VALUATION OF LANDS (SCOTLAND) ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. BLACKBURN, on moving the second reading of this Bill, stated that its object was to amend the Valuation Act which had been passed in 1854. The Act only provided for the gross value, and the present Bill sought to amend it in providing that the net value should also be found, in order that all assessments should be made on it. He regretted that he had not seen the Bill of the Home Secretary in reference to the valuation of England and Wales, but he believed there could be no objection to this measure.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read a second time."

SIR WILLIAM SCOTT said, that there were clauses in the Bill to which great exception must be taken. He considered that if the Bill were passed, great confusion in the mode of valuation in Scotland would be introduced.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, this Bill was one of considerable importance, as its operation would affect the interests of all persons resident in Scotland, and alter the basis of the present valuation of property with reference to all local taxes, or at any rate a part of them, and in that indirect manner the Bill would have a bearing upon the Parliamentary and other franchises. So far as he understood the statement of the hon. Gentleman, it was this:—The Scotch Valuation Bill established a basis which was different from that established by the English law, namely, a gross rental as opposed to a net rental, without the deductions specified in the second section of the Bill. Those deductions were allowed by the English law, and the Bill which he (Sir George Lewis) intended to introduce, and which would shortly be in the hands

Members, merely recognized the existing law, and introduced no new principle with regard to valuation. This Bill sought to alter the law as fixed by the Act at present in force in Scotland, and substituted a rateable value with deductions, instead of a rateable value identical with the gross rental. He was not prepared to say that such an alteration might not be desirable; but he wished to point out to the House that all those changes with regard to the incidents of taxation, affected existing interests, and gave rise to a great difference of opinion. In the absence of the Lord Advocate, he felt great diffidence in expressing any opinion upon the subject. He thought it would be more satisfactory to the House, before coming to any decision, that they should hear any opinion which he might have to express upon the matter. If the House should agree to the second reading, he trusted it would be understood that upon the Motion for going to Committee it would be open to the Lord Advocate to express an opinion unfavourable to the Bill, in case he should have formed one.

MR. BLACK said, the objections taken to this Bill were well-founded. He thought the Bill would introduce great confusion into the present mode of valuation in Scotland, which he believed was to be much commended. The proposed mode of assessment would involve many disputes which might be avoided by taking the gross valuation. Under the mode of assessment which the Bill would introduce a man might be a voter one year and yet have no right to a vote the next year. He believed that the Bill would only tend to introduce confusion and difficulty, and he therefore moved that it be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word 'now,' and at the end of the Question to add the words, 'upon this day three months.'

MR. CRAUFURD seconded the Amendment, because it did not appear that any hardship had arisen from the present mode of valuing, to which people were accustomed, and no grounds had been shown for making this change. The effect of the Bill would be to disfranchise hundreds of electors throughout Scotland, as was stated in a petition that he had presented from the town council of Ayr, and in that town alone he believed a hundred would be disfranchised by it. The existing arrangement worked very well, and it was unnecessary to disturb it.

MR. MURE said, the general object of the Bill was to introduce a general principle of valuation in Scotland, and as he believed they were all willing to establish that principle, he hoped they would assent to the suggestion of the right hon. Baronet (Sir George Lewis) read the Bill a second time, and consider its principles, and amend its details in Committee.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (who was by this time in his place) said, that when the Valuations Bill of 1854 was under consideration, the Select Committee, including the late Mr. Hume, took much trouble with the question whether the assessable value, or the gross value, should be adopted, and it was found impossible to frame a schedule of deductions for repairs, insurance, and other expenses of property, besides rates and taxes. That idea was therefore abandoned, and the gross value was taken as the only practicable scheme. But the hon. and learned Gentleman now proposed to re-open the whole question, and so far from his Bill producing uniformity, it would produce discrepancies all over the country, if an attempt were to be made by the local authorities to estimate the probable average annual amount of those charges. The result would be that they must either have a special estimate of the annual cost of repairs for each property, which would be too cumbrous and laborious to be attempted, or else the new valuation would be a mere assemblage of averages, none of which would correctly give the real value. The effect of such a system might also be to exclude from the election roll some men whose qualifications entitled them to be placed upon it. It was true that in Ireland a system of net valuation existed, but there it was carried out by a Government Board on an uniform system, whereas it would be left by this Bill before the House to the Commissioners of Supply in each place. In his opinion the gross valuation was practically the more useful system of the two, the actual rent paid being taken as a basis for it. One clause of the Bill, relative to the valuation of crops, might perhaps not be objectionable; but as the present system worked, upon the whole, to the benefit of the country, it was better to leave it as it stood.

Mr. BLACKBURN, in reply, denied that the Bill proposed to introduce any new principles. The Valuation Bill was only brought in in 1854, and it introduced a very erroneous system—a system so erroneous, indeed, that it could not be carried out under the Bill itself. He maintained that the principle of his Bill, which was to assess on the net value, was the only fair and just one. It prevailed in Ireland, and was about to be adopted for England. The present system was peculiarly hard on railways, which were assessed on gross value in the parishes through which their lines passed, and great litigation was the consequence in order to secure a fair deduction for maintenance of the way. He would suggest that they should agree to the second reading of the Bill, and postpone the Committee until they had been made aware of the provisions of the English Bill, which the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary was about to introduce. If the principle of that Bill proved to be assessment on net value, then let the principle be also applied to Scotland; if it were not, then the House could reject the present Bill.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 69; Noes 116: Majority 47.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Bill put off for three months.

The Lord Advocate

FELONY AND MISDEMEANOUR BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. DENMAN, in moving the second reading of this Bill, explained that its object was to assimilate the proceedings on trials for felony and misdemeanour to those on trials at Nisi Prius, as far as related to the regulation of addresses to the jury. Its object would be more easily seen if the House would permit him in a few words to review the successive amendments of the law with regard to criminal procedure, and the facilities allowed to prisoners for their defence. It was only during the last century that a prisoner had been first allowed to examine witnesses upon oath. The denial of that right was an anomaly which had existed for centuries, and the strongest reasons given for its continuance were no better than this—that if the witnesses were not examined on oath they would be "able to speak more largely and beneficially for the prisoner." It was not until the reign of Queen Anne that an act was passed to allow prisoners to examine witnesses upon oath. After that, even down to the year 1836, the state of things remained anomalous and strange; for whereas in cases of misdemeanour prisoners had always been able not only to call their sworn witnesses but to employ counsel to argue their cases before the jury, in cases of felony it was not till 1836 that a Bill brought in by the hon. Member for Dumfries was carried to allow counsel to be heard for prisoners. That was resisted for a long time by Judges and other lawyers of great authority. Lord Lyndhurst was one who opposed it at first, though he afterwards became converted; however, the law was at length altered, and a great amendment it had proved. It was curious to remark that before 1836 the offence of treason as well as that of misdemeanour stood upon a different footing from cases of felony, for by an Act of William and Mary the prisoner on his trial for treason had a right to call upon the Judge to assign to him any two counsel whom he chose to name. By the construction of that Act, which had prevailed almost ever since it was passed, a prisoner in a case of treason had also a further advantage, for it was held that his counsel might not only open the case for his defence, and then call evidence, but comment afterwards on that evidence, and set right anything that might have been set wrong in cross-examination by the prosecuting counsel, and so leave his case for the prosecuting counsel's reply and the summing up of the Judge. Such had been the law in cases of treason ever since William III., and at first a still more liberal privilege was given, because two speeches were allowed to be made by each of the prisoner's counsel, namely, before and after the witnesses were called. But in trials at Nisi Prius on the Civil side, until 1854 what was the state of the law? The plaintiff's counsel might open his case, and then call witnesses; and then, if the defendant did not call witnesses, the counsel for the plaintiff had no opportunity of speaking a second time; but if the defendant's counsel did call witnesses then the plaintiff's counsel might reply, while the defendant's counsel could only speak once, namely, in opening his case. That gave an unfair advantage to the party who had the last word, the other party not being permitted to sum up his own evidence. The Commissioners for the amendment of the law therefore recommended an alteration; and, in 1854, an Act was passed, of the working of which they had now had six years' experience, by which, in Nisi Prius trials, if at the close of the statement of the plaintiff's case the counsel for the defendant did not announce his intention of calling witnesses, the counsel for the plaintiff was allowed to address the jury a second time after his own witnesses had been called, to sum up their evidence, and the defendant's counsel had the last word; but if the defendant's counsel chose to call witnesses, the defendant's counsel made a second speech after the defendant's evidence had been produced, commenting upon the defendant's case, and the plaintiff's counsel then replied in order to explain and sum up what had been said by his own witnesses. The effect of the new practice had not been to lengthen trials in any considerable degree. On the contrary, a great deal of time had been saved through the prevention of much fruitless cross-examination of witnesses, as well as of those lengthened anticipatory observations which counsel, not having the right of reply, were obliged to address to the jury, in order to meet every conceivable turn which the case was likely to take. From not being allowed to sum up the whole of the evidence at the close, the prisoner's counsel were frequently deterred from calling important witnesses, merely because they could not tell what might be the effect upon the jury if these witnesses were shaken on some immaterial part of their testimony. Such a state of things operated most prejudicially to the due administration of justice, and the Judge was sometimes compelled by it to take upon himself the functions of an advocate. The evil would be remedied by conceding to counsel on both sides the right of being heard after as well as before they adduced their evidence, in the same order as was now adopted with so much advantage at Nisi Prius. He believed he had sufficiently presented the case without going into all its details. He considered it to be a very strong one, and the only point he would further refer to was the principle which some contended for—namely, the right of the counsel for the prisoner always to have the last word; but as that was a point which had been fully argued during the discussion of the Prisoners' Counsel Bill in 1836, when a sort of compromise was entered into, he saw no reason for further discussing the matter in relation to the present Bill. He left the Bill in the hands of the House, and he hoped they would pass it as an improvement upon the present law.

MR. HARDY said, he did not intend to oppose the Motion, although he was not so sanguine as the hon. and learned Mover, about the benefits to flow from this measure. There was not a perfect analogy between civil and criminal cases, counsel being generally employed on both sides in the former class of cases, while in the vast majority of the latter the accused was undefended. The unfortunate prisoner who had no counsel was placed at a great disadvantage by his own unfitness to cross-examine witnesses; and to prevent injustice from being done him, the Judge had sometimes to put himself in the invidious position of being, as it were, his advocate. When the counsel for the accused was deterred from calling witnesses, it was generally because he had serious misgivings as to the value of their testimony, and the mere right of making a speech would not enable him to prop up a bad case.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he thought the House would do well to assent to the second reading of the Bill, though he must admit that there was considerable force in the argument of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Hardy), that the analogy between the proceedings in civil and criminal cases was not quite so close as was imagined by the hon. and learned Gentleman who moved the second reading of the Bill. But although there might be objections to the details of the Bill, yet even that was no reason why they should not apply a principle that helped to elucidate the truth in matters affecting property to the certainly not less important interests of life and liberty. With regard to the objection that inconvenience would arise from prolonging the duration of trials, he believed the House would place very little stress upon it when the object was to secure the more complete administration of justice. His own opinion was that the provision sought to be made by the Bill would prove most advantageous, and he should vote for the second reading on the general ground that the learned Commissioners on whose recommendation the change was made in civil procedure based their recommendation upon the conviction that the change was required to ascertain the truth, and it followed in the main that what was expedient in one case for the attainment of that end would be found expedient in the other.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he was of opinion that when the prisoner's counsel called witnesses he should have the right to a second speech. At present the prosecuting counsel had both the first and the last word; and if the prisoner's counsel were not permitted to sum up, and explain any defect observable in the manner in which a witness gave his testimony, he would probably be induced to abstain from calling witnesses at all. His own experience in his present office taught him that prisoners having defences that might fairly be submitted to the jury were deprived of the benefit of them, from the fear lest one of the witnesses might break down, and therefore the counsel employed refrained from calling him. If the defending counsel could make a second speech his motive for withholding the prisoner's case from the Court would often be removed. It was, however, a question whether the prosecuting counsel should be allowed a second speech. Where the prisoner was undefended he did not think that was at all necessary. The witnesses for the prosecution in that case would not be cross-examined; and, therefore, if anything in their testimony required explanation, the Judge could point it out to the jury.

MR. MONTAGUE SMITH said, he should support the Bill, as he thought it most important that after the evidence had been given, and perhaps shaken in cross-examination, the prisoner's counsel should have the opportunity of summing it up and explaining the discrepancies. He thought, however, that where there was no counsel for the prisoner there was no reason why the prosecutor's counsel should have a second speech. Perhaps in the case of prisoner's counsel the Judge might have a discretion as to whether the second speech should be made or not. He did not support the Bill, because he thought that in the existing state of the law the Judges failed in their duty of holding the scales of justice fairly and impartially, but because he believed that the Bill relieved the Judges of a certain responsibility now thrown upon them, but which they ought not to bear.

The Solicitor General

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, he thought that if this Bill was passed, the Court would be bound in all cases to assign counsel to a prisoner, which would so lengthen the proceedings at quarter sessions as to render necessary the appointment of stipendiary chairmen in all counties.

MR. COBBETT said, he believed that the Bill would work with great advantage in many cases to both the prosecution and the prisoner. He should vote for the second reading, and he trusted his hon. and learned Friend would accede to any modification of the measure which might be deemed necessary, when the House went into Committee.

Bill read 2^o, and committed for Tuesday next.

ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSION, &c., BILL.

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on the Amendment proposed to Question [6th June],

“ ‘ That the Bill be now read a second time ;’ and which Amendment was, to leave out the word ‘ now,’ and at the end of the Question to add the words ‘ upon this day six months.’ ”

Question again proposed “ ‘ That the word ‘ now ’ stand part of the Question.”

Debate resumed.

MR. HENLEY said, he would remind the House that the principle upon which the Bill before them had already been assented to, both by that and the other House of Parliament. The hon. and learned Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Selwyn), however, who had moved the Amendment, had not only objected to the scheme embodied in the Bill, but had set up a counter-proposition; and had made charges against the Commissioners which, if sustained, would raise a grave question, not only whether new duties should be imposed upon them, but whether the duties which they now discharged ought to continue to be intrusted to them. Fortunately, the hon. and learned Gentleman had confined his argument to a very narrow issue. He had raised no question as to the amount of the incomes paid to the Bishops or Chapters, nor had he made any charge against the Commission arising out of the sale and purchase or letting of estates, or the erection or repair of buildings. The only complaints he had made against the Bill were, that it would extend a system of centralisation, and would render necessary a heavy amount of compensation. He also characterized it as a measure of confiscation. Centralization, compensation, and confiscation—these were ugly words, and ought to be well supported. His hon. Friend, however, endeavoured to prove his case in a somewhat singular manner. In the first instance, he said that centralization must carry with it bad and expensive management; and, to prove that that had been the result in this case, he instituted a comparison between the rental of the estates in the hands of the Commissioners and the expense of their management. He stated the annual rental of the estates at £173,000. At first, he (Mr. Henley) could not find these figures; but he ultimately discovered that they were not in the statement of the Commissioners as to the income for the year 1859—to the Report for which year the hon. and learned Gentleman otherwise confined himself—but were quoted by the authorities appointed by the Treasury, and referred to the year 1858. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that the annual rental was £173,000, and the expenses of management £43,000. That, if true, was a formidable charge; but was it well founded? To arrive at that amount the hon. and learned Gentleman had added together the totals of five accounts. The first of these was the Common Fund income account, the office expenses of which, with some small surveying and legal expenses, amounted to £13,000, but which had as much to do with the rental of the estates as it had with the Pope of Rome. The next was the Common Fund general account, in which surveyors' and lawyers' expenses stood at £6,400; the third was capitular leaseholds, £490; and the last was Bishops' and Chapters' commuted estates, £12,922. When they looked at the accounts Nos. 1 and 4, it was clear that the expenses charged in them were largely increased through the purchase and sale of the vast amount of property with which the Commission dealt; how, then, could the hon. Gentleman charge them as agency expenses upon the rental of the estates? [Mr. SELWYN dissented.] His hon. and learned Friend shook his head, but that was what he had done.

MR. SELWYN explained that he had not said that the sum of £43,000 was paid out of the rental, but had only contrasted the rental with that and two other sums—namely, £404, which the Commissioners gave to local charities, and £809,000 which they spent on the endowment of churches.

MR. HENLEY said, he must remind the hon. and learned Gentleman that his words were, "There could be no question that the management of estates by a central body was enormously expensive. The simple expense of management amounted to no less than £43,000." The hon. and learned Gentleman might not have intended to produce the impression that that sum was expended for the management of estates of which the rental was only £173,000; but that was the impression which those words conveyed to his mind, and he believed also to those of other hon. Members. His hon. and learned Friend had said not a word about the purchase and sale of estates, but the last Report of the Commissioners stated that the value of the fee simple of the property sold and purchased during the year amounted to no less a sum than £1,000,000; so that it was no wonder that these solicitors' and surveyors' charges had been rather high. Nevertheless, during the same year, they had paid over a balance to the Common Fund of no less than £100,000 in money.

To return to the rental account. The gross rental for the year 1859, including arrears, instead of £173,000, amounted to £218,000. The net rental was £184,000, while the charge for management was in reality only about £10,200. So that instead of a charge of £43,000 upon an income of £173,000, it turned out to be for agency and management a charge of something over £10,000 upon a rental of £218,000, or between 4 and 5 per cent. Whether that might be a trifle more or less than it ought to be he would not pretend to say, but it was not such a charge as would warrant the statement that the Commissioners were wholly unworthy of confidence, as would have been the case had they really spent £43,000 in managing estates of which the rental was only £173,000. In the Appendix to the Report, it was stated that in buying and selling they had dealt with no fewer than 288 enfranchisements, 241 sales, and 71 purchases, and had, as he had said, paid over a balance to the Common Fund of £100,000. His hon. and learned Friend, however, had, as he had shown, omitted to notice the necessary charges for all that buying and selling.

[Second Night.]

Let him now consider what was the counter-proposition which his hon. and learned Friend opposed to this Bill. His hon. and learned Friend entirely disclaimed, on the part of the capitular bodies, any wish that their incomes should be increased, but he said they ought to do what the Court of Chancery would do—they ought to divide the estates. He had also said a great deal about confiscation. Now, as far as he understood the matter, what occurred twenty-five years ago with regard to the Church property was that Parliament said, "This is trust property, and we will take upon ourselves to declare the uses of it." The distinction was extremely fine between declaring the uses and settling where the legal estate should be. According to his hon. and learned Friend, if the legal estate was transferred to the Commissioners for the use of the Bishops and Chapters, that was confiscation, but if each of these persons or bodies was allowed to have a slice of the property, that was not confiscation. That was rather too fine a distinction for him. The real question for decision was, which of these two modes of dealing with the property would conduce most to the comfort and convenience of those who were interested in it? No one would go further than he would to provide that the parties who had the first interest in the property should have the amount which the law intended them to receive secured to them, not only without trouble, but in the manner which would be most acceptable to themselves. He could not, however, forget the difficulties which arose and the insinuations, often of the most unfounded character, which were thrown out during the existence of the old system, according to which the Bishops or Chapters held the estates and paid to the Ecclesiastical Commission a fixed sum as the surplus produced over a certain amount. His hon. and learned Friend desired that a certain quantity of land in perpetuity should be given to each of the Chapters, which should produce exactly the income which they were entitled to receive. In the first place, as land frequently changed its value, the adoption of that plan would render unnecessary a new settlement every ten or fifteen years, or whatever time might be fixed; but there was the further objection to it, that it was almost impossible to assign to a man a given number of acres which should each year or on the average of years for ever produce a certain sum, and neither more nor less. Some persons might manage an estate in such a manner as, while diminishing its value in future years, to get a greater immediate produce from it. For these reasons he thought that it would not be advisable to adopt the proposition of his hon. and learned Friend, and preferred to it that contained in this Bill. His hon. and learned Friend had charged the Commissioners with having violated the Act of Parliament which required them to have an independent audit, by having the accounts audited by Mr. Morgan, one of their own officers. When he heard that, he thought the days of the old Ecclesiastical Commission had come back, but on turning to the Act he found that his hon. and learned Friend was quite wrong in his facts. The Act of Parliament provided that "the accounts shall be audited from time to time in such manner and at such times as shall be directed"—by whom?—not by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners but "by the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury." It was therefore not the fault of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners if the Treasury had had such confidence in one of the officers of the Commission officers, an eminent actuary, as to be satisfied with his audit. It was true that the business had so much increased of late years that Mr. Morgan had not been able to go into all the accounts; but he believed that, upon the whole, the audit was a satisfactory one. He thought the proposal of the Commission was on the whole less objectionable than that of the hon. and learned Gentleman. If his hon. and learned Friend had proved his case against the Commission the case would be equally good and equally valid against leaving in their hands the portion which he proposed to leave to them. If the Commissioners were so extravagant in their management as had been alleged, it would not be right or proper on the part of the House of Commons to leave to them the management of any portion of the property. But now that he had gone through the principal statements of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Cambridge University, he hoped he had removed the impression which they were so well calculated to produce on the public mind. He believed they ought all to have but one object, to get the property in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners as well managed for everybody as they could, and at as little expense as possible. The Bishops and the capitular bodies should have their fair share of it in the manner most conducive to their interests and most grateful to their feelings. He also thought that the remainder should be placed under the best possible management. The business of the Commission could not be carried on without expense, and he did not believe that it could be transacted at much less cost than at present. He should therefore have much pleasure in voting for the second reading of the Bill, reserving to himself the right of proposing any alteration in Committee.

Mr. Henley

MR. PEASE said that, though not a member of the Church of England, he wished to disclaim being actuated by any feelings of hostility to it. The diocese of Durham contributed £55,000 a year to the revenues of the Ecclesiastical Commission. He did not know how much out of that the Commissioners allocated to the county of Durham, but it was a very small sum indeed, and one which the Commissioners, he thought, would hardly like to have mentioned in that House. The inhabitants had endeavoured to do their duty; they had made subscriptions, held bazaars, and resorted to other methods to raise money for the erection of churches and schools; but when he considered the proportion given to Durham out of the revenues of the Commission as compared with what was given to other counties, he thought it time that there should be further legislation. A small village in Yorkshire received a grant of £600 towards building a church, the population being 150, while only the same amount was granted towards building a church in West Hartlepool, the population being 10,000, though he did not wish to deny that the latter place received also a grant of £39 a year. Of twenty-three churches built or enlarged in the county, eighteen were done by the people themselves, and the remainder by the aid of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The see of Durham was called the golden see, but there was no see for which less was done by the church to supply the spiritual wants of the people than was done for the see of Durham. One result of this was the increase of dissenting communities. There was not a village in the county in which there were not two or three rooms or other places of worship for Dissenters, who had also the advantage of greater lay assistance than the church had, though that advantage was now disappearing. Property had its privileges, but it had also its duties, and he thought the House would not say that other parts of the kingdom had equal claims to the revenues derived from church property in the county of Durham, as the county of Durham itself had.

MR. G. C. BENTINCK said, he thought the Bill ought not to go to a second reading, on the grounds which had been stated by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Selwyn), and he was surprised the other day to hear the very feeble defence offered by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary for these accounts. He had hoped that the Government would have produced a well-considered measure upon the subject. He perfectly agreed with an observation that had been made that piece of legislation was generally bad, but it was positively dangerous when applied to the Church. He was quite surprised the other day to hear the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Lewis) who had great financial abilities, say that the accounts were satisfactory and could easily be understood by a person having a special knowledge. Now, the more he looked at these accounts, the more complicated they became, and the less he understood them. Why were they not furnished with a tabular statement of the amount of the receipts, the sources whence they were derived, and the expenses of management? If that were done the House would easily see how the accounts stood. He had been told that the expenses of the management of the Commission were nearer £70,000 than £40,000, which had been stated in that House to be the amount. He did not wish to see the Ecclesiastical Commission destroyed, but he thought considerable improvement might be made in its administration. He denied that the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend would lead to a retrograde policy; it would lead to a progressive policy. He did not contend that the estates of the capitular body should be retransferred to them, but his objection to the Bill was, that it proposed to cast all this property at once into the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commission, without taking into consideration the special claims to which it was subjected. The Ecclesiastical Commission was a very unpopular body. It owed its origin to the Reform agitation of thirty years ago. The heads of the Church took fright, and resolved to sacrifice a part, to keep the rest, and the Act of 1835 was passed, which was followed by the appointment of the Ecclesiastical Commission. No doubt great abuses existed in the Church at that time, but the Commission began at the wrong end. The chapters were reduced in number, but nothing was done in any other respect to reform those establishments. If the canonries were sinecures then, they were sinecures now. Those foundations were of two kinds, cathedrals of the old foundation, and those of the new foundation. To the former of these he would not then refer; but those of the new foundation had three special objects—religious instruction, secular education, and works of charity.

[Second Night.

Debate further adjourned till To-morrow.

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, June 21, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1st Ecclesiastical Commission.

2nd Councillors of Burghs and Burgesses (Scotland); Plea on Indictment.

ITALY.

NAPLES AND SICILY.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, he had given private notice to his noble Friend, the Lord President, of his intention to ask two questions, both relating to certain reported acts of Her Majesty's Government in reference to the contest now going on between the King of Naples and certain parties of a nondescript character in Sicily. He did not intend to say a word that might be calculated to give rise to discussion, but his object was to give his noble Friend an opportunity—of which he would, no doubt, gladly avail himself—of contradicting a rumour which had been very current within the last two days, and which had already been made use of by foreign journals in raising a prejudice as to our supposed intervention in the affairs of other nations, contrary to our avowed policy. The question to which he wished to call the attention of his noble Friend was this. It had been stated within the last two days in telegraphic despatches that a demand had been made on the part of the Sardinian Government for the restoration of two steamers, with armed men and ammunition on board, which had been seized by the Neapolitan cruisers, and that such demand had been backed up by Mr. Elliot, Her Majesty's representative at Naples. Now, the conduct of the Sardinian Government had led to the belief that there had been no desire on their part to shut their eyes to the expeditions which had started from Genoa and other ports; but with respect to Mr. Elliot, he could hardly suppose it possible that any English Minister could have consented to back up a claim for the liberation of vessels which had been engaged in an enterprise avowedly contrary to the law of nations. Still less was it likely that Mr. Elliot could have interfered on the ground which had been stated, namely, that the persons on board the captured vessels were furnished with passports to Malta. It was scarcely probable that a body of men, so armed and furnished with munitions of war, would have been very willingly received by the Governor of Malta; and nothing was more calculated to create prejudice in the minds of foreign nations against our interference in the affairs of Italy than that any expedition of such a character should be allowed to take shelter in Malta, and to continue its enterprise from that place. It was further reported that the British Admiral, while the evacuation of Palermo was taking place, had undertaken to send a garrison of English Marines to the fortress of Castellamare; and an answer which had been given by the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary in "another place," in reply to a question upon the subject, tended to create an impression that the report in question could not be positively contradicted. He believed that no one would regret more than the noble Lord himself that he had been compelled to give an apparent confirmation of the report, and that he had not felt himself authorized to contradict the rumour in the strongest terms; but at the same time he (the Marquess of Normanby) should be glad to learn from the noble Duke at the head of the Admiralty whether the power of occupying any foreign territory during a time of revolution fell within the discretion of any British officer. These were the two questions he wished to put; and as a proof that even those for whom we professed an interest deprecated this incessant meddling on our part, he might state that two days ago he had seen in a Piedmontese paper—the Unions—an article discussing the subject whether Sicily ought or ought not to be annexed to Piedmont. The writer declared that there would be both good and evil in such an annexation. The good was that Sardinia would at once get rid of all interference on the part of England, and the evil was that, on the other hand, France would at once claim the cession of further territory.

Mr. G. C. Bentinck

EARL GRANVILLE said, the Noble Marquess had certainly given notice of his intention to ask a question, but he had asked considerably more than was supposed to be his intention when he gave notice. However, with regard to the second question he could say that Her Majesty's Government had received no information whatever in confirmation of the statement contained in the telegram, that there had been an occupation of Sicilian territory by British forces; and with regard to the first question, as to the interference of Mr. Elliot, all he could say was, that no despatch had been received upon the subject.

LORD BROUGHAM said, he was glad to find that there was no truth in the rumour that the French Government was about to send a military force to Naples or Sicily for any purpose. He trusted, also, that the Austrian Government would not send troops for the support of the tyrant of Naples.

PLEA ON INDICTMENT BILL. SECOND READING.

LORD BROUGHAM, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said his attention had been principally directed to the subject by numerous and strong representations made to him by different persons, especially by chaplains of prisons, from 150 of whom he had received communications, showing the expediency of relieving those unfortunate persons who were placed under their spiritual care, from having either to plead "not guilty" or "guilty" to the indictment charging them with offences. All lawyers knew that the plea of "not guilty" meant legally nothing more than "I wish to be tried." But persons unacquainted with the forms required by law were often in a dilemma upon that very point—more especially those who were not sufficiently hardened in crime to be callous to the voice of conscience, and who were therefore more entitled to consideration than any other class of criminals. These persons, when perhaps beginning to be awakened to a tenderness of conscience under the ministrations and persuasions of the chaplains, began to feel alarmed at the idea of telling a falsehood by pleading not guilty, because their consciences told them that they were partly guilty of the offence imputed to them. But although partly guilty of the offence, they might not be guilty in a legal point of view, and would therefore be entitled to an acquittal, which they could not obtain at present if they felt unwilling to add the sin of falsehood to their previous crime. Instances frequently arose in which a man might plead guilty without having legally committed the offence imputed to him. For instance, a person stealing fruit from a tree would be guilty in law of trespass only, whereas, if the fruit had fallen from the tree it would be larceny. Such instances, involving the nice distinctions and subtleties of the law, though they were perfectly understood by lawyers, and probably by their Lordships, were not easily comprehended by the class of persons who were usually called to plead to indictments, and a great deal of inconvenience and injustice was the consequence. It had happened over and over again that a prisoner had pleaded guilty from tenderness of conscience; but that the Judge, happening to read over the depositions, found that the legal offence had not been committed, and accordingly had directed the plea to be withdrawn, and the prisoner to be tried upon a plea of not guilty. But the jury in such cases had heard the plea of guilty, and although the man had confessed, from an error in law, it was extremely difficult for the learned Judge in his summing up to obtain an acquittal. By the Bill now before their Lordships it was proposed to alter the question put to the prisoner in asking him to plead to an indictment, from the usual formula, "Are you guilty or not guilty?" to the more reasonable and suitable form of "Do you wish to be tried, or do you plead guilty?"

THE LORD CHANCELLOR agreed with his noble and learned Friend as to the proper legal meaning of the plea of "Not guilty;" but he had seen numerous instances in which inconvenience had arisen from the prisoner misunderstanding the nature of the plea. A prisoner frequently said, "Guilty, my Lord," conscious that he had committed part, or believing he had committed the whole, of the legal offence imputed to him; but upon the clerk of the court explaining to him the meaning of the plea of "Not guilty," he would plead differently. It often happened, he believed, that the dialogue between the Judge and the prisoner, as to whether the latter should plead guilty or not guilty, had a very injurious effect upon the bystanders, who could not always understand the apparent anomaly. It was admitted on every hand, that the plea of "Not guilty" legally meant "I wish to be tried." Why not, then, substitute the true formula for the fictitious one, and use language which the prisoner could readily understand? He had received letters over and over again from chaplains of prisons and from magistrates, urging the desirability of the change which the Bill now before their Lordships proposed to effect.

Bill read 2^a and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

ADULTERATION OF FOOD OR DRINK BILL.—COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clause 1 (Penalty for adulterating Articles of Food or Drink.)

LORD TEYNHAM said, that as this clause now stood, the Bill, which was of great importance, would become an entire nullity. In order to convict it would be necessary to prove that the article was adulterated to the knowledge of the seller. Now it would be practically impossible to prove this knowledge. Take the case of milk. It was not too much to say that the lives of many of the infants of the poor were sacrificed owing to the adulterations in this commodity; but if the vendor were allowed to say, "I know nothing about the adulteration—I sell my milk as it was given to me," it would be impossible ever to bring home the charge either as to this or other articles. At the present moment, when provisions were so dear, it was of great importance that a poor man's family should receive the whole amount of nourishment they expected for the money which they expended. It was said that the vendor might really be ignorant of the adulterations; but he maintained that a shopkeeper ought to have some knowledge of the quality of the articles he was selling, and in any case the amount of the penalty inflicted might vary according to the circumstances. The noble Lord concluded by moving an Amendment,

Lord Brougham

"To omit all the Words to the Word ('pure') in Line 14, for the Purpose of inserting the following—namely, ('Every Person who shall sell any simple Article of Food or Drink with which any foreign Ingredient has been mixed, or any composite Article with which any Ingredient injurious to the Health of Persons eating or drinking the same has been mixed, or which, though not injurious, has been added for the Purpose of Adulteration, or any simple Substance which has been in anywise treated so that its Virtues have been extracted, shall'")

LORD WENSLEYDALE said, the Committee on this subject had agreed in recommending that the Bill should be confined to adulterations which were prejudicial to health; but the Amendment would render penal any admixture of foreign ingredients in articles sold. Now, he thought it would not be right to extend the operation of the Bill so far as this. It would be rather hard, for example, to inflict a penalty upon a milkman who had poured a little water into his milk. He thought also that a guilty knowledge should be essential to any conviction. It was possible that the article adulterated might have been bought from the wholesale dealer and sold without any fraudulent intention, in which case it would hardly be right to convict.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR also opposed the Amendment. The wholesome maxim of the law was—actus non facit reum nisi mens sit rea, and this should not now be departed from. Proof of the scienter was essential to constitute the legal offence.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Amendments made.

The Report of the Amendments to be received on Monday next.

House adjourned, at half-past Six o'clock, till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, June 21, 1860.

MIXTURES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o European Forces (India); Metropolitan Building Act (1855) Amendment.

3^d Poor Relief, &c., (Ireland); Burial Grounds (Ireland) Act (1856) Amendment.

5th Local Boards of Health, &c.; Local Government Supplemental; Law of Property.

PETITIONS.—RULES OF THE HOUSE.

MR. T. S. DUNCOMBE said, he had to present a Petition, or rather remonstrance, from parties assembled at a public meeting held in the Borough of Finsbury, against the course which the House of Commons had adopted in appointing a Committee to search for precedents on the subject of Taxation Bills instead of taking a more direct step. He begged to move that the Petition be read by the Clerk at the Table.

SIR WILLIAM MILES: What is the prayer?

The CLERK:—"To the honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom in Parliament assembled; the respectful remonstrance of the undersigned"—["Order, order!"]

MR. DISRAELI: I rise to order, Sir. I conclude it is against our rules that, instead of a form of Petition praying for anything, a remonstrance should be addressed to this House. I believe that to be an irregular proceeding.

MR. SPEAKER: I understand that it concludes with a prayer.

MR. DISRAELI: Then, I put it to you, Sir, whether a prayer can be received which comes in the shape of a remonstrance?

MR. SPEAKER: There are precedents for the case now before the House, that when a Petition, under the name of a Remonstrance, concludes with a prayer, properly and respectfully worded, the House does receive it.

Petition read and ordered to lie on the table.

THE DEFENCES OF PORTSMOUTH. QUESTION.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether he can afford any explanation of the Statement he made that no plan for the Defence of Portsmouth, except the Duke of Richmond's, existed at the time the Government land at Portsmouth was sold for £8,000, seeing that in the Appendix to the Report of the Defence Commission it is stated that a Committee which sat on this subject in 1804 recommended a plan for the Defence of Portsmouth, at an expense of £712,000, which included four batteries at Stokes Bay?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he was not certain of the exact words which he had used, but what he had intended to convey was that no plan which had been officially adopted existed for the defence of Portsmouth. It was quite true that plans had been submitted, but, as they had not received adoption, and were not to be acted upon, there was no reason why the land should be retained in the hands of the Government.

LOW MOOR GUN FACTORY—QUESTION.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, what may have been the extent of the Contract alleged to have been entered into by the War Department with the Low Moor Foundry Company for cannon of large calibre, which, on trial, have been found to burst in several instances; and whether any questions of dispute exist between the Government and the Low Moor Company in regard to this Contract?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that Government had entered into a contract with the Low Moor Factory to supply a certain number of guns at a certain time and at a certain fixed price. No dispute had ever taken place, nor had any dissatisfaction been experienced. On the contrary, the country could not have been better served than it had been by the Low Moor Company. He supposed the hon. and gallant Member must allude to the attempt at hooping five guns, which had burst. In consequence of the bursting, the work of hooping had been suspended until some more efficient way of securing them should be discovered.

EUROPEAN FORCES (INDIA BILL).

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question (12th June),

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to repeal so much of the Act of the twenty-second and twenty-third years of Victoria, chapter twenty-seven, as authorises the Secretary of State in Council to give directions for raising European Forces for the Indian army of Her Majesty."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

LORD STANLEY: In rising to address the House on this Indian army question, I would, in the first place, assure the House, and it is certainly not necessary for me to assure my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for India, that nothing is further from my ideas, or, I hope, the habits of my political life, than to come forward in opposition to a measure proposed by the Government simply because I happen to sit on this side of the House, or because the plan which he has introduced is different in many respects from that which I myself intended twelve months ago to propose. I know, probably better than most hon. Members, what are the difficulties of Indian administration in the present day; and I know also how great is the intricacy and perplexity of this particular question, involving, as it does, a vast variety of considerations, both political and military. And I will readily admit, also, that, although the permanent interests affected and the principles involved are the same now as they were at the time when I was responsible for the conduct of Indian affairs, still, as far as the immediate facility of dealing with this question is concerned, the events of the last twelve months have made some difference. Holding that opinion, if I could have agreed—if I could even have acquiesced in the principle of the Bill which my right hon. Friend has introduced, I certainly should not have been withheld from doing so by any wish to maintain an appearance of consistency with the opinions which I endeavoured to promote last year; the only consistency in such a case that I should value would be a consistent determination at every time to do that which, under the circumstances of the moment, was most for the interests of the Empire. But, having been for some months responsible for the settlement of this question, having been a member of the Indian Army Commission of 1858; and having during the last two or three years ascertained either orally or from written documents what is the opinion of almost all those who are most competent to form a judgment upon it, I think it would be not merely a want of earnestness and sincerity on my part, but it would be an act of political cowardice in me if I were now, from fear of misconception or from any other motive whatever, to hesitate to express the opinions which I honestly entertain. I do not think it is a factious proceeding to support an opinion which I formed long before taking office, and which in office I endeavoured to carry out. Nor can I think it unreasonable to endeavour at least to secure in this House a fair and full consideration for opinions which are entertained by the Governor General of India, by Sir John Lawrence and by Sir James Outram, and which are shared in by the whole of the permanent Indian Administration in this country. Before I endeavour to state what this question is, perhaps the House will allow me to mention in a few words what it is not, and what it is popularly supposed to be. My right hon. Friend, while admitting this, for him, unpleasant fact, that the members of his Council were unanimous in their opposition to this plan, threw out a hint that that need not influence the opinion of the House, since no department was ever willing to let power pass out of its own hands. I do not quite understand the meaning of that phrase as applied to the Council for India, because they have no power in connection with military administration, except that of giving advice to the Secretary of State, which he may either take or reject. But, whatever may be the meaning of my right hon. Friend, it is undoubtedly an idea commonly entertained out of doors as well as to some extent in this House, that the point really at issue in dealing with this question is a contest between the Military Department and the Indian Administration, not indeed for power generally, but for that particular form of power which consists in the distribution of patronage. Now, this is, in my opinion, entirely a mistake. The question of patronage and that of organization are altogether distinct, and if the House should think it desirable that that which was recommended in the first instance by Sir John Lawrence, and which subsequently received the sanction of the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs in a debate in this House two years ago—namely, to open altogether to competition the first appointments in the local Indian regiments—should be carried into effect, the proposition is one which might just as easily be acted upon, even though no change in the organization of the Indian army took place, as if the plan for amalgamation were realized. If, upon the other hand, the House should, upon grounds of general policy, deem it expedient that the fusion of the two armies should be carried out, and should at the same time be of opinion that, considering the Indian Administration pays for the maintenance of the existing local troops, it ought to have some voice in the first appointment of officers, it would be quite easy to retain the patronage of which I am speaking in the hands in which it is at present placed, while in all other respects the fusion of the local with the Queen's troops might be complete. I am not recommending that plan, although I believe it has been entertained; all I want to show is that the questions of patronage and amalgamation are entirely distinct, and that, whatever opinion may have been pronounced with respect to amalgamation by the Indian authorities, that opinion is one which is wholly free from all suspicion of being dictated by personal motives.

Lord Stanley

I have alluded to one of the prejudices which exist on this subject, but there is a second—for I cannot call it anything else but a prejudice—which is sometimes openly put forward, but which more frequently underlies men's thoughts than it appears upon the surface, and which makes in favour of the maintenance of a single as opposed to a double army. We are repeatedly told that it is an "anomaly"—that is the word used—to keep up two separate military organizations under the same Crown, and subject to the same authority on the part of Parliament. We in England are broken into anomalies, whether we like them or not; but, if there be any anomaly in the case, it is not the maintenance in India of a specially Indian army, but our tenure of India itself. In the present instance, however, the House must bear in mind that we have no precedent and no parallel to guide us. You cannot reason from the case of a colony as to the decision at which you ought to arrive; for India is not a colony in the ordinary sense of the word; it is not a settlement; it can hardly be called a province. It may more appropriately be designated an empire in itself, although the appellation is one which I am aware has been cavilled at. India possesses her own laws, her own finances and her own system of civil administration. She maintains at her own cost an armed force numbering no less than 300,000 men, and of two anomalies it is surely the less that that force should stand apart, than that it should be made a portion of another force, the head quarters of which is separated from it by a distance of half the globe, and which, in point of numbers is greatly inferior.

One word on the manner in which my right hon. Friend proposes to take the issue on this question of amalgamation. He raises it, undoubtedly, in the simplest form, and as far his method of procedure is for the convenience of the House. This disadvantage, however, attends upon the proposal of my right hon. Friend, that we have not before us—at least, not in a shape which would enable us to come to any decision with respect to it—the scheme by which he proposes to carry his purpose into effect. He asks us simply to declare that no further recruiting shall take place for the local European army in India—a proposition which is almost equivalent to an abstract resolution that the maintenance of such army is inexpedient. But, while my right hon. Friend asks us to pledge ourselves to that extent, he does not call upon us to come to a decision as to what we are to substitute for the existing system. If we take the plan of amalgamation proposed by Sir William Mansfield, or any other person conversant with the subject, and endeavour to point out the difficulties inherent in it, my right hon. Friend would very fairly tell us that that was not his scheme. Well, we ask you, what is your scheme? My right hon. Friend answers,—“I am not calling upon you to decide upon the details of any scheme; all I seek at your hands now, is to affirm the principle that a local army in India ought to cease to exist.” That is to say, we are called upon to affirm that it is expedient that a certain thing should be done, though many of us may believe that the greatest difficulty must be experienced in working out the necessary details in a manner consistent with the guaranteed claims of Indian officers, if indeed that be possible at all. Nor do I think the difficulty which presents itself in dealing with the question in this form is diminished by the suggestion which my right hon. Friend has thrown out to the effect, that we are not now asked to consider the case of the Native army, but only that of the European force in India. If that were really so, and that we were simply to decide upon what should be done with a force of 20,000 or 30,000 Europeans, our views upon the matter might, indeed, be materially altered. If we could dissociate from the question at issue to-night that larger question of what ought to be done with the Native army, then, no doubt, the interests involved would be incalculably less important, and the controversy would be confined within much narrower limits. I am, however, afraid that you cannot separate the case of the local European from that of the Native Indian army. And for this reason, that if you are to maintain in India a powerful

[Second Night.]

European force, consisting of 60,000 or 80,000 men, composed of the principal troops of the Line, and if together with and by the side of that army you are to keep up at the same time a Native army, which will be necessarily less looked to, less thought of, and less trusted, and which will be mostly employed, in all probability, on services in connection with which opportunity will be taken to economize European life — if, I repeat, two such armies are to be maintained in a separate form, and without any tie or bond between them, it is, I think, plain that the officers of the Native force will feel that their position is one—I will not say of degradation, but, at all events, of inferiority—that they will lose that self-respect and esprit de corps which ought to belong to every army; and that service in the Native force, instead of being sought for by competent men in India as heretofore, would form a refuge only for those who can obtain no other employment. I have heard something of jealousy as existing at present between the local forces and those of the Line; but what state of things, is more likely to create and perpetuate ill-feeling than that in which the officers of the one army will perpetually assert the superiority of their position over the officers of the other, while the latter will feel that they are placed in a position of undeserved but not the less real inferiority. To take such a course, then, as that to which I am alluding, would, in my opinion, be to destroy the efficiency of the Native force.

But the question may be asked, do we require Native troops, and can we trust them after the experience of the last few years? I answer that question by another,—how are those Native troops to be replaced? You cannot hope with any European force which you can command, to keep under control a territory containing 1,500,000 square miles and 180,000,000 of inhabitants. — 60,000 or even 80,000 Europeans will never suffice to keep in subjection so great an empire, and you cannot increase your army beyond that limit, partly because of the enormous cost of European troops in India, and partly because of the waste of life in consequence of the climate. It should also be borne in mind that you require services to be performed in India which European troops cannot render, while I believe, in practice, no large force of Europeans has ever taken the field in that country without being accompanied by Native troops. Let me also remind the House that circumstances may arise which will render it a matter of considerable difficulty to keep up the number of Europeans, even at the lowest limit upon which you might deem it expedient to fix. There are many circumstances in this country the tendency of which is to make recruiting difficult; wages are rising, the position of the labourer is improving, the capital of the country is rapidly increasing; but notwithstanding these things, emigration has not ceased, and the demand for labour in the home market exceeds the supply. It will be a matter of difficulty, therefore, even in time of peace to obtain the number of men required for Indian service. On the other hand, if the contingency should arise, a contingency which is painful even to contemplate, one at the present time most improbable, but still within the range of possibility, and against which the existence of an army is intended to provide—if a war should take place in Europe in which England should be compelled to take part, I do not see by what means you could maintain an European force of 70,000 or 80,000 men in India unless indeed you resorted to that unhappy, and, as I think, discreditable expedient which you were driven to adopt in the Crimean war, that of enlisting foreign mercenaries.

Lord Stanley

I hold, then, that the maintenance of a Native army both for the present and for the future is inevitable; and holding that opinion, I am glad to believe, as I do, that the dangers incident to its existence are considerably exaggerated in popular belief. You have in India every variety of race and opinion, and between these various populations the old feuds and animosities still continue. In 1857, when the mutiny first broke out, the first thing done was to raise a new Native army, and that army marched on Delhi as readily as it would have done against a foreign enemy. In point of fact to the Sikhs, service in Hindostan was foreign service, and in like manner, if insurrection were to break out in the Punjab, you would have no difficulty in obtaining the assistance of troops raised in any other part of India to put down such disturbance. The really serious danger you had to encounter at the time the outbreak occurred was that of giving to one single race a vast preponderance in the constitution of the Native force. If that error is avoided for the future, as I apprehend it will be after the lesson we have received, the maintenance of a Native force is in a great degree free from danger, and if on the one hand it be conceded, that the maintenance to a considerable extent of a Native force is under the circumstances of India inevitable, and if on the other hand it be admitted that a Native army cannot be maintained entirely dissociated from the European force, without the officers and men losing their esprit de corps and self-respect, it follows inevitably that a local European force must, to some extent at least be maintained. I do not like on questions of this kind to appeal to authorities, however eminent, because reasons of policy ought to be considered on their own merits. But I find that Sir John Malcolm, when examined before this House in 1813, so exactly expressed the opinion I have endeavoured to lay before you, that I will quote one sentence from his evidence. He was asked—

"If the European regiments were to be reduced, and the infantry of the Company's army to consist of Natives alone, what would be the effect?"

His answer was,—

"If such a separation were to take place it would tend materially to destroy the efficiency of the Company's army. . . . In the Sepoy service the officers cannot be employed except in all the lowest drudgery and fatigue of war. They will in consequence sink in their reputation, and will become little better than a country militia."

He goes on to argue that an army, exclusively Native, organized in the manner now proposed, would sink into a condition not superior to that of the armies of Native Princes.

There is one consideration which you cannot altogether overlook, although I am far from regarding it as of paramount or primary importance—I mean the feelings of those officers whom you are about to transfer from one service to another. I allude to that subject, because my right hon. Friend said that, with very few exceptions, the feeling of the officers of the Indian army was favourable to amalgamation—or at least that it is only the older officers that are against amalgamation, the junior officers being in general in favour of it. There must be much that is conjectural in an estimate of the feelings of a large body of men with whom we do not come into personal contact; and when the opinion of a Minister is known, those who dissent from that opinion naturally shrink from expressing views which are known to be unwelcome when it is felt that their expression can serve no useful purpose. On the other hand those who agree with the Minister are, as naturally ready to say so. That rule applies, no doubt, to both sides of the question. I do not contend that I, any more than my right hon. Friend, have ascertained exactly and impartially the state of feeling on this subject. But having communicated with very many officers, and having a few years ago passed some months in India, I must say that I have never heard it affirmed that any Indian officers, except, it may be, a few of the very youngest, were favourable to the change otherwise than for the reasons which I am about to give. I certainly have heard officers, who disliked the idea of the transfer, say that though they thought it would be injurious, yet they were satisfied from the manner in which the question was treated at home, that it would take place sooner or later; that there were influences at work which could not be resisted, and that if the change was to take place, they would rather it should take place at once, in order that they might be relieved from the anxiety in which they were placed and know what their future was to be. That is a feeling which prevailed some time ago, and no doubt it is rather increased than diminished by the long period of suspense in which the Indian army has been kept. There is another ground on which I believe that some officers of the local force may not be unfavourable to amalgamation. No one who has heard the free and unreserved expression of opinion among the officers of that force, as I heard it a few years ago, can fail to be aware that one of their strongest feelings—I am not identifying myself with that feeling as founded in justice, I speak merely of its existence—one of their strongest feelings is a belief that they have little chance of justice at home—that interest, and influence, and favour have a great deal to do with military administration here, and that services rendered at a distance from England stand no chance of adequate recognition; and they argue in this way.—If we remain as a local force we have no chance whatever, but if we take our turn in service with the European forces we shall be brought under the notice of the authorities at home, and we shall have some prospect of obtaining justice. I believe, therefore, that there may be local officers who are disposed to acquiesce in the fusion—some from a natural impatience of the state of suspense to which they are subject, others from despair of justice being done to the local army. But I appeal to my right hon. Friend whether an approval on those two grounds ought to be considered as an approval of any value. But it is not for the sake of the officers of the Indian army that I would maintain a local European force in India; it is for the sake of the public service in India; and in all the discussions on this question I have never heard a fair and satisfactory answer given to what is, in my mind, the greatest objection to the measure of the Government. Supposing that the plan includes the Native as well as the European army of India, it is contended that you will lose the most valuable assistance which the Governor General now has in carrying on the local administration of Indian affairs when you lose the service of some thousands of officers trained exclusively to the Indian service. I do not know that it would be possible to obtain any more important testimony than that of the Governor General himself upon this subject, and here is what he says:—

“No one would dream of attempting to administer the civil affairs of India through officers who were not attached to the Government by some other tie than the receipt of Indian salaries. And inasmuch as the efficiency of our military service, in those branches of it which are of daily importance to the peace and safety of the country, such as the management of irregular regiments, or the conduct of the half-political, half-military operations on the frontiers, and in Native States, depends mainly upon the application which the officer gives to his early training, upon the heartiness with which he undertakes his duty, and upon his persevering adherence to it, I should greatly deplore seeing Her Majesty's army in India officered entirely, or even in the greater part, by men who are at liberty to cast themselves loose from the country at their pleasure, and at an insignificant sacrifice of their interests.”

Now, Sir, I do not suppose that any man in this House will argue the question on the ground that it is better altogether to separate officers of the army from the civil administration of India. The separation of civil from military functions may be very proper in an advanced state of European civilization, but it is certainly not a system that would answer in India. There are many parts of India in which it would be, I do not say difficult or inconvenient, but simply impossible to administer civil affairs through the agency of civilians. Let any man read, for instance, the work of Sir Herbert Edwardes, entitled, A Year on the Punjab Frontier, and he will see what is the normal condition of life among the tribes beyond the Indus and he will be able to judge how far it would be possible in countries inhabited by such a population to separate the power of administration from the power of the sword, and how much more influence the administrator of affairs must have who is a military officer than if he were a mere civilian. My noble Friend Lord Ellenborough, than whom no one has devoted himself more thoroughly to the study of Indian Affairs, felt this so strongly that he at one time threw out a suggestion that all the civil servants should be required to pass through the army, in order that they might have some military training. I do not go that length, but I assert, what I believe no one conversant with Indian affairs will require me to prove, that Indian administration, to be successfully carried on, requires a large admixture of the military element. Well, then, the question is, how will you get military men to take part in that administration? My right hon. Friend's theory—at least, it is that which is usually put forward—is that all you have got to do is to give inducements and facilities for officers of the Line to leave their regiments and enter into the civil administration, and you will by that means obtain an ample supply. To that I have two answers. In the first place, I do not believe that you will get men, and in the second I do not believe that if you do they will be men who have received so useful and valuable a training as is now enjoyed by officers in India. With regard to the first point, the difficulty of obtaining men, probably the House will permit me to read another extract from Earl Canning's recently published Minute:—

Lord Stanley

“I adhere to the opinion that the interests of India require that there should be an army devoted to India. I am confirmed in it by the experience which I have acquired, after much intercourse with officers of Her Majesty's regiments of the Line in India, of the unwillingness which appears to prevail among them to look to India as the scene of their profession for any considerable length of time. During the excitement of active service this feeling was not so perceptible; though even in 1858 the applications for leave to return to England were numerous; but since the cessation of military operations it has become very strong, and it is not too much to say that it is a rare occurrence to meet with an officer of the Line who looks forward contentedly to a long stay in India. I do not think that the unwillingness will be removed by throwing open the door to their employment in every kind of Staff or irregular service. Making every allowance for the events of the last three years, for the disjointed and uncertain condition of service in India to which those events have led, and for all the discomforts of frequent and unseasonable movement of corps and indifferent accommodation, the feeling is, I fear, likely to prove a lasting one among those who are brought to India only accidentally. I believe that there are very few Englishmen indeed who will readily make up their minds to devote themselves to a career in this country, unless they are trained to look to it, and are bound to it from their youth."

I think it is impossible to overrate the value and importance of a protest of that kind coming from the Governor General. I have in the course of the last two years made myself acquainted with many opinions which have been expressed upon important matters by Lord Canning. Sometimes it has been my misfortune to differ from him, but far more frequently I have agreed with him; and whether I have agreed or whether I have differed, I never had a despatch or a letter written by him upon any question of public policy which did not bear the marks of anxious and careful inquiry, and of a conscientious desire to ascertain the truth. And recollect, when Lord Canning expresses this opinion, he comes forward, not so much to speak to inferences drawn from facts which are public to every one, as to give evidence to a fact which he is peculiarly and personally cognizant. From his position he knows better than any other man can do what are the feelings of those who are engaged in the Indian service. Applications for leave are made to him; he knows who wishes to stay, and who desires to go; and when he speaks of a prevalent distaste for Indian service as existing among men who are not trained in early youth to Indian life he is only bearing witness to a fact which is more or less familiar to every one who is conversant with Indian society. No doubt, the feeling of which he speaks has been aggravated by the recent mutiny, and by the antipathy of races to which I am afraid it is led, but it is a feeling which existed in India years ago, and I have repeatedly heard from able and experienced servants of the Government, from men whose Indian career has been one unbroken success, from men who, if any men have done so, have won the prizes of Indian public life,—I have heard, I say, from such men, that although satisfied with their own lot and of good fortune, although they did not regret that much of their lives had been passed in India, yet that if any opportunity of returning to England had offered itself to them in the earlier part of their career, they would undoubtedly have thrown up the service and returned to this country, at the sacrifice of their position and prospects. Nor do I assert this only from my personal experience. Of all the public men who have ever served in the East there is none who has left a more illustrious name than Lord Metcalfe. He was a man who possessed all those qualities which make success not a matter of speculation, but of certainty; yet what was the case with regard to Lord Metcalfe? We have it upon record that not long after he entered the Indian service he became so wearied of his banishment, and so disgusted with the apparent hopelessness of his career, that he wrote to his friends imploring that he might be allowed to throw up his appointment in India and return to England. If a road had been opened to him, if it had been in his power, without any material sacrifice, to come home, he would have acted upon the feeling which he then acknowledged, would have abandoned his prospects in the Indian service, and India would have lost one of her most illustrious administrators. I do not say that the life of public servants in India is one which men ultimately regret. It is a career of great interest. It offers noble opportunities, and confers splendid prizes, and men who go out determined not to look back, and knowing that their lives must be passed in India, become mentally as well as physically acclimatized, and make the most valuable public servants that we have. But what I say is, that in the first instance there is a struggle and a sacrifice, and that the prospect of banishment from England for the greater part of his life is one which no man willingly faces. It is a sacrifice generally made only when men are driven by necessity to make it.

In the next place, if you do find men who are willing so to serve, it is hardly possible they should acquire the same training as they do now; for in order to gain a real knowledge of India, I believe that it is essential that men should go there at a time of life when their ideas are still unformed, when their habits are flexible, and when they can readily adapt themselves to the ideas and requirements of Indian life. My right hon. Friend asked why should not that be the case with officers of Line regiments—why should not they go out early and determine to remain in India? Because they have no certainty of being able to do so. Suppose there is a war or a prospect of a war at home, and an officer is living with his regiment in India, and has for years been studying the languages of the country, intending to retire from the service and devote himself to civil administration. His regiment is recalled with a prospect of being engaged in hostilities, and it is impossible for him with honour to leave it. He therefore quits the country, and takes his part in the events which may be passing on this side of the globe. He thus loses probably the special aptitude for Indian affairs which he had acquired, certainly, he loses the wish to return to India, and a trained administrator is lost to that country. You must not measure the amount of loss sustained merely by the number of persons who are thus inevitably prevented from pursuing an Indian career. You must bear in mind also the element of uncertainty, the not knowing whether or not they will be able to continue in the Indian service, which will more than anything else discourage men from entering upon what is at first a very laborious and very irksome task. I do not like to read extracts, but only two days ago I received a letter from a gentleman of considerable position and very high attainments, who for a time held an official situation in India, but who is wholly unconnected with either the civil or military service of that country, and whose opinion is therefore a perfectly unbiassed one. He says:—

"I am convinced that no man, let him possess a concentration of all talents, can or will fit himself for service in India unless it is the business of his life." "At the end of eighteen years' service in a tropical colony, with a thorough knowledge of the languages, I felt every day I had something to learn. I learnt by every day's experience how I must have irritated my people by my ignorance of their habits—an ignorance excused only as being obviously ignorance."

I think that it is impossible to overrate the importance of this subject, because we have in India to deal with a people whom we can hardly measure by any European standard. In Indian affairs we have repeatedly seen how great discontent and dissatisfaction has been created by ignorance of Native customs and ideas. I will not refer to the signal illustrations of this fact which the events of the last two years have afforded, but this I will say, that having heard, as we all have, innumerable speculations as to the cause of the recent insurrection, I believe that although undoubtedly there were deep-seated causes also at work, and although there were persons who for their own objects excited the people, yet I am inclined to think with Sir John Lawrence that the alarm excited by the greased cartridges was not affected, but was a real alarm, caused by our ignorance of the prejudices entertained by our army upon that subject. I do not believe that any European going for the first time to India, and having to do with the Natives, can avoid giving offence and causing discontent, however anxious he may be to do so. If hon. Gentlemen wish to see the whole subject discussed far more fully and ably than I can deal with it, I can only refer them to that admirable Minute of Sir James Outram which they will find at page 110 of the blue-book, and with every word of which I would express my concurrence.

Lord Stanley

I now come to that upon which my right hon. Friend laid the greatest stress, and undoubtedly, not without cause if his conviction was well founded. He argued as if there was a necessary connection between the existence of a local European force and the existence of discontent and want of discipline in that force. We have had a great many assertions made upon that point both in this House and out of it; but I have not found any proof given of the truth of these assertions. True, insubordination prevailed to a lamentable extent among the local European troops of India last year. But what ought to be shown, and what has not yet been shown, is that the local character of that army had anything to do with its insubordination. The incidents of their mutiny are fresh in the recollection of every hon. Member of this House, and therefore I need only say that the event was altogether exceptional and casual. I am not here to defend these men. Their claims, I think, were not reasonable, and their conduct, I am sure, was unfortunate. But I maintain that the circumstances which led to that mutiny were such as can hardly recur. In the first place you had the older troops, as I believe, greatly demoralized by two years of civil war. Then you had a number of recruits raised in haste and sent out from this country, under the urgent necessity of the case, with the political object of making as great a display of European force as possible; but in point of training and discipline they were not in such a state as they might have been if despatched at greater leisure, and with more previous preparation. Then, in addition, there were exaggerated expectations entertained, I am told, by many of these troops on the subject of the prize money, to which they thought themselves entitled. Those expectations were disappointed, and that disappointment produced discontent. And although I am most unwilling to say anything which may appear to throw blame upon the local authorities, who in a very delicate matter undoubtedly acted to the best of their judgment, still I thought at the time, and I have always thought since, that if some rather fuller and more detailed explanation of the grounds on which the decision of the Government was based had been made known to the men, and it had been proved to them that they were only asked to do what they were previously bound to do by the oaths they had taken on entering the service, something at least might have been done—I do not know how much—towards allaying their discontent. All these considerations form certainly not a justification, but a palliation and explanation to some extent of the bad feeling which existed among the local force. And what I wish to ask my right hon. Friend is this—Can you show, have you ever attempted to show that, placed in the same circumstances, influenced by the same opinions, and exposed to the same—I will not say real but supposed—provocation (and even if it was ill-founded the men felt it to be real to them)—troops of the Line would not have acted precisely as they did? Then, is the accident of a single mutiny to condemn a service of 100 years? You had once a mutiny at the Nore, but did you on that account condemn the whole constitution of your navy, or the whole race of British seamen?

I am told that we must accept the opinion of the highest military authorities on this subject. Now, I do unreservedly accept that opinion as conclusive upon the fact of a mutinous spirit prevailing among the troops; but what I do not see is the connection between the local character of the force and the insubordination which has unhappily existed. I have endeavoured to collect the reasons and arguments by which that view is supported, and I find it stated by some very able advocates of the proposed amalgamation, that men serving in the local force have a natural tendency to become desperate because they have no opportunity of returning to England. If that argument had been used seventy years ago, in the days of Clive and Hastings, when men who left this country for service in India rarely came back, it might have been used with some justice; but the pension list of the Indian army sufficiently proves that the men who go out to serve in the local European force do look forward to their return, and actually do return to this country as much as their brethren of the Line.

Another plea urged in favour of the amalgamation is that if insubordination shows itself in a portion of the troops of the Line, it can be stopped by changing the quarters of the men, and thus preventing it from spreading to the rest of the army. Now, I see no reason why you should not take just the same precaution in the case of a local force. This objection would be perfectly valid if it applied to a local force raised for a territory of a very limited area. It would be perfectly sound, for example, in Malta, the Ionian Islands, or the West Indian colonies. But, when we are considering the case of a local force, maintained in an empire the area of which is greater than the whole of Western Europe, it is unreasonable and absurd to say, "Oh! it is dangerous to have a local force, because, if there be any inclination for mutiny or combination among them, you have no means of separating the regiments." My right hon. Friend appears to have picked up an argument which he had heard or read, applying to the case of local forces generally, and he applies it to the case of India, with which it has obviously nothing to do.

In his speech the other night the right hon. Gentleman gave us another reason for his measure, when he said it was the opinion of military men that a local force was apt to deteriorate, because it had no opportunity of access to the highest military authorities. Well, I want to know who the highest military authorities are; because I should say none is, or ought to be, higher than the Commander-in-Chief in India. His power and responsibility are theoretically equal to, and practically they are even greater than those of your Commander of the Forces at home. This objection, then, like the one I have previously noticed, merely takes the form of some general reasoning upon the subject, and is applied to a case to which it has no relation whatever. It is perfectly true that local regiments raised for a small colony can never have an opportunity of seeing service upon a large scale, and therefore would labour under considerable disadvantages in undertaking any great military operation; but it is quite a different thing where your local force is intended for a vast country like India, and is in magnitude an army of itself. And with regard to disaffection, I believe that so far from the fact of troops being localized in India being an incentive to discontent among them it operates exactly the other way. I believe that nothing tends so much to keep up a healthy English feeling or a sentiment of patriotism among a body of men, whether in the civil or the military service, as the knowledge that they are settled among a vast population wholly alien, and in part, hostile, a population by which they are regarded, at best, as strangers, and in comparison with whose numbers they are themselves but a drop in the ocean.

[Second Night.]

My right hon. Friend made very light of an argument which is often used—namely, that if discontent should arise in the one army the presence of the other army would act as a check upon it. And he made this remark—in which I entirely agree with him—"God help us if our best or only chance for preserving India is to be found in the employment of one English force against another!" Nobody, I should suppose, contemplates the possibility of such an alternative; yet it does not at all affect the argument to which my right hon. Friend was replying, and which, as it has remained wholly unanswered, I will venture to repeat—that, if there be a danger of combination or discontent among the troops quartered in India, the evil would be less likely to spread over two separate forces differently constituted and, in a great measure, entertaining different ideas than over one army homogeneously composed. That is all that I have heard asserted on the subject, and as far it goes I believe it is a sound and just conclusion. But, quoting distinguished authorities, the right hon. Gentleman spoke of the inefficiency as well as the bad discipline of the local European force, and he used words to this effect, that it is the commonly received opinion—I am glad my right hon. Friend did not endorse that opinion—that officers cannot pass ten or fifteen years in India without losing something of their energy. This is certainly an invidious subject; but if one is to compare the services of the two armies respectively, I will venture to say that those who were lately known as Company's officers have had their full share of all the perils and all the honour acquired in Indian warfare, and that there has certainly been no inferiority on their side. Look back only for twenty years, to the period of the greatest disaster that has befallen our arms in modern times—the destruction of the army of Afghanistan. Whose name is associated with that event as the general then commanding our troops? No word shall fall from me that can reproach the memory of Sir James Elphinstone: he was a brave and respected officer: but he was sent out late in life, afflicted with many physical infirmities, and unfit, as he himself admitted, for an active command. That was the doing of the Government of the day. But the fact remains that it was under the command of a Royal officer that the great military disaster in Afghanistan occurred; while it was under the Company's officers, Generals Pollock, and Nott, that that disaster was retrieved. Again let me turn to the events of the last three years. I should be sorry to appear to undervalue or disparage such brilliant services as those which have been rendered by Lord Clyde, Sir William Mansfield, and Sir Hugh Rose. It was lately part of my duty to ask this House to recognize those services, and I certainly never discharged any duty with greater pleasure. But every man acquainted with England or India must feel that the imminent peril was past, the neck of the rebellion broken, before those distinguished men reached the scene of action. And when Delhi fell, who were the chief agents in producing that important result? Why, the Indian generals—Wilson, Nicholson, and Neill, and the Indian civilian, Sir John Lawrence. And when I hear it said that officers, after ten or fifteen years of Indian service, lose a part of their energy, I ask myself whether I am dreaming or under a delusion when I suppose that Munro, Malcolm, Ochterlony, Henry Lawrence, Outram, Edwardes, and many others, whose names, were I to cite them, would not be unknown to this House, were men who spent not ten or fifteen years, but the whole of their working life in active employment in India. Personal contrasts are of necessity very disagreeable, but if we are to compare officers of the two armies with each other I must say I think an officer in the Indian service has opportunities for a manlier and more thorough training than can usually be enjoyed by an officer serving in the home service. Surely, a command on the Punjab frontier involves greater responsibility and more active duties, and brings with it greater knowledge of military life, than a command at Aldershot, or even in a onial garrison. And when the object to train men for service in India, what can be more important than an acquaintance with the country, its climate, people, its roads, means of transport, commissariat? And at what seems disadvantage in these respects must an inexperienced Queen's officer be placed arriving at Calcutta or Bombay for the first time? Moreover, it should be remembered that we are always sure, under the present system, of obtaining the best men in the Indian service to fill the best commands; whereas, if the armies were amalgamated, that advantage would no longer exist: for there will be many more attractive positions for officers of the Line. On the question of the relative efficiency of the two forces, Sir Thomas Franks was called before the Commission to express his opinion, and he said:—

Lord Stanley

"I have served in the field with portions of the European forces of the three Presidencies, and nothing could surpass their gallantry, efficiency, and intelligence."

Willoughby Cotton said:—

"I do not think it is possible to have better officers than the Indian army had, nor that there should be a more efficient force than the Indian artillery."

James Outram may be said not to be entirely impartial witness, since he has taken an active part in this controversy; but whatever his feelings may be, all who know him may be sure that he would not state as a matter of fact that which he did not solemnly believe. Sir James Outram said:—

"Men of the local force are better in health and physical energy, man for man."

He adds, and there is some significance in what he says:—

"If, as is alleged, the discipline of the local army is bad, the fault of bad discipline is generally supposed to be with the Commander-in-Chief, and all the Commanders-in-Chief who have served in India only one has been appointed from the local service."

And he adds:—

"Contrast the performances of the Bengal commissariat during the mutinies, when the commissariat was in a state of dislocation, with those of the Royal Commissariat in the Crimea, under the command of the British nation, and where a land transport of seven miles only was required of the departments."

Lord Ellenborough, who although a civilian has deeply studied war, and has directed the administration of an army, stated explicitly that the Company's officers have a more extensive knowledge comparatively with officers of the Line.—

"The Company's officers have acquired a much more extensive knowledge; till this revolution they would probably have been, as soldiers, superior to the officers of the Queen's army. They had seen more, they had more enlarged minds, because they had more to do."

But upon this question it is not merely to the evidence of men now living that I desire to refer. My right hon. Friend in the course of his speech quoted the language used by Sir John Malcolm, and I admit that a higher or better opinion than Sir John Malcolm's it is impossible to cite. I do not pretend to know what opinion he expressed at other times, because this is a question upon which men may naturally see occasion to change their views: but he was questioned in 1813, before a Committee of this House, and, after stating in very high, but still general terms, his opinion of the character of the local troops, a question was put to him which bears very closely on the proposition now made by the Government. He was asked—

"Would it be advantageous to have the regiments of Europeans in India completed by filling up the casualties with recruits, or to have them occasionally renewed by entire regiments?"

That is practically the question now in issue—whether it is better to keep an army permanently in India, recruiting it from England, or to renew it by sending out entire regiments. Sir John Malcolm said:—

"It would, no doubt, be most economical to have them filled up with recruits, and the regiments would always continue more efficient, as any new regiment coming entire from England is unfit for service for, I may say, a twelvemonth at least."

My right hon. Friend quoted Lord Metcalfe, and I find in Lord Metcalfe's volume of papers the following passage:—

"The Indian army, although it be taken under the Crown, must, nevertheless, continue in some respects a separate body,—that is, it must be officered as at present by officers brought up in its own bosom."

He then proposes a system of exchange, so that, if there is any meaning in words, it is clear that he was contemplating a state of things in which the local army was to remain distinct from that of the Line. Again, my right hon. Friend cited in support of his proposal the greatest name and authority on military subjects in modern times—the Duke of Wellington. I heard with interest, and I have since read carefully the passage quoted. But what does the Duke of Wellington say? I do not find in that passage a single word about amalgamation, not a single word about the disadvantage of a local army. What the Duke of Wellington said was that the Company's troops ought to be transferred to the Crown. That is quite a different question from the abolition of the local army, and I venture to suggest that the motive of the Duke of Wellington's recommendation may easily be understood. He knew that there was a jealousy between the two armies: he knew also that there was a feeling among officers as to the superiority of service directly under the Crown over service under the Company; and he came to the conclusion that the supposed inequality between the two was the cause of jealousy which it was expedient to remove. I need not tell the House that since the Act of 1858 that cause of jealousy is removed. I have only one more authority to quote. Let me remind the House that I am not calling witnesses into court. I am only taking the liberty to cross-examine witnesses whom my right hon. Friend has called. I have not looked through all the writings of Lord Cornwallis. He may have entertained different views at different times; but, looking over Lord Cornwallis's collected Despatches, I alighted on this passage:—

[Second Night.

“Several objections have occurred to me on more mature deliberation against declaring all the forces in this country King's troops. If an Act of Parliament could be obtained permitting the Company to beat up for recruits, and to keep them under martial law until their embarkation, and if some means could be adopted to establish equality of rank between King's and Company's officers, I believe I should be satisfied.”

What becomes then of the authorities cited in favour of the Government plan? Lord Metcalfe favours a local army; the Duke of Wellington is only for a transfer of the troops under the Crown; and Lord Cornwallis would be satisfied with the maintenance of a local force on certain conditions which have long since been fulfilled.

The opinion of Lord Cornwallis alludes to one of the principal grounds upon which the plan of fusion is based—the alleged existence of jealousy and rivalry between the two services. I do not care to deny that such jealousy has existed. No doubt it has often gone beyond the limits of natural and healthy emulation, and its existence has prejudiced the interests of the public service. But why has it existed? Let us see what complaints the local officers have had, and up to what time they have been excluded from an equality of rank and honours. The first instance of a Royal commission being granted to an Indian officer is in 1788. The rank of Lieutenant General was not granted until 1813. The Order of the Bath was nominally conceded in 1815, but it was actually given for the first time in 1826. Brevets for service date from 1828. The rank of General was first extended to Indian officers in 1837. Their rank as officers was not recognized in Europe until 1855, and the first instance of a Commander-in-Chief being appointed from the local forces was in 1856—only four years ago. It is not unnatural that officers of an army 300,000 strong, treated in such a way, should have entertained feelings of jealousy towards their more fortunate comrades of the Line. We should entertain the same feelings under the same circumstances. It is very easy to do away with the feeling by doing away with the causes. By far the greater part of those causes have been removed, and if any remain at the present day they are insignificant. But when it is argued that jealousy must exist between two armies differently constituted in two countries, subject to the same supreme authority, I say that jealousy need not exist unless you put one army in a condition of greater advantage and favour than the other.

Lord Stanley

In one respect there is a disadvantage in the continuance of a local force. I admit that many soldiers who are invalided at an early age are only incapable of service as far as India is concerned, and are still able to do effective duty in a temperate climate. But, if that is admitted to be a disadvantage, it is one from which it is very easy to escape, because there is no difficulty whatever, as far as the men are concerned in arranging a system of transfer from Indian to general service, by making service in one army count towards pension for service in the other. Such an arrangement involves no other difficulty than the more mechanical one of balancing the accounts of the Indian and English Exchequer. In the case of the exchange of officers from one service to the other I am disposed to agree with Lord Canning that the difficulties, though doubtless grave, are not insuperable; but as regards the men, there are absolutely no difficulties to encounter; all that is necessary is to determine how much of the pension of the soldier transferred ought to be charged on the Indian, and how much on the English revenue.

But there is one other consideration which I think the House ought not altogether to overlook, and that is the effect of the change on the army of the Line. What do you propose to do? Why virtually to employ 25,000 troops or 30,000 troops in India more than have hitherto been considered necessary. You will not be able materially to reduce the strength of your Colonial garrisons. You can reduce that of the Cape, because the number of troops maintained there of late years has been, to my mind, extravagantly high. But, with that exception, you cannot reduce the Colonial forces. If, then, the Colonial service cannot be reduced, and the Indian service is to be increased, every officer and soldier gets a longer period of service abroad, and a proportionately shorter period of service at home. For the men, perhaps, that change will not make much difference; but for officers, consider how far you can afford to make the service less attractive than now. You now require from them intellectual qualities of a higher character than before; the pay is low compared with other professions; the chances of distinction in time of peace are uncertain; and I apprehend that this change will materially increase the difficulty—a difficulty already beginning to be severely felt—of obtaining candidates for commissions. It is now your object to induce, as far as you can, men of social position and of independent fortune—who have a stake in the country, and have the feeling of citizens as well as soldiers—to enter the army. That is a principle which may be carried too far. I think it is carried too far, if you sacrifice the intellectual qualifications of an officer in order to secure these advantages; but, kept within reasonable bounds, no doubt the policy is sound; and it will be for the House to consider how far this prospect of considerably increasing the period of foreign service will be likely to affect the entrance of such men into the army. It may be said, perhaps, that individual officers can find the means of evading foreign service, because they can generally, at least in time of peace, arrange an exchange out of a regiment which is going abroad, into one which is to remain at home. But, even when such exchanges are possible consistently with the rules of the service, I do not believe that is a system which the House will desire to encourage.

A good deal has been said as to the inconvenience of locking up in India a considerable European force, by making it a merely local force, when you may require it nearer home. There is an Indian, as well as an English side, to that question; and it might be contended that, considering that India bears the expense of maintaining an army for her protection, it is not reasonable that she should be obliged to maintain as large an army in time of peace as in time of war, in order that that army may act as a reserve for the benefit of the Home Government. But I deny that, in any strict sense of the word, a European local force is locked up in India. The Company's forces have had before, and the local Indian troops may have again, if required, to serve in time of war beyond the limits of India, as, for instance, in Egypt, in Persia, and in China. When any great emergency arises, there can be no doubt that they will and ought to be sent out of India, provided that it be for purposes of war, and not for ordinary garrison duty; and provided also that their employment beyond the limits of India shall not be protracted when the urgent need of them has ceased. What I contend for is, not that a local force shall never, under any circumstances, cross the frontiers of India—for that has never been the case—but that India shall be its home, and that it shall not leave India, except in the case of war. If its liability not to leave India, except in the event of war, constitutes any objection to a local force, precisely the same objection applies to the rule which regulates the service of the Guards at home.

It would be exhausting the patience of the House were I to go further into this question now. The question is one which it is hardly possible to argue fully within the ordinary limits of a debate; but there is one aspect in which the House ought to look at it, and that is in its effect on the power of the Governor General. I am far from wishing that, in regard to administrative matters, greater authority should be given to the Governor General than he now possesses. In some respects I think he, or rather his immediate subordinates at Calcutta, have a larger administrative authority than is desirable. I should be glad to see somewhat less centralization in the Administration of India, and somewhat more local freedom given to the governors of the minor Presidencies. But that feeling is quite consistent with the opinion I now maintain, that in all matters which are political or military, the power of the Governor General ought in India to be supreme. Since the days of Hastings, to whatever disadvantages the Indian Administration has been exposed, it has always been free from the evil and danger of a divided authority. If that danger is ever to arise, the division of power can only be between two persons. The only person who can possibly be placed in a position which would render him a rival to the Governor General, is the Commander-in-Chief. In the case of a local army stationed in India, every officer looks up to the Governor General, as the head of the whole local service and the representative of the Crown; but it is obvious that the same feeling will not and cannot exist in an army of the Line which is serving only for a short time in the country, and of which the immediate head is the Commander-in-Chief on the spot, with a limited power of appeal to the Commander-in-Chief at home. With India garrisoned exclusively by officers of the Line, the person first in importance will be the Commander-in-Chief—the Governor General will both in Native eyes and in those of the army, stand only second. I do not want to exaggerate the amount of inconvenience, not to say danger, which will ensue; but the effect, both as regards the relations of the two, the one with the other, and as regards the relations of the Government with the Native Princes and subject population, will be most injurious.

[Second Night.]

I am not going, at this time, into a consideration of the estimated cost of the change projected. I agree fully in the remarks made by the gentleman to whom my right hon. Friend committed the charge of the inquiry into this subject, that materials are wanting for anything like a minute or correct estimate of that cost. The question principally to be considered under this head is, how far the invaliding of soldiers, with the expense it occasions, will be diminished by a system of more frequent reliefs. That of itself is a proposition not altogether free from doubt. It is distinctly affirmed by medical men, and is, indeed, familiar to every one who has Indian experience, that however men may suffer in the course of years from the Indian climate, still by far the largest and most formidable mortality is that which arises among newly landed troops. I find from one statement that among eight regiments of the Line the proportion of loss was 110 out of 1,000 men in their first year in India. And, of course, the more frequent the reliefs, the more frequently you bring young, raw, unseasoned soldiers into India, the greater will be the mortality from those causes which affect men on their first arrival. The House must not omit to observe, also, that the liability to sickness which affects men who have been long in the country is capable of diminution by prudent sanitary measures, more especially if it shall be found possible to quarter a large number of European troops in the hills. On the other hand, the mortality which falls upon young soldiers from their own imprudence, their ignorance of the climate, their neglect of precautions, cannot, in a proportionate degree, be diminished by artificial means. Then you have further to consider, even assuming that more frequent removals would diminish the mortality of the troops, whether the saving thence arising would compensate for the enormous cost of transport and the practical neutralization of a considerable portion of the army by its being constantly on the passage backwards and forwards. I have touched but lightly on these two last topics, because I fear I must have exhausted the patience of the House in endeavouring to state, (and after all I have done it but imperfectly) the grounds on which I object to the total substitution of the army of the Line for a local force in India. In doing so, I can assure the House I have discharged what is to me a distasteful duty. I would always much rather on Indian questions support the Government than oppose it. I know in this case I am acting against the opinions of many of those whom I deeply respect; but I know the arguments I have laid before you—and the weight of which I feel far more strongly than I have been able to express—I know these arguments do weigh heavily on the minds of those who, from their experience and knowledge of Indian matters, are most competent to form a judgment on the question. I wish only that the subject shall—as I am confident it will—receive a fair, impartial, and deliberate consideration. I am well aware that from the position I have occupied I have been too much mixed up in this question, too long personally interested in it, to approach it at this time with a completely unbiassed mind; and, whatever decision the House may come to, I, for one, will acquiesce in it frankly, knowing from an experience now extending over a considerable length of time, that upon almost every topic that comes before us, be it what it may, the collective judgment of this House is wiser and sounder than that of any individual Member.

Lord Stanley

GENERAL PEELE: Having sat with my noble Friend on that Royal Commission to which he alluded, and having been a party to the settlement which he proposed in 1858, I am anxious to take the earliest opportunity afforded me of stating the grounds on which I now come to an entirely different conclusion from that which he has just laid before us. The question before the House is, whether the right hon. Gentleman (Sir C. Wood) shall be permitted to bring in a Bill to repeal so much of the 22 & 23 Vict., c. 27, as enables the Secretary of State for India to raise men for Her Majesty's local European force in India—whether we shall continue to maintain a separate European force for the protection of India, or whether the whole of the European troops in India shall form part of the Queen's general army. This is a question the importance of which it is impossible to exaggerate. It is far too important to be made a party one. By a party question I do not mean of a political kind. I do not think that on either side of the House there is the slightest disposition in that sense to treat this as a party question. What I mean is that we ought not to allow our judgment in this matter to be biased by any preference we may as officers have for the regular rather than the Indian army, or for the Home as distinguished from the Indian Government. I cannot but think that my noble Friend must naturally, from the position which he formerly filled, be so biased in his opinion on this question as not to attach the same weight to the evidence of officers of the Royal army as to that of other persons, and no doubt my own opinions are as much biased by my connection with the Royal army. Such has been the diversity of opinions and such the conflicting arguments for and against the proposition of the Government, that it is not in the least degree surprising that there should be a want of unanimity in the House, and for that reason I shall not quote any of the authorities, for they are all before the House, and the House shall form its own judgment upon them. The majority and the minority of the Royal Commission came to exactly opposite conclusions. There was an understanding between my noble Friend and myself that, as the question would come before us in our capacity of Members of the Cabinet, we should not express our opinions on the Commission; but, still, as I agreed generally in the views of the majority, and my noble Friend in those of the minority, our voting on the Commission would not have made any difference in the relative proportions of the majority and minority. The majority consisted of five eminent officers of the regular army, and the minority contained the names of four as eminent officers of the Indian army. But the Marquess of Tweeddale, Lord Melville, Sir Harry Smith, Sir George Wetherall, though Queen's officers, have served in India for a long time, and have had just as good an opportunity of forming an opinion on this subject as Indian officers. The diversity of opinion arose from viewing the question in reference to the several interests—I will not say prejudices—of India and the Indian army, or the interests or prejudices of England and the Queen's army. It was my duty, as Chairman of the Commission, to put the questions to the witnesses, and in the case of nearly every witness, as soon as ever he declared to which service he belonged, I could pretty well predict what his evidence would be. I perceive, from the papers before the House, that the Report of the Commissioners has been submitted to the political and military Committee of the Indian Council, and that they were unanimous in condemning the Report of the majority of the Commission. But that is no wonder, if you look to the composition of that Committee. Of the five Members of it three had given the strongest possible evidence before the Commission in favour of the views of the minority. Still, even then, when they came to express their own individual opinions, we find there also a majority and minority totally differing from each other. And equally so among those who have held the highest stations and had the best opportunities of forming an opinion on Indian affairs. In fact, names of the highest authority and the largest experience in India, statesmen and soldiers, may be found arrayed on each side of the question, and whichever opinion a man may espouse he will be in no want of authority to back it up.

In the midst of this conflict of evidence it was the duty of Her Majesty's late Government to come to some decision, and it is notorious now that they were in favour of two-fifths of the European army being local. I, of course, concurred in that view, and it may therefore be asked why I have since changed my opinion, and am now decidedly in favour of an amalgamation of the armies. The events that have since taken place, and the all but mutiny that has occurred in the local European army, are quite a sufficient justification for the change of opinion which has been effected in my opinions and in those of Sir William Mansfield and many other officers. I do not wish to lay too much stress on that mutiny; no doubt at first the Government was to some extent in the wrong; but it is impossible to get over the fact that a correspondence was carried on, that mutinous meetings were held in the barracks, and that even to the last moment none of the non-commissioned officers or old soldiers came forward to inform their officers of what was going on. There are also many other reasons besides the fact of this mutiny which contribute to alter my opinion. So far from the proposal of the Earl of Derby's Government, to have two-fifths of the European army local, meeting the views of those who supported a local army, one of the ablest opponents of the amalgamation, Colonel Durand stated distinctly in one of his latest despatches, that the Indian army would prefer amalgamation rather than that proposal. There is also another circumstance which has greatly tended to alter my views as to a local force. It is quite evident from the large number of the men of the Indian army who accepted their discharge when the opportunity offered, that after ten years' service a great many men will always prefer to accept their discharge. It has not been sufficiently observed that the Limited Enlistment Act puts an end at once to the idea of a local force. It has been suggested by my noble Friend that if you have a local force you can allow men to exchange from one service to another. The men of that force are, I believe, able to do so even now, and at the expiration of ten years it is natural that a man should be anxious to come home again to see his friends, and if at the end of six months he re-enlists he can count his ten years' previous service. Therefore, unless the number of exchanges from one service to the other be equal or almost equal, either the Indian Government or the English Government will be paying pensions for twenty-one years' service of which it has only received ten, or if you divided the pensions between the two Governments according to the length of service you would be giving a man a pension for ten years' service, because he served the other Government afterwards; whereas he would not be entitled to any pension if he left your service at the end of ten years. There are other difficulties of the same kind, which can only be got rid of by having one united army. Of course, in carrying out an amalgamation, you must take care to continue to the officers and men belonging to the present European force all their present advantages of promotion and pensions, and all the advantages which they possess from having subscribed to funds which do not exist in the Queen's service. The right hon. Gentleman has not told us how he proposes to get over these difficulties, and it is the want of these details that constitutes, in my opinion, the weak part of his case.

[Second Night.]

General Peel

Subject to being able to get over this, I think the other objections may be easily met. The advocates for a local army oppose the amalgamation on the following grounds. First, they state that the army in India has hitherto supplied officers, not only to perform all military duties, but civil and Staff appointments, and that it cannot be expected that if the army is to consist entirely of regiments whose service in India is to be of comparatively a short date, that officers will be found qualified to fill these appointments, or to look forward to lives spent, and a career in India. Now, in passing, I must beg leave to congratulate the army on this acknowledgment, that notwithstanding all the accusations that have been brought against it of want of education and ability on the part of officers, that they fill these situations much better than any other class of men, and that the security of India depends upon being furnished with a supply of them. Now, I think that there need be no fear on this head. I quite agree with Sir Charles Trevelyan on this point, that if you throw these appointments open to officers of the general army that you will have a great rush of candidates for commissions in regiments in India, and who will qualify themselves to obtain them, and that so far from shutting out men who look to an Indian career, you will afford them far greater facilities for obtaining it than they now possess. A commission is much easier to obtain now than a cadetship, and if the views of His Royal Highness, the Commander-in-Chief, as stated before the Organization Committee, be carried into effect, they will be open to everybody, without any other test than that of respectability and passing the necessary examinations. Instead of service in India in civil and Staff appointments being confined to the friends and relatives of members of the Council, they will be open to the whole world. Why, even by Lord Canning it is proposed that every cadet should be appointed to, and do service with, a line regiment, and why not better belong to it. I maintain you would have a much larger field to select from, and every candidate for civil and Staff employments in India must have selected that life by his own free will, for I would make any examination for them perfectly voluntary, and unless others sought them they would be still confined to the same old Indian names and families who now possess them. The men selecting this life would, if approved of, and after a certain service with their regiment, be placed upon the Staff list, and their places supplied in their regiment, thus getting rid of the old fatal system of denuding a regiment of all its good officers and leaving only the refuse to do the duties of it. I beg to say that this term "refuse," is not one of my selecting, but that of a distinguished Indian officer, and I think it is only to be justified as a term of comparison between those who have been selected for peculiar merit, and those who, failing in those qualities, have not succeeded in obtaining that which was equally the object of all. Now, this would never apply to the regular army, because there would be a larger portion of the officers who never sought these appointments, and looked to their professional position in preference to any other that might be offered to them.

It has also been said that a local army always secures to India a certain amount of permanent force in India not removable at the desire or caprice of the Home Government. I do not attach the slightest weight to that objection to the proposal before us. The Home Government must always feel the same interest in the welfare of India as they do in that of any other part of the empire. India is represented in the Cabinet by a Secretary of State, and therefore I cannot suppose that we need dread such an interference as would affect the security of that country. But it is a mistake to imagine that the local European force cannot now be removed from India.

The fact is, I believe, that it is as liable to be removed as any other portion of the European force now in India. The opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown was taken upon that point and laid before the Royal Commission. It was to the effect that the Native troops could not be removed, but that the local European troops were quite as liable to serve in Persia, for instance, as any other portion of the Royal army. No British Government, as I have said, would ever endanger India by removing a larger number of troops than the Governor General would sanction. Indeed so far from India having any ground of complaint as to the withdrawal of the Queen's troops in times of pressure, India was saved by the exertions made to send Queen's troops in the time of her need. Our colonies and some of our garrisons were even placed in jeopardy by the number of troops withdrawn from them for the purpose of being sent to India. India can be looked upon only as a part of the Empire—a most important one I admit—but still she must be prepared to give as well as receive assistance when the exigencies of the State require it.

Another objection has reference to the consideration of expense. It is properly contended that the amount of force in India should always be regulated by the amount of the Indian revenue; and it was the opinion of a minority of the Royal Commission that the authority of the Secretary of State and the Indian Government with respect to the application of the Indian revenue would be interfered with by having the whole of the force a Royal army. Recollect, however, that the amount of force in India, whether local or regular, must always depend upon the Governor General and the Indian Government. The Home Government has no authority to send a single regiment to India without it being applied for by the Indian Government; but at the same time the latter has the power of decreasing the force there at any time it may think proper by sending regiments home; and that power has sometimes been exercised, to the great disarrangement of the financial Estimates of the Secretary for War. You have an example of it this very year, in the necessity he was under of withdrawing his original Estimates, and substituting revised ones on account of the unexpected arrival of troops from India. I think the Secretary of State has shown that there is not such a difference in point of expense between a local and a regular force as ought to influence the decision of the House upon this subject. I agree with him that the most efficient force is the cheapest. Why should there be any difference of expense? I am satisfied that sufficient allowance has not been made, in calculating the expense of a local army, for the effect of the limited Enlistment Act. Moreover, if the whole of the army in India were a regular army, I do not see why the scale of allowances made to troops serving in India should not be subject to revision, and placed more on a footing with the allowances granted to troops serving in the Colonies. Of course, the Staff and those who remained there permanently would receive higher allowances, which would be an additional inducement for officers to seek these appointments; but, if regiments are to be relieved oftener than they have hitherto been, I do not see why there should be that great difference in point of expense between troops serving in India and troops serving in the Colonies which now exists. I think, too, that some reduction might be made in the cost of the transport of troops to India, and I hope we may have recommendations from the Committee now sitting which will enable the Indian Government to cut down the expenses under that head. There would also be a saving of the expense of a double Staff; and, upon the whole, I see no reason why, if the proposed change were to be made, you should not have quite as cheap and a more efficient army than you have at present, and that all objection on the score of expense would fall to the ground.

[Second Night.]

Another objection which, though not prominently brought forward, has, I am afraid, affected the opinions of many in a greater degree—even of those who are not directly interested in it—than any of the objections I have already enumerated, has reference to the transfer of patronage from those who now hold it to the Commander-in-Chief, or, as it is called, the Horse-Guards. Any fear on that score is groundless. I have shown that original appointments would be open to the whole world. The Commander-in-Chief has expressed his willingness to give up all patronage as to original appointments, and the only thing left to him would be the common regimental promotions, in which there is no patronage whatever; they are almost matters of course, and are the subject of fixed regulations. The selection of officers to fill civil or staff appointments in India will, I take it for granted, be left entirely to the Governor General and the Indian authorities. All appointments to command in India ought to rest with the Governor General, with the exception, perhaps, of those immediately connected with the discipline of an army—such as the post of Adjutant General and Quartermaster-General. I believe, indeed, that, so far as the patronage or power of the Governor General being at all affected by the proposed change, that great functionary will be placed in a much higher position than that which he now occupies. The only difference will be that you will deprive the Indian Council and the Commander-in-Chief of the patronage of original appointments. But there has arisen a question between the Indian and the British Governments. We have raised, solely for the count of India, twenty-six regiments of line, two regiments of cavalry, and have made great additions to our Artillery and Engineers. We have now an army sufficient, in time of peace, to supply India with all the troops she requires; and have been raised entirely for the service, and if the Indian Government does not employ them, I am quite certain you will not consent to the annual addition of at least another million and a-half to the Army Estimates, and that a large portion of those troops will have to be disbanded at a great expense to this country. That will be a serious loss—for what?—to enable the Indian Government to raise new regiments, and to continue that fatal system which has already so signally failed. A greater madness than to disband old regiments for the purpose of raising new ones, can be conceived. You now have plenty of men. I will undertake to supply India with all the force she requires without adding a single man to the British Army, and at the same time I could maintain a much larger force in this country than we have ever yet had without adding a shilling to the Army Estimates. For these reasons I shall not only vote for leave to give to introduce the Bill, but shall give the measure my cordial support in all its stages.

General Peel

CORONEL SYKES said, he took a more comprehensive view of this question than was comprised in the mere consideration of class interests, Line or Cavalry. What they had to look to was, would the proposal conduce to the good government of India and the satisfaction of the people of that country. His right hon. Friend (Sir Charles Wood) last August brought a Bill which empowered him to increase the local force in India from 20,000 to 30,000 men, but the same Minister now came before them with a Bill to abolish that local force. What was the cause of his vacillation? It was that he had now no confidence in the local European troops. But the right hon. Gentleman had formed that new opinion because the local force in India had endeavoured to maintain what they considered to be their rights. For the purpose of placing the matter before the House in its true light, and explaining the cause of the dissatisfaction shown by our troops, he would explain the manner in which soldiers were enlisted for service in India. Every recruit before joining the local force in India had to take two oaths before a magistrate in this country, and he had given to him an attestation paper. The first oath was to serve the Sovereign of this country, the second was to serve the East India Company and the generals placed over them. The recruit was not furnished with a copy of the first oath, but he was furnished with a copy of the second, and he (Colonel Sykes) held in his hand one of these papers. Let the House imagine then the effect of ignorant and uninstructed persons carrying about with them a paper wherein they read that they were bound only to serve the East India Company. That was the general feeling among them, and not only that, but they considered that if the engagements they had entered into were broken they were entitled to enter into new conditions and to have a bounty, or to be sent home. Curiously enough, a question almost identical in its features was raised in 1795. Lord Cornwallis at that time advocated the amalgamation of the local force in India with the troops of the Line, and he wrote this Minute:—

"The condition on which the European non-commissioned officers and soldiers at present in the Company's service have enlisted cannot be altered, and therefore those men who do not choose, upon receiving a new bounty, to re-enlist voluntarily on the usual terms in the King's service, can only be required to perform the engagements in India which they have contracted to perform to the Company, subject to the articles of war, which are in no essential point different from those in the King's service; and after the expiration of those engagements they are to be furnished with passages in the Company's ships to England."

Now the present question having been stated, and the matter having been referred to the law officer of the Government, the Advocate General, it did seem somewhat strange that he and the military Judge Advocate should not have been aware of this Minute, which would have at once set at rest the question of the rights of the men. The men were quite aware of the opinion of Lord Clyde; they also had in their recollection the declaration of the noble Viscount (Viscount Palmerston), "If the troops do not like to be transferred, let them take their discharge." Under these circumstances, when the men found that their application for a bounty was resisted on the part of the Government, it could not be truly said that the men were in a state of mutiny because they asserted what they considered to be their rights. What was the history of the case? The soldiers had presented memorials upon the subject, complaining of what they deemed an injury. Committees sat at the different stations to hear the men's statements, and they were desired to be patient while the matter was under reference to the Government. Several weeks, nay months elapsed before any reply was given, and during that period they behaved with the greatest propriety. The reply came, founded upon the dry technicalities of the law, upon the wording of the first oath, a copy of which had not been given to them, and it told them they had taken an oath of allegiance to the Crown, and were servants of the Crown, and not entitled therefore to any bounty at all, or new conditions of service. Up to that period they had been perfectly obedient, but then they began to say, "We require justice, not law; combination is necessary; there can be no mistake about our rights, and we must have them." That conduct of course constituted mutiny, if it were mutiny for troops to demand what they conceived to be their rights. But was it true that they had all quitted India? Only 10,000 out of some 21,000 returned to this country, and of these great numbers re-enlisted and went out again. His right hon. Friend said that in consequence of the conduct of the men they had shown themselves unworthy of trust for the future, and that they ought to be abolished as local troops, and yet with singular inconsistency, notwithstanding their untrustworthiness, he would make them regiments of the Royal army. Now let the House apply that argument to the troops of the Line. During a former war a Highland regiment, which had since highly distinguished itself, was raised on the express condition that it should not be sent abroad. In course of time, however, troops were required in the West Indies, and this regiment was ordered to be marched down to Leith for embarkation. But when the men discovered their intended destination they marched through Leith and Edinburgh with their drums beating and colours flying, and took up a position under Arthur's Seat and set the Government at defiance. The Government, in that case, was forced to give way, but it was never contended that on that account the Regiment was to be distrusted for the future, or that the Government were bound to disband the whole of the Highland corps. By parity of reasoning, however, his right hon. Friend (Sir Charles Wood) ought to say, as he did of the soldiers in India, that because those Highlanders had contended for and obtained their rights not only they ought to be disbanded, but all the other Highland Regiments for their loyalty was not to be trusted. Take another instance. The 22nd Royal Regiment, than which none could be more brave or loyal, when stationed at Muttra, complained that they were unable to obtain the arrears of pay due to them, from the defalcations and death of the Paymaster of the Regiment. One fine day the Sergeant Major fell in the Regiment on parade, and the men demanded a settlement of their pay. Major-General Dickson, who commanded the station, was obliged to call out the cavalry and Horse Artillery, and on his requisition the regiment grounded their arms and retired to barracks; but the result was that the men obtained what was due to them, were re-armed, and were finally sent on active service. No man would venture to say that this regiment—since distinguished as Sir Charles Napier's—was not to be trusted on account of this occurrence. The readers of Irish history were aware that the 5th Dragoons in the rebellion of 1799 refused to charge the rebels. [An hon. MEMBER: No! never.] The regiment had been disbanded and was now restored; but was any slur to be cast on the loyalty or gallantry of the present regiment? He could give twenty other instances of a similar kind, but these were quite sufficient to bring his right hon. Friend's argument to what the schoolmen termed the absurdum.

[Second Night.]

The next argument was, that in consequence of the indiscipline of the European troops in India, they were not so efficient as troops of the Line. Lord Clyde, Sir Hugh Rose, and Sir William Mansfield it was found in the blue-books had expressed themselves to this effect. But the local Artillery had long been acknowledged to be equal to any in the world and the colours of the European Regiments were emblazoned with the names of many victories in which the regiments had participated; and with respect to the Native army, Lord Clyde, on taking leave of the 9th Bombay Infantry said, addressing Major Evans, who was in command, he had long desired to have an opportunity of thanking his fine regiment for its soldier-like appearance, with which he could scarcely find words to express his satisfaction. Lord Clyde also expressed his warm acknowledgment to the whole Native army of Bombay for its strict discipline, which he said he had first beheld at Peshawur ten years before, and which had kept steadfast in its allegiance and loyal to the Government when the whole Bengal army, as if seized by a sudden fit of insanity, had withdrawn from their duty. Sir Hugh Rose, in taking leave of the Bombay army, stated that he appreciated fully the position of being in command of a force which occupied so high a military position, while General Mansfield, in assuming the command, said that he was well acquainted with the character and discipline of the Bombay army, as illustrated in many brilliant actions. With those facts before him, he must contend that the conduct of the local European troops and the circumstance of a mutiny having broken out among the Native troops in Bengal furnished no sufficient ground for the proposed extinction of the local troops in India.

Colonel Sykes

Another argument of the right hon. Gentleman was, that it would be impossible to recruit for the local army. No doubt there might be some truth in that objection if the local force were intended to be entirely European, and to consist of 80,000 men. But the European force in India had always hitherto consisted of Line and local regiments, and for the prospective arrangements it was never contemplated that this system should be altered, or that the whole European force should be local. But why should 80,000 men be deemed necessary? In 1857 our European troops in all India consisted of 25,771 men belonging to the Line, and 15,227 belonging to the local army, in other words, of 40,998 men; there were also a few veteran and invalid companies. With that force the authorities contrived to break the neck of the mutiny and to take Delhi, under the most unexampled circumstances recorded in the annals of military sieges—they managed also to take Lucknow, and to hold their own till reinforcements arrived from England. If they were enabled to do that with 40,000 men, why, in the name of common sense, should 80,000 be thought necessary now when there was not left a Native Prince that could stand against a single English brigade, when there was no longer a fortress before which they could sit down, and when they had disarmed a considerable portion of the Native population? With respect to a local European force there could be no doubt about the completion of the local force of 30,000 men authorized to be raised by the Act of last year, for its strength at that moment was 13,884, besides 3,492, who were on their passage and 1,600 recruits at the depot. Drafts from the Line would be quite uncalled for.

The right hon. Gentleman stated that while all the officers above the rank of captain objected to the amalgamation, all those who were below that rank were in its favour. He (the gallant Colonel) was at a loss to conceive where the right hon. Gentleman had obtained that information. Since the year 1840 he had given commissions to at least 200 officers of the Indian army, and he had at that moment two sons in that force, subalterns, who had been with their regiments twelve years, and had never sought a staff employment; and he had a tolerably extensive acquaintance with Indian officers, but in the whole course of his experience (with the exception probably of a few lads occasionally who wanted to get back to Europe), he had never heard of the wish stated by his right hon. Friend. The right hon. Gentleman had used the names of Malcolm, of Metcalfe, and of Grant, in support of his view; but he seemed to forget that the opinion which those distinguished men had expressed was given before 1855, before, in fact, Lord Lyveden had obtained for Indian officers equal rank in all parts of the world with those in the Queen's service. Since that time there had been no jealousy between the two services as regarded the question of rank; and the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman had quoted was no longer applicable to present circumstances.

There were many other objections to the plan of the Government. In the first place if the amalgamation took place the applications for exchanges would be incessant, and the Indian Government would be put to a large and unnecessary expense in the shape of passage money to officers on their way to India or coming home, which passages were not paid for local officers. Again, the noble Lord (Lord Stanley) had spoken in very strong terms of the disregard of authorities by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Charles Wood). There were fifteen Councillors of India who had been expressly appointed for their knowledge of that country, and their acquaintance with the habits and manners of the people; but his right hon. Friend, having privately ascertained, one by one, that their opinions were absolutely adverse to his proposition, refused them an opportunity of expressing their opinions in council and collectively in regard to it. There was no document on the table of the House to show what the opinion of the Council really was. If the opinion of such men as Sir John Lawrence, General Vivian, and Sir Frederick Currie, who had passed so many years in India, was not to outweigh that of three or four Royal officers who had been only three or four years in India, he feared the reputation for knowledge and experience of any set of men could be of little value in the estimation of his right hon. Friend. The local force possessed the great advantage of having become acclimatized. A lengthened residence in India generally softened down those asperities and that dislike of a black face or a black skin which new-comers too often felt. They could only hope to hold India by producing a good feeling between the European and the Native soldier, a feeling of which there were happily abundant examples. Thus, on one occasion, when the gallant Sale was shut up in Jellalabad in Affghanistan and provisions ran short, the 35th Native Regiment begged that their share of meat might be given to the 13th Royal Regiment and the artillery with whom they had been brigaded; they said they could do without meat, but Europeans could not; and the 78th Highlanders, when in Persia, used to call the 26th Bombay regiment the Black Cameronians, and treated them as comrades. It generally, however, took Europeans four or five or even six years to become used to the habits of the Natives, and get upon such friendly terms with them. It would be perfectly easy to keep up a local force of 30,000, because a Royal regiment never came home with out 150 or 200 men volunteering into some other force, because they preferred remaining in the country. He did not touch on the financial part of the question, as some papers were about to be presented to the House bearing upon it; but he believed that the amalgamation would involve an increase of expense amounting to a million sterling. The patronage question had been pooh-poohed by the right hon. Gentleman; but it would require to be well weighed at a later stage of the Bill. Even under the quasi independence of the company he had known a commander-in-chief appointed who could not find his way out of the court-room in which he was sworn on account of his defective sight. He had known another who had never mounted a horse after his arrival in India; and a general officer appointed to the Staff who was a valetudinarian, and had the misfortune to lose an army. If such things had happened before, when objections could be raised by a Court of Directors, there was no reason why they should not happen again when there would be no objectors; and it could not be denied that 4,980 new commissions to fill up in the Indian army would be a very pleasant addition to the patronage of the Horse Guards. He would conclude by saying that, giving his right hon. Friend credit for good common sense, he could not help expressing the belief that his convictions were not quite in accordance with his arguments, and if he wished to promote the welfare of our Indian Government and the contentment of the people, he earnestly recommended him not to persevere with his Bill.

Mr. PEACOCKE said, he thought the prima facie evidence in favour of one united army under one head, and guided by one impulse, so manifest that he would not detail the numerous arguments for amalgamation, but would rather endeavour to answer the objections which had been urged by the noble Lord who spoke first in the debate to-night. The noble Lord maintained that additional expense would be entailed on the country by amalgamation. The proposal of the Government was to maintain 80,000 European troops in India. According to Mr. Hammack, whether that army was composed of local troops or Queen's troops, it would only make a difference of £170,000. Against that larger outlay of the Queen's troops was to be put the larger cost of the non-effective portion of the army — a double set of staff officers, and a double college, which would have the effect of impeding business and fostering jealousy, and when the noble Lord said that there were no practical advantages to be gained by the change, he would remind him that Lord Elphinstone declared that the double expenditure upon these objects was the least of the evils they entailed. The noble Lord (Lord Stanley) went on to urge the superior acclimatization which a local force enjoyed, and the hon. and gallant Member who spoke last had also employed a similar argument. He was excessively surprised to hear that argument, for the whole weight of medical authority was the other way. Dr. Martin, the highest medical authority on the subject of Indian climate, stated that there was no such thing as acclimatization, and added "Length of residence in India, so far from conferring any advantage in the way of acclimatization, surely and gradually leads to physical degradation." That was borne out by the statements of Sir Alexander Tulloch. Another argument was that a local Indian force acted as a wholesome check upon the withdrawal of an excessive number of European troops for service at home. He had no fear that the Government of this country, responsible as it was to the Queen and to Parliament, would ever withdraw troops from India except under an emergency, so perilous and imperious that the best interests of India itself would be promoted by it. Our supremacy in India might be as dangerously assailed in the Mediterranean or on the shores of the Solent as on the banks of the Hooghly or in the Carnatic; and if the security of Portsmouth or Malta were menaced, it would be but a poor consolation to know that Calcutta and Madras were safe. He was for these reasons a partisan of the thorough amalgamation of the two armies. The noble Lord had pointed out how India might be made the training school for our troops; and it was indeed desirable that the military experience acquired on the soil of India should be made available for the battle-fields of Europe, and that the experience gained in Europe should likewise be made available in India. They were always pointing to the superior organization of the French army, and, saying with truth, that it was owing in a great measure to the practical training of French soldiers on the plains of Africa, where they received their baptême de feu.

Colonel Sykes

India might be made our Algeria, but we declined to avail ourselves of it. The French thought it right, under the pressure of a recent emergency, to transport their Turcos and their Zouaves to the plains of Italy, and he did not see why we should not similarly avail ourselves of the resources of our Empire. India should be our Algeria, but unfortunately we had thought proper to adopt the very opposite system, and with what consequences? Why, when war broke out in Europe, we searched almost in vain for generals who had seen a shot fired in earnest, and for staff officers who had the smallest practical knowledge of their duties. Again, it was undisputed that a superior esprit de corps existed in the Queen's army to that which existed in the local force, and this fact, indeed, was acknowledged by the Earl of Ellenborough and Earl Canning. The Earl of Ellenborough acknowledged that the Queen's army had never mutinied; whereas, the Indian army had frequently mutinied, and once to an alarming extent in the year 1806, when some of the officers were believed to have been mixed up in the movement. The mutiny of 1859 was also shared in by the non-commissioned officers. Every hon. Gentleman present was, no doubt, aware of the last mutiny in Bengal, but very few were, probably, aware as to the extent of its organization. Lord Clyde showed that for weeks previously to the breaking out of that mutiny the best mode of effecting a rising was openly discussed in all the cantonments of the local European force. Yet not a voice was raised by the non-commissioned officers to warn the officers of the impending danger. He might be told that the balance of authority of old Indian officers was against the amalgamation. But the House would do well to regard their evidence with suspicion, because Sir Hugh Rose truly affirmed, that a great portion of their opposition arose from self-interest. He said that those officers who had given their opinion in favour of a local corps did not hesitate to admit in private that the present system had led to disorganization; but they added that amalgamation would ruin them, for the Staff appointments would be distributed by the Horse Guards. Hitherto no great inducement had been held out to officers of the Queen's army to acquire the acquisition of the Indian languages; but Lord Elphinstone said that where an inducement had been held out of the most meagre kind, an active competition amongst the officers in the acquirement of these languages had taken place. Great stress had been laid to-night, and naturally, on the despatch of Earl Canning; but he thought that it would be seen that the admissions made in that document very much outweighed the arguments it contained in favour of a local corps. Earl Canning admitted that the European troops in the Company's service were much below those of the Line, and that there was great difficulty in completely training a local European force. He acknowledged that the opinion of high authorities in India was, that it would be difficult to maintain two distinct English armies in India; and that many of the young officers in the Native army in 1859-60 forgot their duty, and committed acts of gross insubordination. Against these admissions, the noble Earl used only this argument—that the officer of the regiments of the Line in India were unwilling to make India the scene of their professional life for any length of time. That argument had been, however, fully answered by Lord Elphinstone, who had shown that no appointments had been open to the Queen's troops; and that they were as willing as officers of the local corps to make India the scene of their labours, when adequate encouragement was held out to them. Whatever was the opinion on the subject of that despatch, he hoped that the doubts and hesitation of Earl Canning would not be allowed to weigh for one moment against the united testimony of the highest military authorities in India; and he trusted that it would be recollected that Lord Clyde, Sir Hugh Rose, and Sir William Mansfield, had emphatically declared that the maintenance of a local European corps in India was not compatible with the existence of our empire in India.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, he would preface the few remarks he wished to make to the House by observing that this was only the first reading of the Bill, and that if any active opposition were entertained to the measure, the proper course would be to take the debate on this subject on the second reading. He also wished to bear testimony to the very able speech he had listened to from the noble Lord opposite. Had he (Sir De Lacy Evans) consulted his own feeling in the matter, he should not have said a single word on this occasion; but he thought that the subject of India was very little understood in this country, and that its affairs, though studied with assiduity by a small portion of the community, did not generally meet with the attention which they deserved. He had, therefore, ventured to say a few words, as being a person who could not be supposed to have any personal interest in the decision. He was sorry to see the benches of the House so very empty, and he regretted that even the right hon. and gallant Gentleman (General Peel), who made so gallant a speech just before on this subject, and who was particularly interested in it, not only as having held the office of Secretary at War, but also as Chairman of the great Royal Commission which had considered this question, was no longer in the House. He was sorry that the hon. and gallant Officer had not waited to watch the current of this discussion. But now, one word as to what was called the mutiny of the local European army, which had arisen out of faults on both sides. He called attention to this, because it was alleged to be the cause of the present Bill, which was a very remarkable Bill, and a very unjustifiable one in his opinion, inasmuch as from its peculiar form and nature it prevented the House from fairly considering on a future occasion the whole of the large question which it raised. The measure consisted, indeed, of only one small clause, but it deprived the House of an opportunity of examining the arrangements of the Government, and left them no alternative but to vote for the abolition of a local European force. The records of Parliament furnished no precedent for such a proceeding. It appeared that the five officers of Her Majesty's service who sat upon the Commission all gave their Votes for a Royal army in India; while the four Company's officers and the only Indian civilian who composed the rest of the Commissioners, unanimously gave their Votes in the contrary direction. If that were so, what value attached to the Report of such a Commission? The Commission was not fairly constituted. He had pointed out on a former occasion in what a false position the advisers of the Commander-in-Chief would place his Royal Highness if they induced him to act as one of the Commissioners. His remonstrance had not, however, been attended to, and he now repeated that under a Royal Commission so composed there could not be a fair and impartial investigation of this question. The noble Lord (Lord Stanley) was the only civilian upon the Commission, and he was strongly in favour of a local army. The late Secretary for War was upon the Commission also, and it was hard to place officers in the position of voting against the Minister of War and the Commander-in-Chief.

Sir De Lacy Evans

An easy answer to the speech of the Secretary of State for India was supplied by the statements which that right hon. Gentleman made to the House only last Session, and which were directly the reverse of what he had said on the present occasion. True, the right hon. Gentleman announced in a light and tripping tone that, having given further consideration to the matter, he had come to a different opinion. But when grave and responsible Cabinet Ministers changed their minds so completely on a cardinal question of policy in a few short months, what reliance was to be placed upon their decisions? On the 10th of August last the right hon. Gentleman came down to the House and proposed an augmentation of the local European army to 30,000 men, including the force at home. In 1853 he had proposed a similar augmentation. The right hon. Gentleman's Bill was, therefore, at direct issue with his own conduct and speeches in 1853 and 1859. Last year the right hon. Gentleman wholly denied that what had just happened in the local European army could be fairly described as a "mutiny," and he asserted that the men were under a strong impression that they had justice on their side. And so no doubt they had. For who had produced the so-called mutiny? Why, the noble Viscount at the head of the Government in the first instance, because, speaking with all the authority of a Prime Minister—an authority equal to, if not greater, than that of the Sovereign herself, although, perhaps, that opinion should be uttered with bated breath—the noble Viscount in introducing his Bill for the better government of India in 1858, distinctly declared that if the local European force objected to be transferred to the Crown they would, as a matter of course, have a right to their discharge. That statement reached the ears of the men, and naturally produced a strong impression upon them, and they were further confirmed in their persuasion of the justice of their claim by a report then current in the camps of India, that Lord Clyde and Sir William Mansfield both concurred in the declaration made by the English Premier. The troops were, however, abruptly told that they were to be transferred to the

I observed that it would be mere affectation to pretend not to know what had taken place in the Committee; and, therefore, he should follow his example and refer to it.

MR. SPEAKER: The rule of the House must as the hon. and gallant General himself has stated it. It is not competent to the hon. Member to refer to anything that taken place before a Committee till the Report has been placed on the table of the House.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, he would, of course, bow to the decision of the right hon. Gentleman. But before the Bill was read a second time he believed the Report of this Committee would be laid upon the table, and he should then be able to refer to the evidence. He should confine himself to stating that he believed several very remarkable circumstances had been discussed before the Commission. The patronage of the Horse Guards was immense, and he hoped that the House would consider that for constitutional reasons it ought to be increased. It was generally thought that some higher influence had been brought to bear to induce the Government to depart from the opinions which they had previously expressed upon this subject; and when he remembered that he only last year introduced a Bill to provide for the augmentation of the Indian army, and were now asking the House to adopt an entirely opposite course, he could not but be afraid that such had been the case. The arguments of the noble Lord the Member for Lynn had been most satisfactory and most conclusive against the policy of Her Majesty's Government seemed determined to adopt; and he would reserve any other remarks which he had to make upon this subject until the House was called to read the Bill a second time.

CAPTAIN JERVIS complained that the hon. and gallant General the Member for Westminster (Sir De Lacy Evans) had departed from the real question before the House, which was, whether there should be a local army in India, or an amalgamated British army, in order to make an attack upon the Horse Guards. He seemed to think that the measure before them was a result of a job on the part of the Horse Guards, backed up by the Crown, to place in the hands of the hon. Member a little more patronage than it at present possessed. Since the right hon. Member the Secretary of State for India had addressed to the House his clear and able speech upon this subject there had been distributed a despatch of the Earl Canning, dated May 6, 1860, in which that noble Lord stated that rapidly to raise any European army in India and officer it efficiently from the present body of officers, was impossible. The question, then, was, whether we were to create a fresh local army or to raise the British army in India from 66,000 to 80,000 men. There was now no local army in India. In the Bengal local army there was one officer to six European men; in that of Madras one officer to ten Europeans, and in that of Bombay one officer to every twelve Europeans. There were between 4,000 and 5,000 men at present belonging to the local army in India, and in the course of the year 300 men would be sent out to replace thousands who had been disbanded and sent home. It was a fact recognized by every man in India, from the Commander-in-Chief downwards, that that army could not be re-established. If there was one other authority whose opinion ought to command respect in that House more than another, it was Sir Charles Trevelyan, who in one of his Minutes stated that, on the balance of advantages and disadvantages, he preferred the plan of having a Royal army in India to that of re-organizing the local force. The Horse Guards, against which the hon. and gallant General had made so unwarrantable an attack, was nothing more nor less than a number of officers, who were appointed by the Crown to enforce the discipline of the army, and to see that promotion in the service was carried out in an efficient and correct manner. There was great misapprehension in the public mind as to the extent to which the powers of the Commander-in-Chief would be increased by transferring the local European troops to the regular army. A Commission which sat in 1837, upon which were some of the most distinguished Members of the House, had shown that the Commander-in-Chief was responsible for the efficiency of the army, but the Secretary of State was responsible to the Crown and the country for the expenditure. It was shown that if the Commander-in-Chief wanted to remove a corporal's guard from one place to another the order must have the sanction of the Secretary of State. He (Captain Jervis) did not believe that there was any jealousy between the local force and Her Majesty's army, and he could not understand how the amalgamation of a few thousand men man who more than another saved India during the late mutiny of 1857, he would say it was a local civilian officer, Sir John Lawrence. Again, to refer to one of the best appointments the Government ever made, who was it that in a dire extremity was expressly selected to be the Provisional Government of India, in the event of any accident taking off Earl Canning? It was Sir Henry Lawrence, also a local officer.

But they were told that the local regiments were not so well disciplined as the regiments of the Queen. He had no doubt they did not look quite so smart on parade; but who ever presumed to say that those troops were inferior to those of the Queen on the field of battle? On the contrary, they were in some respects more efficient for Indian warfare; for they had learned on high authority that it was one of the drawbacks to the efficiency of the Queen's regiments that, until they had been a year or so in India, they were seldom able to muster in their full strength; and even when they did, they could not act with the same advantage as the local troops, who had been long accustomed to the climate. He had listened to the charges brought against what he had hitherto considered a distinguished portion of our army with great regret; and he did not think it became some of the officers who had passed those comments, to make them. He was told that the local officers were not fit for high command; but the noble Lord (Lord Stanley) had referred to some very remarkable cases in recent history, which disproved this, and which could not be gainsayed. During the calamitous outbreak that had recently taken place, the local officers, somehow or other, had taken a most prominent position. He feared that if the patronage was to be placed altogether at the disposal of the Horse Guards, they would only have a repetition of those misplaced appointments which had hitherto been so much complained of. He understood that questions had been put before the Commission as to whether or not officers had on critical occasions been selected for high command in India, who were physically unfit for those commands; but that those questions were rejected and treated with disdain by some great authorities on that Commission. It was notorious, however, that officers had been appointed to chief commands in India who, though gallant officers, were physically incapable of discharging their duties; and what were they to expect, if the patronage of the Indian army was altogether placed with the Horse Guards, but an extension of this evil? One general officer said that he was complained of, because he was bad in his legs; but his predecessor was bad in his head. Another, it was notorious, was both deaf and blind. These were the appointments made by that perfection of military administration, the Horse Guards. To the last appointment, which was made by the noble Viscount, he alluded with reluctance, because the officer appointed was a man whom every body liked, who had good natural abilities, and who, if he had had experience, and had devoted his time to military affairs, would have been, he did not doubt, as good an officer as any other. Unfortunately, he doubted whether he had ever commanded a company; certainly he had never done so before an enemy, and yet the noble Lord appointed him to a most important command—that of 320,000 men. How were the interests of the Empire consulted when such appointments as that were made? The right hon. and gallant General (General Peel) had said that it was quite a delusion to doubt the excellence of the mode in which patronage was dispensed by the Horse Guards, and assured the House that that department exercised the most perfect justice and the most perfect wisdom in that respect. If that was the case, undoubtedly they could not do better than increase the patronage of the Horse Guards. Unfortunately, however, the conduct both of the right hon. and gallant General himself and of the present Secretary of State for War was at variance with that statement. They both thought that there was so much confusion and disorder in the proceedings of the Horse Guards and of the War Department that they had successively moved the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the irregularities. If the exercise of patronage by the Horse Guards was so perfect, what necessity was there for the appointment of that Committee? The hon. and gallant General said that the appointments to the cadetships for the whole Indian army would be beautifully managed by the Horse Guards; but before that Committee some most alarming and appalling statements had been made with regard to the exercise of the patronage of that department. It was not Parliamentary to allude to the proceedings of a Committee before its Report was presented to the House; but the right hon. Gentleman had observed that it would be mere affectation to pretend not to know what had taken place in the Committee; and, therefore, he should follow his example and refer to it.

Sir De Lacy Evans

MR. SPEAKER: The rule of the House is just as the hon. and gallant General himself has stated it. It is not competent to an hon. Member to refer to anything that has taken place before a Committee till its Report has been placed on the table of the House.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, he would, of course, bow to the decision of the right hon. Gentleman. But before the Bill was read a second time he believed the Report of this Committee would be laid upon the table, and he should then be able to refer to the evidence. He should confine himself to stating that he believed several very remarkable circumstances had been disclosed before the Commission. The patronage of the Horse Guards was immense, and he hoped that the House would consider that for constitutional reasons it ought not to be increased. It was generally thought that some higher influence had been brought to bear to induce the Government to depart from the opinions which they had previously expressed upon this subject; and when he remembered that they only last year introduced a Bill to provide for the augmentation of the Indian forces, and were now asking the House to adopt an entirely opposite course, he could not but be afraid that such had been the case. The arguments of the noble Lord the Member for Lynn had been most satisfactory and most conclusive against the policy Her Majesty's Government seemed determined to adopt; and he would reserve any further remarks which he had to make upon this subject until the House was asked to read the Bill a second time.

CAPTAIN JERVIS complained that the hon. and gallant General the Member for Westminster (Sir De Lacy Evans) had departed from the real question before the House, which was, whether there should be a local army in India, or an amalgamated British army, in order to make an attack upon the Horse Guards. He seemed to think that the measure before them was a result of a job on the part of the Horse Guards, backed up by the Crown, to place in the hands of the former a little more patronage than it at present possessed. Since the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for India addressed to the House his clear and able speech upon this subject there had been distributed a despatch of the Earl Canning, dated May 6, 1860, in which that noble Lord stated that rapidly to raise any European army in India and officer it efficiently from the present body of officers, was impossible. The question, then, was, whether we were to create a fresh local army or to raise the British army in India from 66,000 to 80,000 men. There was now no local army in India. In the Bengal local army there was one officer to six European men; in that of Madras one officer to ten Europeans, and in that of Bombay one officer to every twelve Europeans. There were between 4,000 and 5,000 men at present belonging to the local army in India, and in the course of the year 300 men would be sent out to replace thousands who had been disbanded and sent home. It was a fact recognized by every man in India, from the Commander-in-Chief downwards, that that army could not be re-established. If there was one other authority whose opinion ought to command respect in that House more than another, it was Sir Charles Trevelyan, who in one of his Minutes stated that, on the balance of advantages and disadvantages, he preferred the plan of having a Royal army in India to that of re-organizing the local force. The Horse Guards, against which the hon. and gallant General had made so unwarrantable an attack, was nothing more nor less than a number of officers, who were appointed by the Crown to enforce the discipline of the army, and to see that promotion in the service was carried out in an efficient and correct manner. There was great misapprehension in the public mind as to the extent to which the powers of the Commander-in-Chief would be increased by transferring the local European troops to the regular army. A Commission which sat in 1837, upon which were some of the most distinguished Members of the House, had shown that the Commander-in-Chief was responsible for the efficiency of the army, but the Secretary of State was responsible to the Crown and the country for the expenditure. It was shown that if the Commander-in-Chief wanted to remove a corporal's guard from one place to another the order must have the sanction of the Secretary of State. He (Captain Jervis) did not believe that there was any jealousy between the local force and Her Majesty's army, and he could not understand how the amalgamation of a few thousand men could injure the Government of the country.

Leave given.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir CHARLES WOOD, Mr. Secretary HERBERT, and Mr. BARING.

Bill presented, and read 1^o.

INLAND BONDING BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clauses 1 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

Clause 6 (Manchester Rates to be paid in lieu of existing charges).

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY complained of the absence of precise information as to the meaning of this clause. He wanted to know what was the nature of the power given by this clause to the Town Council of Manchester over the rates. He only received a copy of the Bill that day, and had not, therefore, time to consider its provisions.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the hon. Member must have been particularly unfortunate in not receiving a copy of the Bill before the time he stated, since it was distributed the day previous. He quite agreed that unless the circumstances were urgent, or there was an universal assent on the part of the House, nothing could be more improper than to read a Bill a second time before it was printed. The nature of the arrangement to which the clause referred was this. The City of Manchester at present enjoyed powers of inland bonding under a Local Act passed twelve or fifteen years ago. Under the arrangement made by the House in the Customs Tariff Act, a certain additional fee was chargeable on goods in warehouses when they had been delivered to places not now enjoying the privilege of inland bonding. Manchester would, therefore, only have to pay this additional fee; and that fee formed a much smaller burden than the whole expense of the customs establishment, which the City had hitherto borne. In fact the object of the clause was to give to Manchester an opportunity of getting rid of the obligation to pay the whole expense of the Customs establishment, by placing itself on the same footing as other towns. But parties representing the sentiments of Manchester had said that as that City entirely agreed with the object in view, it would be better to enact at once that Manchester should be liable to this additional fee, and relieved from the charges of its own establishment.

Captain Jervis

MR. HENLEY said, he fully concurred in the principle of placing Manchester upon the equality alluded to, but it was important to ascertain the nature of the Local Act of Manchester in order that they might know whether that City obtained any peculiar advantages under it.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was true the Local Act contained various other provisions; but they were rather complex than necessary, and were intended merely to adjust the system under which the rates should be collected in the Customs establishment. The effect of the clause would be to leave Manchester, as regarded the public, precisely on the same footing as the other inland places which had bonding.

MR. HENLEY said, that much depended on what meaning was placed on the word "public" by the right hon. Gentleman. He should like to know whether it would make any difference as between Manchester and the Exchequer.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he believed Manchester would not obtain any such advantage.

MR. BAZLEY remarked that the Local Act had affected Manchester rather disadvantageously than otherwise, but under the present Bill Manchester, Leeds, Sheffield, and other places, would be placed upon precisely the same footing.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported: as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

CALEDONIAN AND CRINAN CANALS BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. FINLAY suggested that the third reading should be deferred for a few days in order that an opportunity might be afforded for the introduction of a clause which would prevent the letting of the canals to parties who were not prepared to use them for the accommodation of the public.

MR. W. WILLIAMS moved that it be read a third time that day three months. Nearly £1,400,000 had already been spent

